WHISTLEBLOWER 22716–13W, Petitioner
v.
COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE, Respondent

Docket No. 22716–13W
Filed March 14, 2016

Synopsis

Background: After IRS collected multi-million-dollar civil penalty from two Swiss bankers for failing to file Form TD F 90–22.1, Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts (Foreign Bank Account Report or FBAR), whistleblower applied for nondiscretionary award related to his assistance during criminal investigation of bankers. IRS moved for summary judgment.

[Holding:] The Tax Court, Lauber, J., held that term "additional amounts," as used in statutory provision establishing threshold collected amount for nondiscretionary awards did not include FBAR civil penalty.

Decision for IRS.

Attorneys and Law Firms

Robert F. Katzburg and William M. Sharp, for petitioner.[*]

Ashley M. Bender and John T. Arthur, for respondent.

P filed Form 211, Application for Award for Original Information, with the IRS Whistleblower Office with respect to TP1. By guilty plea, TP1 agreed to pay an FBAR civil penalty substantially in excess of $2,000,000 and a small amount of restitution, reflecting unpaid Federal income tax on income derived from Swiss bank accounts.

A whistleblower is eligible for a nondiscretionary award under I.R.C. sec. 7623(b) only "if the tax, penalties, interest, additions to tax, and additional amounts in dispute exceed $2,000,000." I.R.C. sec. 7623(b)(5)(B). FBAR civil penalties are imposed and collected under 31 U.S.C. sec. 5321 (2006), not under the Internal Revenue Code. R contends that FBAR payments do not constitute "additional amounts" for purposes of ascertaining whether the $2,000,000 threshold has been met.

1. Held: The term "additional amounts" as used in I.R.C. sec. 7623(b)(5)(B) means the civil penalties set forth in c. 68, subch. A, of the Internal Revenue Code, captioned "Additions to the Tax and Additional Amounts."

2. Held, further, FBAR civil penalties are not "additional amounts" within the meaning of I.R.C. sec. 7623(b)(5)(B), and they are not "assessed, collected, * * * [or] paid in the same manner as taxes." I.R.C. sec. 6665(a)(1). FBAR payments must therefore be excluded in determining whether the $2,000,000 "amount in dispute" requirement has been satisfied.

OPINION

LAUBER, Judge:

85 This whistleblower award case is before the Court on a motion for summary judgment filed by the Internal Revenue Service (IRS or respondent). A whistleblower is eligible for a nondiscretionary award under section 7623(b) only "if the tax, penalties, interest, additions to tax, and additional amounts in dispute exceed $2,000,000." Sec. 7623(b)(5)(B).[1] The IRS collected from the taxpayer who is the subject of this whistleblower claim a multi-million-dollar civil penalty for failing to file Form TD F 90–22.1, Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts (Foreign Bank Account Report or FBAR), under 31 U.S.C. sec. 5321(a) (2006). The question we must decide is whether this FBAR payment constitutes an "additional amount" for purposes of ascertaining whether the $2,000,000 threshold has been met. We hold that it does not. We will accordingly grant respondent's motion for summary judgment.

Background

Petitioner in 2010 filed Form 211, Application for Award for Original Information, with the IRS Whistleblower Office (Office).[2] On the application he asserted that he was cooperating with the Department of Justice and the IRS Criminal Investigation Division in connection with the ongoing investigation of two Swiss bankers, Martin Lack and Renzo Gadola. Petitioner alleged that his cooperation with those 86 agencies had led to, and would lead to more, information about these bankers' involvement in tax evasion by U.S. persons having undeclared offshore financial accounts. The Office notified petitioner that it had received the Form 211 and had assigned unique claim numbers to his claims regarding the two bankers.

On August 23, 2011, petitioner filed with the Office a third claim for an award, which is the subject of the present controversy. Petitioner filed this claim after learning that Taxpayer 1 had agreed to pay a substantial penalty in conjunction with a guilty plea for filing a false tax return. Taxpayer 1 admitted that Gadola had helped him open Swiss bank accounts to conceal his income and assets from U.S. authorities. By the guilty plea, Taxpayer 1 agreed to pay an FBAR civil penalty substantially in excess of $2,000,000 and a small amount of restitution, reflecting unpaid Federal income tax on income derived from the Swiss bank accounts. Petitioner claimed entitlement to an award based upon the aggregate amount paid by Taxpayer 1, given petitioner's alleged involvement in Gadola's arrest, which allegedly led to Taxpayer 1's arrest.

During its review of the Taxpayer 1 claim, the Office informed petitioner that it had received a legal opinion from the IRS Office of Chief Counsel concluding that FBAR penalty payments, because they are made pursuant to Title 31 rather than Title 26 of the U.S. Code, are not “collected proceeds” eligible for a non-discretionary award under section 7623(b)(1). See Scope of Awards Payable Under I.R.C. Section 7623, PMTA 2012–10. Viewing this as a de facto denial of his Taxpayer 1 claim, petitioner sought immediate review in this Court. We granted respondent's motion to dismiss that case for lack of jurisdiction, concluding that the Office had not made, as of the time petitioner filed that petition, a “determination regarding an award” sufficient to confer jurisdiction on this Court. See Whistleblower 22231–12W v. Commissioner, T.C. Memo.2014–157.

On September 6, 2013, the Office issued petitioner a final determination letter informing him that his Taxpayer 1 claim had been denied. The letter stated two grounds for the denial: (1) the Government had obtained complete information about Taxpayer 1's offshore accounts directly from the Swiss bank, without any assistance from petitioner; and (2) 87 petitioner in any event could not qualify for a nondiscretionary award because his claim did not meet the $2,000,000 threshold. Believing that FBAR payments do not constitute “tax, penalties, interest, additions to tax, * * * [or] additional amounts” within the meaning of section 7623(b)(5)(B), the Office concluded that the amount in dispute with respect to the Taxpayer 1 claim, resolving all doubts in petitioner's favor, could not exceed $50,000.

Petitioner timely petitioned this Court for review of this determination denying his award. Respondent filed an answer raising the section 7623(b)(5)(B) dollar threshold as an affirmative defense.[3] On May 29, 2015, respondent moved for summary judgment on the basis of petitioner's alleged failure to satisfy section 7623(b)(5)(B). The Court has received thorough briefing from the parties on this subject, as well as a brief amicus curiae from the National Whistleblowers Center (NWC), to which both parties have responded.

Discussion

I. Standard of Review

[1] The purpose of summary judgment is to expedite litigation and avoid unnecessary and expensive trials. See FPL Grp., Inc. & Subs. v. Commissioner, 116 T.C. 73, 74 (2001). We may grant summary judgment when there is no genuine dispute concerning any material fact and a decision may be rendered as a matter of law. Rule 121(b); Elec. Arts, Inc. v. Commissioner, 118 T.C. 226, 238 (2002). The parties agree on all questions of fact affecting the application of section 7623(b)(5)(B), and the proper interpretation of that provision presents a pure question of law. We conclude that the question 88 presented by respondent's motion is appropriate for summary adjudication.[4]

II. Governing Statutory Framework

A. The Whistleblower Statute

[2] The IRS has long had authority to pay awards to persons, now called "whistleblowers," who provide information leading to the recovery of unpaid taxes. The Code now provides for two types of whistleblower awards: discretionary and non-discretionary. The former derive from legislation enacted in 1867, which authorized the Secretary "to pay such sums * * * as may in his judgment be deemed necessary for detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons guilty of violating the internal revenue laws, or conniving at the same." Act of Mar. 2, 1867, ch. 169, sec. 7, 14 Stat. at 473. This provision, reenacted without much change as section 7623(a), authorizes the IRS to pay such sums as it "deems necessary" and mandates that such payments "shall be paid from the proceeds of amounts collected." The IRS' determinations with respect to these discretionary awards are not subject to judicial review. See, e.g., DaCosta v. United States, 82 Fed. Cl. 549 (2008); Conner v. United States, 76 Fed. Cl. 86 (2007); Destefano v. United States, 52 Fed. Cl. 291 (2002); see also Lippolis v. Commissioner, 143 T.C. 393, 399 (2014); Whistleblower 11332–13W v. Commissioner, 142 T.C. 396, 400 (2014).

The second type of whistleblower award, set forth in section 7623(b), was introduced by the Tax Relief and Health Care Act of 2006, Pub.L. No. 109–432, sec. 406, 120 Stat. at 2958–2960. Section 7623(b) provides for nondiscretionary (i.e., mandatory) awards if specified dollar thresholds and other requirements are met. Under section 7623(b)(5), a 89 whistleblower is eligible for a nondiscretionary award with respect to any action—

> (A) against any taxpayer, but in the case of any individual, only if such individual's gross income exceeds $200,000 for any taxable year subject to such action, and
> (B) if the tax, penalties, interest, additions to tax, and additional amounts in dispute exceed $2,000,000.

[3] If these monetary thresholds are met and the Government recovers "collected proceeds" attributable to the whistleblower's information, the whistleblower 15 percent but not more than 30 percent of the collected proceeds (including penalties, interest, additions to tax, and additional amounts) resulting from the action (including any related actions) or from any settlement in response to such action." Sec. 7623(b)(1); see Cooper v. Commissioner, 136 T.C. 597, 600 (2011). If a claim does not satisfy the dollar thresholds of section 7623(b)(5), the IRS retains discretion to pay an award under subsection (a), but it is not required to pay an award under subsection (b).

B. FBAR Civil Penalties

Congress passed the Bank Secrecy Act (BSA), 31 U.S.C. secs. 5311–5332 (2006), to advance a variety of regulatory and investigative objectives, including detection and prosecution of criminal activity and enforcement of laws under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Treasury. See id. sec. 5311; United States v. Simonelli, 614 F.Supp.2d 241, 241 (D.Conn.2008). The BSA requires (among other things) that U.S. persons who have interests in (or authority over) bank or financial accounts in foreign countries must report information about those accounts to the Federal Government. An FBAR is the required vehicle for making this disclosure. As relevant here, U.S. persons who hold one or more foreign financial accounts with an aggregate value exceeding $10,000 must file an FBAR with the Commissioner reporting the existence and value of the accounts. See 31 U.S.C. sec. 5314(a); 31 C.F.R. secs. 1010.350, 1010.306(c) (2011).

While "the obligation to file an FBAR arises under Title 31, individual taxpayers subject to the FBAR reporting requirements are alerted to this requirement in the preparation of annual Federal income tax returns." Staff of J. Comm. 90 on Taxation, Technical Explanation of H.R. 4213, JCX–60–09, at 144 (Dec. 8, 2009). The Form 1040, U.S. Individual Income Tax Return, currently includes at the bottom of Schedule B, Interest and Ordinary Dividends, the following question: "At any time during * * * [the taxable year] did you have a financial interest in or signature authority over a financial account (such as a bank account, securities account, or brokerage account) located in a foreign country?" A taxpayer who checks the "yes" box is directed to instructions concerning his obligation "to file * * * Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts (FBAR), to report that financial interest or signature authority." [5]

The BSA requires covered persons to file the FBAR with the Department of the Treasury, but not to remit money or property. The FBAR form specifically instructs filers:

"Do NOT file with your Federal Tax Return." As relevant here, the BSA imposes no pecuniary burden on covered persons, only the requirement that they file an FBAR.

A person who fails to file a required FBAR may be assessed a civil monetary penalty. 31 U.S.C. sec. 5321(a)(5)(A). The amount of the penalty is capped at $10,000 unless the failure was willful. See id. subparas. (B)(i), (C). If the failure was willful, the maximum penalty increases to $100,000 or half the value of the foreign bank account at the time of the violation, whichever is greater. Ibid. In either case, whether to impose the penalty and the amount of the penalty are committed to the discretion of the Secretary. See id. subpara. (A) ("The Secretary of the Treasury may impose a civil money penalty [.]"); id. subpara. (B) ("the amount of any civil penalty * * * shall not exceed" the statutory ceiling).

The FBAR civil penalty may be assessed "at any time before the end of the six-year period beginning on the date of the transaction with respect to which the penalty is assessed." 31 U.S.C. sec. 5321(b)(1). The Government may commence a civil action to recover an assessed FBAR penalty 91 at any time before the end of the two-year period beginning on the later of (a) the date the penalty was assessed or (b) the date any judgment becomes final in a related criminal action. See id. para. (2); United States v. Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. 655 (4th Cir.2012); Moore v. United States, 2015 WL 1510007 (W.D.Wash. Apr. 1, 2015); United States v. McBride, 908 F.Supp.2d 1186 (D.Utah 2012).

Authority to enforce BSA requirements, including imposition of FBAR civil penalties, was initially delegated to the Financial Crimes Enforcement Network (FinCEN), a bureau of the Department of the Treasury. FinCEN's overall mission is to collect and analyze information about financial transactions in order to combat money laundering, terrorist financing, and other financial crimes. See 31 U.S.C. sec. 5311; Simonelli, 614 F.Supp.2d at 241. Through a memorandum of agreement between FinCEN and the IRS, authority to administer the FBAR regime has been redelegated to the Commissioner. See 31 C.F.R. sec. 1010.810(g) (2011). The Secretary recommended this redelegation in part because "the FBAR is directed more towards tax evasion, as opposed to money laundering or other financial crimes, that lie at the core mission of FinCEN." FinCEN, Report to Congress in Accordance with Section 361(b) of the USA PATRIOT Act, at 4 (Apr. 24, 2003).

The authority thus delegated to the Commissioner is broad, giving the IRS the power to assess and collect civil penalties for noncompliance with FBAR requirements, investigate possible violations, employ summons power, issue administrative rulings, and take "any other action reasonably necessary" to implement and enforce the FBAR regime. 31 C.F.R. sec. 1010.810(g); see also FinCEN, Report to Congress in Accordance with Section 361(b) of the USA PATRIOT Act, at 5 (Apr. 8, 2005) (delegation allows IRS "to create interpretive education outreach materials for the FBAR, revise the form and instructions, examine individuals and other entities, and assess civil penalties for violations").

III. Analysis

A. "Additional Amounts"

Section 7623(b)(5) makes a whistleblower eligible for a nondiscretionary award only if his claim satisfies two monetary 92 thresholds. The parties appear to agree that Taxpayer 1's gross income exceeded $200,000. See sec. 7623(b)(5)(A). In order to prevail, therefore, petitioner must show that "the tax, penalties, interest, additions to tax, and additional amounts in dispute exceed $2,000,000" with respect to his Taxpayer 1 claim. See sec. 7623(b)(5)(B). Petitioner does not contend that FBAR payments constitute "tax," "interest," or "additions to tax," nor does he contend that they are "penalties" under the Internal Revenue Code. The focus of the parties' dispute, and the question we must decide, is whether FBAR payments constitute "additional amounts" within the meaning of section 7623(b)(5)(B). [6]

[4] [5] [6] In deciding the proper interpretation of "additional amounts" as used in this section, the starting point is the language of the statute. Greyhound Corp. v. Mt. Hood Stages, Inc., 437 U.S. 322, 330 (1978). Where Congress uses a term of art that has acquired an established meaning over a long period, Congress presumably intends that meaning when it uses that term. See, e.g., Morissette v. United States, 342 U.S. 246, 263 (1952); cf. Direct Mktg. Ass'n v. Brohl, 571 U.S. ——, ——, 135 S.Ct. 1124, 1129–1130 (2015) (applying this principle to define for tax purposes the terms "assessment," "levy," and "collection"); 1836 S St. Tenants Ass'n, Inc. v. Estate of B. Battle, 965 A.2d 832, 839

(D.C.2009) ("When a legislature borrows common law terms of art in writing legislation, 'it presumably knows and adopts the cluster of ideas that were attached to [the] borrowed word [s].' " (alteration in original) (quoting 1618 Twenty–First St. Tenants' Ass'n v. The Phillips Collection, 829 A.2d 201, 203 (D.C.2003)). Where the same word or phrase appears multiple times within a 93 statutory text, it is generally presumed to have the same meaning each place it appears. See, e.g., Atl. Cleaners & Dyers, Inc. v. United States, 286 U.S. 427, 433 (1932) ("Undoubtedly, there is a natural presumption that identical words used in different parts of the same act are intended to have the same meaning."); Rand v. Commissioner, 141 T.C. 376, 385 (2013) (same).

The term "additional amounts," when used in a series that also includes the words "tax" and either "additions to tax" or "additions to the tax," appears nearly 40 times in the Internal Revenue Code. [7] Elsewhere in the U.S.Code, the term "additional amount" appears in a series of this sort only twice; in both instances, the provision in which it appears is captioned "Taxes." See 22 U.S.C. sec. 1631k(d) (2006) (defining "tax[es]" to include specified taxes "and also any interest, penalty, additional amount, or addition thereto"); 50 U.S.C. sec. 4333 (2006) (same).

"Additional amounts" and "additions to the tax" are terms of art in the Internal Revenue Code. Chapter 68 of the Code is captioned "Additions to the Tax, Additional Amounts, and Assessable Penalties." Subchapter A of chapter 68 is captioned "Additions to the Tax and Additional Amounts." This subchapter includes 13 sections, including the additions to tax for failure timely to file a return or timely pay tax, the accuracy-related penalty under section 6662, and the fraud penalty under section 6663. Section 6665, the last section in this subchapter, is captioned "Applicable Rules." It states that, except as otherwise provided in Title 26, "the additions to the tax, additional amounts, and penalties provided by this chapter shall be * * * assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as taxes" and that "any reference in this title to 'tax' imposed by this title shall be deemed also to refer to the additions to the tax, additional amounts, and penalties provided by this chapter."

Given this statutory structure, we have repeatedly held that the term "additional amounts" has a technical meaning in the Code, referring specifically to penalties set forth in 94 chapter 68, subchapter A. For example, in Bregin v. Commissioner, 74 T.C. 1097, 1101 (1980), we had to determine whether we had jurisdiction in a deficiency case to consider an IRS claim for an erroneous refund. Under section 6214(a), this Court has jurisdiction "to redetermine the correct amount of the deficiency even if the amount so redetermined is greater than the amount of the deficiency * * * and to determine whether any additional amount, or any addition to the tax should be assessed, if claim therefor is asserted by the Secretary at or before the hearing." The IRS urged that the term "additional amount" be construed broadly enough to include the erroneous refund it sought to recover from the taxpayer.

We disagreed. We noted that "[t]he term 'additional amount' appears in chapter 68 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, which relates to 'Additions to the Tax, Additional Amounts, and Assessable Penalties.' " 74 T.C. at 1102–1103. We concluded that the term "additional amounts" as used in chapter 68 means one of the civil penalties referred to in that chapter and "that the same meaning was intended in section 6214(a), especially since it refers to both additional amounts and additions to the tax." Id. at 1103. Our review of the legislative history confirmed that the term "additional amounts" as used in section 6214(a) was "intended only to refer to claims for the civil penalties." Ibid.

In Pen Coal Corp. v. Commissioner, 107 T.C. 249 (1996), we had to decide whether we had jurisdiction to redetermine a corporate taxpayer's liability for interest computed at the increased rate prescribed by section 6621(c). The taxpayer contended that section 6214(a) gave the Court jurisdiction on the theory that "such interest constitutes an 'additional amount' within the meaning of section 6214(a)." Id. at 255–256. Relying on our analysis in Bregin we rejected this argument, concluding: "Congress used the phrase 'any additional amount, or any addition to the tax' in section 6214(a) to ensure an understanding that this Court's jurisdiction encompasses items that are to be assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as taxes, including the additions to tax and other additional amounts * * * described in chapter 68." Id. at 258; cf. El v. Commissioner, 144 T.C. 140, 148 (2015) (holding that the "additional tax" imposed by 95 section 72(t)(1) is not a "penalty, addition to tax, or additional amount" within the meaning of section 7491(c)).

In Williams v. Commissioner, 131 T.C. 54 (2008), we ruled that FBAR penalties do not constitute "additional amounts" for purposes of our deficiency or CDP jurisdiction. The taxpayer there sought redetermination of tax deficiencies for certain years and also asked us to "abate" FBAR penalties allegedly imposed for his failure to disclose Swiss bank accounts. Id. at 55. We held that we lacked jurisdiction over the FBAR penalties, noting that they "are authorized in Title 31 ('Money and Finance') of the United States Code, not Title 26 (the Internal Revenue Code)." Id. at 56. The taxpayer "d[id] not point to any grant of jurisdiction to this Court that would extend to FBAR penalties," and we found none. Id. at 57. We noted that the term "tax" is defined for purposes of our CDP jurisdiction "to include 'additions to the tax, additional amounts, and penalties provided by' " chapter 68. Id. at 59 n.6 (quoting section 6665(a)(2)). But "we * * * [were] aware of no statute that would expand 'tax' as used in the lien and levy statutes in Title 26 to include the FBAR penalty of Title 31." Ibid.

As these cases show, we have consistently held that "additional amounts," particularly when it appears in a series that also includes "tax" and "additions to tax," is a term of art that refers exclusively to the civil penalties enumerated in chapter 68, subchapter A. "Additional amounts" appears in section 7623(b)(5)(B) in conjunction with "tax" and "additions to tax," and we find no reason to give that term a different meaning in this section than it has elsewhere. In Williams, we ruled that an FBAR civil penalty is not an "additional amount" for purposes of our deficiency or CDP jurisdiction. Petitioner has supplied no textual basis, either in the language of the statute or the structure of the Code, for reaching a different conclusion with respect to the whistleblower provision at issue here.

[7] FBAR civil penalties are not among the tax-related penalties enumerated in chapter 68, and they are not "assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as taxes." Sec. 6665(a)(1); see Moore, 2015 WL 1510007, at *8 ("In contrast to well-worn procedures for assessing tax deficiencies, a person searching the Code of Federal Regulations or United States Code for information on the procedure for FBAR penalty 96 assessment will come up nearly empty-handed."). FBAR penalties are not "additional amounts" within the meaning of section 7623(b)(5)(B), and they must be excluded in determining whether the $2,000,000 "amount in dispute" requirement has been satisfied.[8]

B. Petitioner's Contentions

1. "Structural" Arguments

Petitioner and amicus curiae NWC argue that the term "additional amounts" as used in section 7623(b)(5)(B) means, in essence, "other sums of money." But they point to no other Code section in which "additional amounts" has this broad and virtually limitless meaning. And they offer no convincing rebuttal to the canons of construction dictating that terms of art be given a consistent meaning in a statutory text and that a technical word or phrase is presumed to have the same meaning each place it appears. Rather than focus on the subparagraph at issue, petitioner and NWC emphasize language appearing elsewhere in the statute, urging that these broader meanings be imported into section 7623(b)(5)(B). But they provide no textual support for doing this, only vague appeals to the statute's "overall structure."

Petitioner and NWC note that section 7623(a) authorizes the Secretary to pay such sums as he deems necessary, from the "proceeds of amounts collected," to detect persons guilty of violating the tax laws "or conniving at the same." FBAR civil penalties, they urge, are reasonably embraced within "proceeds of amounts collected" from persons "conniving at" such violations. Indeed, the record in this case indicates that 97 the Office, prior to 2009, did pay discretionary awards under section 7623(a) based on FBAR recoveries, and nothing in this Opinion would prevent the Secretary from doing so in the future. The question at hand is whether petitioner is eligible for a nondiscretionary award under section 7623(b), and that depends on whether "the tax, penalties, interest, additions to tax, and additional amounts in dispute exceed $2,000,000." The broader language of section 7623(a) provides no justification for giving the term "additional amounts" in section 7623(b)(5)(B) a meaning that it has nowhere else in the Code.

Petitioner next observes that section 7623(b)(1) computes nondiscretionary awards as a percentage of "the collected proceeds (including penalties, interest, additions to tax, and additional amounts) resulting from the action." Congress' use of the word "including" shows that the ensuing list (which notably omits the word "tax") is not exhaustive. See sec. 7701(c); Dunaway v. Commissioner, 124 T.C. 80, 91–92 (2005). And the Supreme Court observed long ago that the word "proceeds" is "of great generality." Phelps v. Harris, 101 U.S. (11 Otto) 370, 380 (1879). Petitioner urges that the term "collected proceeds" is broad enough to include FBAR penalties collected by the IRS, even though they are paid under Title 31 and even if they do not constitute tax, penalties, interest, additions to tax, or additional amounts under Title 26.

While this argument is not without force, we do not see how it affects the proper textual analysis of section 7623(b)(5)(B). Congress could have employed, but did not employ, the term "collected proceeds" when drafting the $2,000,000 monetary threshold. And it did not use the word "including." Instead, Congress explicitly and unambiguously provided that a whistleblower is eligible for a non-discretionary award only "if the tax, penalties, interest, additions to tax, and additional amounts in dispute" exceed $2,000,000.

[8] "[W]hen the legislature uses certain language in one part of the statute and different language in another, the court assumes different meanings were intended." Sosa v. Alvarez–Machain, 542 U.S. 692, 711 n.9 (2004) (quoting 2A N. Singer, Statutes and Statutory Construction, sec. 46:06, at 194 (6th rev. ed.2000)). We have no occasion in this case to decide 98 whether "collected proceeds" as used in section 7623(b)(1) is broad enough to include civil penalties paid for violation of Title 31. See supra note 6. Even if that question were answered in the affirmative, petitioner could not qualify for a nondiscretionary award computed on that broader base unless he first satisfied the section 7623(b)(5)(B) monetary threshold. He cannot do this because FBAR civil penalties do not constitute "additional amounts" within the meaning of that section.

[9] As petitioner notes, courts may rely on a statute's structure as an aid to interpreting its specific terms. See generally Abramski v. United States, 573 U.S. ——, ——, 134 S.Ct. 2259, 2267 (2014). But reliance on context and structure in statutory interpretation is a "subtle business, calling for great wariness lest what professes to be mere rendering becomes creation and attempted interpretation of legislation becomes legislation itself." Palmer v. Massachusetts, 308 U.S. 79, 83 (1939); Yari v. Commissioner, 143 T.C. 157, 165 n.5 (2014) ("[T]he process of divining the legislative intent underlying a statute's * * * structure, while subject to canons of construction and well-established methodologies, is hardly an exact science."). In the absence of specific statutory language linking the potentially broader terms of subsections (a) and (b)(1) to the affirmative defense of subsection (b)(5)(B), we are not at liberty to give "additional amounts"—a term of art with a long-established meaning—a meaning that it has nowhere else in the Internal Revenue Code. [9]

2. Policy Arguments

Because FBAR civil penalties are "administered by the IRS, are reported alongside income tax returns, and have a tax-related purpose," petitioner contends that "they are, in effect, 'internal revenue laws,' and should be treated as such when construing Section 7623's scope." Given the IRS' important role in FBAR administration, at least one court has 99 found that the Internal Revenue Code and the FBAR provisions of Title 31 are "related statutes." Hom v. United States, 2013 WL 5442960 (N.D.Cal. Sept. 30, 2013). According to petitioner, IRS closing agreements settling offshore voluntary disclosure cases have provided that, "in lieu of" an FBAR penalty, the IRS "may assess under Title 26 of the United States Code a miscellaneous penalty" in an agreed-upon amount. Given the close connections between the FBAR regime and tax enforcement, petitioner and NWC urge that treating FBAR penalties the same as taxes is a sensible policy.

The failure to treat FBAR penalties as taxes, petitioner continues, could undercut the effectiveness of the whistleblower law. At a time when undisclosed offshore accounts constitute a major form of tax evasion, FBAR penalties, which can range as high as 50% of the offshore account balance annually, may often dwarf the income tax liabilities generated by the earnings from that account. If FBAR penalties do not count toward the $2,000,000 monetary threshold, whistleblowers will allegedly have little incentive to blow the whistle on these schemes, frustrating Congress' intent in enacting this law.

Petitioner notes that the IRS and the Department of Justice have great discretion in negotiating settlements and plea agreements. If a case involving undisclosed offshore accounts also involves large potential income tax liabilities, the Government may elect to compromise the latter, effectively directing most of the proceeds into the FBAR penalty bucket. If FBAR proceeds do not count toward the $2,000,000 monetary threshold, petitioner fears that the Government could unilaterally make deserving whistleblowers ineligible for section 7623(b) awards by the manner in which it settles cases. [10]

[10] 100 To the extent these concerns have force, they are directed to the wrong forum. There are indisputably strong practical connections between the FBAR regime and tax enforcement; that is presumably what persuaded the Secretary to redelegate FBAR administrative authority to the IRS. But our task is to decide whether FBAR penalties constitute "tax, penalties, interest, additions to tax, * * * [or] additional amounts" within the meaning of section 7623(b)(5)(B). Departmental delegation orders and the practical issues petitioner raises shed no meaningful light on the proper interpretation of this text. The IRS has broad discretion in deciding whether to pursue a taxpayer identified by a whistleblower and in determining how such cases shall be resolved. We lack jurisdiction to address these matters. Cohen v. Commissioner, 139 T.C. 299, 302 (2012), aff'd, 550 Fed.Appx. 10 (D.C.Cir.2014); see Lichtman v. United States, 316 Fed.Appx. 116, 119 (3d Cir.2008) ("[T]he IRS's decision to investigate or not investigate a particular taxpayer's case is within its discretion.").

Petitioner and NWC may well be right that the statute would offer stronger incentives to whistleblowers if FBAR civil penalties were treated like tax liabilities for purposes of determining eligibility for nondiscretionary awards under section 7623(b)(5)(B). And in that event the whistleblower law might more effectively advance the objectives that Congress envisioned for it. But if this is a gap in the statute, it is a gap that only Congress, and not this Court, can fill.

To reflect the foregoing,

An appropriate order and decision will be entered for respondent.

[1] All statutory references are to the Internal Revenue Code (Code or Title 26) in effect at the relevant times, and all Rule references are to the Tax Court Rules of Practice and Procedure. All dollar amounts are rounded to the nearest dollar.

[2] The Court granted petitioner's motion to proceed anonymously. In an effort to preserve petitioner's anonymity, the parties in their briefs and other filings refer to the U.S. taxpayer who is the subject of the relevant whistleblower claim as "Taxpayer 1." We will employ the same convention in this Opinion. When referring to Taxpayer 1 and to petitioner, we will employ the masculine pronoun and possessive adjective without intending to create any implication concerning the gender of either person.

[3] Respondent initially moved to dismiss this case for lack of jurisdiction, contending that the section 7623(b)(5)(B) "amount in dispute" requirement was jurisdictional. This Court subsequently rejected that argument in Lippolis v. Commissioner, 143 T.C. 393, 397 (2014), holding that section 7623(b)(5)(B) affords the IRS only an affirmative defense. On April 6, 2015, respondent moved to withdraw his motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction, citing this Court's holding in Lippolis, and we granted that motion. Respondent filed his answer on April 6, 2015, raising as an affirmative defense that petitioner's claim does not satisfy the $2,000,000 requirement.

[4] Respondent has not sought summary judgment on his alternative basis for denying petitioner's claim, namely, that petitioner's information did not "substantially contribute to" the recovery from Taxpayer 1. See sec. 7623(b)(1); Whistleblower One 10683–13W, 145 T.C. ——, —— (slip op. at 5) (Sept. 16, 2015) (noting that whistleblowers are entitled to an award only if there was a collection of proceeds "attributable in some way to the information that * * * [they] provided"). Because we rule for respondent under section 7623(b)(5)(B), we need not address his alternative basis for denial, which appears to raise at least one dispute of material fact.

[5] During the period relevant to this case, individuals were required to make FBAR reports on TD F 90–22.1, a Department of the Treasury form. On September 30, 2013, the Department's Financial Crimes Enforcement Network (FinCEN) announced that FBAR reports would thenceforth be made on FinCEN Report 114. Form 1040, Schedule B, now refers taxpayers to the latter form.

[6] Respondent also advances the broader contention that whistleblower awards are payable only for recoveries under "the internal revenue laws." See sec. 7623(a)(2). Because FBAR penalties are paid under Title 31, respondent argues that they are not “collected proceeds” under section 7623(b)(1). Since we rule for respondent under the affirmative defense in section 7623(b)(5)(B), we need not address this alternative contention. We note that the IRS Chief Counsel opinion issued during the consideration of petitioner's case acknowledges one type of payment made outside of Title 26 that does constitute “collected proceeds.” That opinion notes that “[t]he IRS assesses and collects in the same manner as tax any criminal restitution ordered” in a criminal case, and that “any such restitution should be included as ‘collected proceeds' for purposes of section 7623, even though ordered pursuant to Title 18.” See supra p. 4.

[8] Section 7623(b)(1) provides for nondiscretionary awards if the Secretary proceeds with an “action described in subsection (a),” and subsection (a) authorizes payment only “where such expenses are not otherwise provided for by law.” Noting that 31 U.S.C. sec. 5323(a) authorizes the Secretary to pay rewards to persons who provide information leading to recovery of FBAR penalties, respondent urges that FBAR informant awards are “otherwise provided for by law.” Petitioner disagrees, noting that rewards under 31 U.S.C. sec. 5323(a) are discretionary whereas rewards under section 7623(b)(1) would be mandatory. Because we rule for respondent under section 7623(b)(5), we need not address this alternative theory. Respondent also contends that FBAR recoveries, because deposited into the Department of the Treasury's General Fund, are not “available for” whistleblower awards. See sec. 7623(a). We need not address this argument either.

[9] Congress did create links between other parts of section 7623. For example, Congress explicitly linked subsection (b)(1) to subsection (a), mandating an award “[i]f the Secretary proceeds with any administrative or judicial action described in subsection (a).” Congress clearly knows how to create such links when it intends to do so. For whatever reason, it did not create links of the sort petitioner desires between subsection (b)(5) and the rest of the statute.

[10] As noted earlier, petitioner contends that the IRS often settles offshore voluntary disclosure cases by requiring the taxpayer, in lieu of paying an FBAR penalty, to pay “under Title 26 of the United States Code a miscellaneous penalty” in an agreed-upon amount. See supra p. 24; see also Offshore Voluntary Disclosure Program Frequently Asked Questions and Answers 2014, Q & A 7. If the penalties thus paid constitute “penalties” within the meaning of section 7623(b)(5)(B)—a point the parties have not addressed because Taxpayer 1 did not settle his case under those procedures—this manner of settling cases, far from hurting whistleblowers, would seem to help them.

United States District Court, D. Utah, Central Division.

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff,
v.
Jon McBRIDE, Defendant.

Case No. 2:09–cv–378 DN.
Nov. 8, 2012.

Synopsis

Background: Government brought action to enforce civil penalty assessed against taxpayer based on his failure to report his interest in four foreign bank accounts during two tax years.

Holdings: Following a bench trial, the District Court, David Nuffer, J., held that:

[1] taxpayer had financial interests in four foreign financial accounts in foreign countries;

[2] taxpayer's failure to comply with FBAR (Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts) reporting requirements was willful; and

Judgment for United States.

FINDINGS OF FACT, CONCLUSIONS OF LAW, AND ORDER

DAVID NUFFER, District Judge.

Plaintiff United States of America brought this case to collect a civil penalty assessed to Defendant Jon McBride for his alleged willful failure to report his interest in four foreign bank accounts during tax years 2000 and 2001 as required under 31 U.S.C. § 5314 and related regulations. The matter was tried to the bench on May 21–22, 2012, and the court took the matter under advisement. The parties have submitted competing proposals as to the facts and legal conclusions that should be reached.[1] Having carefully considered the parties' proposals, along with the record of the hearing and applicable law, the court enters the following findings of fact and conclusions of law.

FINDINGS OF FACT

A. McBride Was the Co–Owner of The Clip Company.

1. Jon McBride is a citizen of the United States, was a citizen of the United States in 2000 and 2001, and has been since at least 1999. (Tr. 310:12–15, May 22, 2012).

2. McBride and Scott Newell ("Newell") were equal partners in The Clip Company, LLC (the "Clip Company"), a company which sold belt clip accessories for cellular telephones. (Tr. 315:12–317:7, May 22, 2012).

1189 3. The Clip Company was in continuous operation from 1994 to 2008. (Tr. 268:10–12, May 22, 2012).

4. McBride was responsible for the financial operations of the Clip Company, including keeping accounting records, and preparing quarterly and yearly reports for the Clip Company. (Tr. 268:13–269:7, May 22, 2012).

5. The only individual other than McBride involved in the financial operations of the Clip Company was the Clip Company's accountant, Craig Stayner. (Tr: 268:25–269:7, May 22, 2012).

6. The Clip Company utilized a manufacturer located in Taiwan, Piao Shang, Ltd., ("Piao Shang"), for the production of its inventory. (Tr. 118:17–119:22); (Tr. 318:15–22, May 22, 2012).

7. Beginning in approximately 1999, the Clip Company entered into several lucrative contracts for the sale of its products to retailers including Ericsson, AT & T, Best Buy and Motorola. (Tr. 269:8–11, May 22, 2012).

8. As a result of the Clip Company's new contracts, McBride knew that the Clip Company was about to obtain a large increase in revenue. (Tr. 269:12–15, May 22, 2012).

9. In anticipation of this increase in revenue, McBride sought a way to reduce or defer the income taxes that would normally be paid on this revenue. (Tr. 269:16–20, May 22, 2012).

B. Merrill Scott and Associates Was a Financial Management Firm that Employed Strategies Designed to Disguise the Ownership of Its Clients' Assets.

10. Merrill Scott and Associates ("Merrill Scott") held itself out as a financial management firm that employed strategies that would allow its clients to avoid or defer the recognition of income for tax purposes and to shield their assets from the reach of creditors by utilizing, amongst other financial strategies and instruments, foreign variable annuities and foreign financial accounts. See (Pl. Exs. 10, 11, 12, 13, 81); (Pl. Ex. 118, Ackerson Dep. Tr. 15:7–14; 15:21–16:13; 25:24–26:10; 69:24–70:13).

11. In reality, Merrill Scott's strategies were designed to allow its clients to avoid reporting income and their ownership of assets by having the clients' assets held by nominees holding the legal title of shell corporations and foreign bank accounts. See (Pl. Exs. 10, 11, 12, 13, 81); (Pl. Ex. 118, Ackerson Dep. Tr. 15:7–14; 15:21–16:13; 25:24–26:10; 69:24–70:13); (Tr. 36:24–37:21, May 21, 2012).

12. Among other strategies, Merrill Scott and its clients purchased foreign variable annuities, set up International Business Corporations ("IBCs") that were incorporated in foreign countries for the benefit of individual clients, established bank and securities accounts in foreign countries, and created foreign trusts and other vehicles that would hold assets for the benefit of Merrill Scott's clients. See (Pl. Exs. 10, 11, 12, 13, 81); (Pl. Ex. 118, Ackerson Dep. Tr. 15:7–14; 15:21–16:13; 25:24–26:10; 69:24–70:13).

13. In 2002, a complaint was filed against Merrill Scott and its principals by the Securities and Exchange Commission for various securities violations, including various Securities Act violations and fraud. See (Ex. 81); (Tr. 69:20–70:23, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 347:7–14, May 22, 2012).

C. McBride Retained the Services of Merrill Scott in Order to Avoid or Defer Taxation.

14. In 1999, after seeing an advertisement for Merrill Scott, McBride contacted Merrill Scott in order to see if Merrill Scott could provide financial services that 1190 would result in avoiding or deferring the recognition of $2 million in income that McBride expected to receive. (Tr. 39:21–41:1, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 320:12–321:11, May 22, 2012).

15. On or around July 20, 1999, McBride went to Merrill Scott's offices where he was given a presentation by several employees of Merrill Scott that described the various strategies that might be utilized by McBride, Newell, and the Clip Company. See (Pl. Ex. 12).

16. Merrill Scott's employees described that the various strategies available would be implemented in a "Master Financial Plan," which would utilize various IBCs, foreign financial accounts, foreign variable annuities, all for the benefit of McBride, Newell, and the Clip Company. See (Pl. Ex. 12).

17. After McBride was given an explanation of Merrill Scott's program, he responded, "This is tax evasion." (Tr. 321:22–23, May 22, 2012).

18. Merrill Scott employees responded that their programs were legal. (Tr. 321:24, May 22, 2012).

19. Merrill Scott employees told McBride that "your plan will be one of the cleanest we have." (Tr. 323:6–7, May 22, 2012).

20. McBride expressed his intention that Merrill Scott set up a structure that would move profits of the Clip Company offshore. (Tr. 40:17–22, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 108:8–13, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 393:12–14, May 22, 2012).

D. McBride Purchased Merrill Scott's Master Financial Plan Without First Obtaining an Outside Legal Opinion.

21. Merrill Scott provided McBride with several pamphlets and materials containing questions and answers regarding how the strategies employed by Merrill Scott interacted with extant income tax and reporting regulations. See (Pl. Exs. 10, 11); (Tr. 322:4–10, May 22, 2012).

22. One of these pamphlets, entitled "Going Offshore: What is it and is it safe," included the following language under the heading "Tax Savings": "US citizens are subject to specific U.S. reporting requirements for interests in foreign corporations, trusts and bank accounts. US citizens and others filing Internal Revenue Service returns are not immune from requisite declaration of ownership interests in foreign entities." See (Pl. Ex. 10).

23. In that meeting, McBride was provided a legal opinion prepared by the Estate Planning Institute, P.C. (Tr. 322:4–8, May 22, 2012).

24. No later than July 29, 1999, McBride was informed that the Estate Planning Institute, P.C. was an entity controlled by or related to Merrill Scott. See (Pl. Ex. 13).

25. McBride did not understand the process by which Merrill Scott proposed to somehow legally move the Clip Company's U.S. revenue offshore. (Tr. 323:9–15, May 22, 2012).

26. On December 10, 2009, McBride stated, under penalty of perjury, that he "reviewed and considered all [Merrill Scott]-based literature and marketing information, including its 'due diligence' information on each of its officers and its track record pertaining to being in 'good standing' with Utah. This information includes (but is not all-inclusive) ... the legal opinion included as part of McBride's initial disclosures, and the packet of [Merrill Scott] literature ..." (Pl. Ex. 3, Response 6).

27. McBride testified at trial that he did not read the legal opinion provided to him by the Estate Planning Institute. (Tr. 402:6–16, May 22, 2012).

1191 28. On November 17, 2010, under penalty of perjury, McBride stated that he specifically read and asked questions from the pamphlet entitled "Questions and Answers." (Pl. Ex. 71, ¶ 4).

29. The pamphlet entitled "Questions and Answers," contains the following language under a heading entitled, "Why not just hide all my assets in a Swiss Account?": "As a U.S. taxpayer, the law requires you to report your financial interest in, or signature authority over, any foreign bank account, securities account, or other financial account.... Intentional failure to comply with the foreign account reporting rule is a crime and the IRS has means to discover such unreported assets." See (Pl. Ex. 11, pp. MB0130–MB0131).

30. McBride never obtained an outside legal opinion from an attorney about the legality of Merrill Scott's financial strategies. (Tr. 271:11, May 22, 2012).

31. McBride never sought advice from his accountant at the time, Craig Stayner, on whether or not to purchase a Master Financial Plan from Merrill Scott. (Tr. 270:18–25, May 22, 2012).

32. McBride was "gung ho" on Merrill Scott and the Master Financial Plan. See (Pl. Ex. 117, Newell Dep. Tr. 37:1–3).

33. Even though Craig Taylor, Scott Newell's accountant at the time, expressed concerns, McBride would not change his decision to enter into an agreement with Merrill Scott. Taylor did not raise any concerns about the FBAR reporting requirement. See (Pl. Ex. 9) (Pl. Ex. 117, Newell Dep. Tr. 36:22–37:7) (Tr. 161:9–162:14, May 21, 2012).

34. Even though he had not obtained an outside opinion regarding the legal consequences of entering into the Master Financial Plan, McBride entered into an Implementation Agreement wherein he agreed to purchase a Master Financial Plan from Merrill Scott for $75,000, in addition to retaining their services for regular monthly fees. See (Pl. Ex. 13).

35. Merrill Scott's proposed Master Financial Plan for McBride included the preparation of the income tax returns for McBride and Newell as part of the services that Merrill Scott would render. See (Pl. Ex. 13); see also (Pl. Ex. 118, Ackerson Dep. 141:12–147:8).

36. McBride declined to retain Merrill Scott's tax return preparation services for his personal income tax returns. See (Tr. 268:25–26:7, May 2, 2012); (Tr. 270:18–25, May 22, 2012); (Tr. 306:19–21, May 22, 2012).

37. McBride sent the payments for the Master Financial Plan to Merrill Scott with checks dated July 1, 1999, August 9, 1999 and December 20, 1999. See (Pl. Ex. 15).

38. In the memo field for the check dated August 9, 1999, McBride indicated that the check was for “Bank account offshore.” See (Pl. Ex. 15); (Tr. 272:9–19, May 22, 2012).

39. On or around August 22, 1999, Craig Taylor sent McBride and Newell a memorandum that advised McBride of Taylor's concerns and questions he had regarding the Merrill Scott proposal as he understood it at the time. (Tr. 269:24–270:14, May 22, 2012); see (Pl. Exs. 8, 9).

40. Attached to Taylor's letter of August 22, 1999, was a newspaper article that described that holding bank accounts in foreign countries was associated with tax evasion and fraudulent activity. See (Pl. Ex. 9).

41. The newspaper article further described the illegality of a process whereby individuals would create fictitious loans that in reality consisted of their own money, while treating the loans as real in order to take deductions on the interest paid and 1192 avoid federal income taxation. See (Pl. Ex. 9).

42. McBride read the letter and attached article. (Tr. 270:3–14, May 22, 2012).

43. Taylor also composed a letter for McBride to send to Merrill Scott, asking Merrill Scott to clarify certain of its strategies with respect to the Master Financial Plan, based on Taylor's understanding of the Master Financial Plan as of August 22, 1999. The letter did not contain any reference or question regarding the reporting requirements that might be incurred by McBride. See (Pl. Exs. 8, 87).

E. McBride Executed the Merrill Scott–Designed Master Financial Plan.

44. Pursuant to the Master Financial Plan, McBride purchased a Foreign Variable Annuity. (Tr. 282:8–18, May 22, 2012); see (Pl. Exs. 12, 13).

45. Pursuant to the Master Financial Plan, Merrill Scott made three IBCs available to McBride and Newell: Drehpunkt, Ltd. (“Drehpunkt”); Lombard & Associates, Ltd. (“Lombard”); and Palisades & Associates, Ltd. (“Palisades”). (Tr. 114:7–25, May 21, 2012); see (Pl. Exs. 12, 13, 64, 69, 87).

46. Pursuant to the Master Financial Plan, Drehpunkt, Lombard, and Palisades were each nominally controlled by officers/directors employed by or otherwise associated with Merrill Scott on behalf of McBride and Newell. (Tr. 283:8–284:18, May 22, 2012); (Pl. Exs. 12, 13, 59, 87).

47. In order to implement the Master Financial Plan, McBride entered into an agreement or multiple agreements with Piao Shang on behalf of the Clip Company. (Tr. 118:8–119:22, May 21, 2012).

48. Pursuant to these agreements, Piao Shang and the Clip Company agreed that the Clip Company would pay Piao Shang a higher per-unit price that included the amortized fixed cost of the molds, even though the cost of the molds had already been paid by the Clip Company. Such higher payments would result in excess funds (the “excess funds”) that would have otherwise represented the profits of the Clip Company. (Tr. 276:23–277:20, May 22, 2012); (Pl. Exs. 59, 60).

49. Instead of retaining the excess funds and reporting the difference in cost of goods sold as profit on its federal income tax returns, the Clip Company paid the excess funds to Piao Shang during the tax years 2000 and 2001. (Tr. 118:8–119:22, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 128:10–129:24, May 21, 2012).

50. Pursuant to the agreement between Piao Shang and the Clip Company, Piao Shang remitted the excess funds to Drehpunkt, even though Drehpunkt had provided no consideration to Piao Shang for such excess funds. (Tr. 118:8–119:22, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 128:10–129:24, May 21, 2012).

51. Drehpunkt received these excess funds via wire transfer in a bank account with the Royal Bank of Scotland, located in the Bahamas, account number XXXXXX–XX3579 (the “Drehpunkt account”). (Tr. 128:16–129:24, May 21, 2012); (Pl. Ex. 88).

52. McBride set up the wire transfer arrangement between Piao Shang and the Drehpunkt account. (Tr. 276:23–277:20, May 22, 2012); (Pl. Ex. 60).

53. McBride also set up a wire transfer arrangement between Vanli International (another supplier) and the Drehpunkt account. (Tr. 278:3–11, May 22, 2012).

54. Lombard also held a bank account with the Royal Bank of Scotland, located in the Bahamas, account number XXXXXX–XX5776 (the "Lombard account"). (Tr. 186:3–15, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 283:20–284:11, May 22, 2012); (Pl. Ex. 89).

1193 55. Pursuant to the Master Financial Plan, Drehpunkt received and disbursed funds from Piao Shang to the Clip Company and to other entities on behalf of the Clip Company as well as McBride, individually. (Tr. 130:19–133:7, May 21, 2012).

56. Lombard received the vast majority, if not all, of its funds from Drehpunkt via wire transfers between the Drehpunkt account and the Lombard account. (Tr. 280:7–12, May 22, 2012).

57. The Drehpunkt account carried a balance of $310,002 in 2000. (Uncontroverted Fact No. 4); (Pl. Ex. 88, p. US02105); see (Tr. 109:24–110:6, May 21, 2012).

58. The Drehpunkt account carried a balance of $736,902 in 2001. (Uncontroverted Fact No. 4); (Pl. Ex. 88, p. US02113); see (Tr. 110:9–24, May 21, 2012).

59. The Lombard account carried a balance of $140,250 in 2000. (Uncontroverted Fact No. 4); (Pl. Ex. 89, p. US02088); see (Tr. 109:24–110:6, May 21, 2012).

60. The Lombard account carried a balance of $150,132 in 2001. (Uncontroverted Fact No. 4); (Pl. Ex. 89, p. US02117); see (Tr. 110:9–24, May 21, 2012).

61. Pursuant to the Master Financial Plan, Lombard received and disbursed funds exclusively on behalf of McBride. (Tr. 132:17–21, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 280:7–9, May 22, 2012).

62. McBride believed and understood Drehpunkt and Lombard to be "bank accounts." (Tr. 46:8–12, May 21, 2012).

63. During 2000 and 2001, Drehpunkt, Lombard, and Palisades were each utilized for the benefit of the Clip Company, McBride, and Newell, and no other individuals. (Tr. 281:24–282:2, May 22, 2012).

F. McBride Dictated the Activity and Disposition of Funds Held by Drehpunkt and Lombard.

64. McBride understood that persons employed by or otherwise associated with Merrill Scott were the nominee directors of Drehpunkt and Lombard. See (Pl. Exs. 13, 87); (Tr. 46:8–19, May 21, 2012).

65. McBride understood that he would be able to exercise control over the funds held by Drehpunkt and Lombard. (Tr. 46:8–19, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 53:7–12, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 280:7–12, May 22, 2012).

66. In various materials, McBride was listed as the "beneficial owner" of Drehpunkt, Lombard, and the other accounts created in connection with his Master Financial Plan. (Tr. 186:8–15, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 210:8–17, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 251:3–16, May 22, 2012).

67. McBride considered the money in the Lombard account to be his. (Tr. 285:5–7, May 22, 2012).

68. McBride considered the funds in the Lombard account to be used for his benefit. (Tr. 285:16–19, May 22, 2012).

69. Pursuant to McBride's requests, employees of Merrill Scott executed wire transfers to move money to or from the Drehpunkt account and the Lombard account. (Tr. 285:20–25, May 22, 2012); (Pl. Ex. 4).

70. McBride communicated to employees of Merrill Scott with instructions on when, how, where, and in what amounts to transfer funds to and from the Drehpunkt and Lombard accounts. (Tr. 279:3–10, May 22, 2012).

71. Merrill Scott generated documents that memorialized some, but not all, of the wire transfer requests made by McBride. These documents contained instructions regarding the sending bank, receiving bank, intermediary bank, account numbers, 1194 routing numbers, amounts, and often the purpose for each transfer. (Pl. Ex. 118, Ackerson Dep. Tr. 29:13–18; 49:13–50:4).

72. McBride received an accounting of the activity that was conducted with respect to the Drehpunkt account and the Lombard account approximately every two weeks from David Fraidenburg, an employee of Merrill Scott. (Tr. 49:23–50:4, May 21, 2012).

73. Every direction to transfer funds to or from the Drehpunkt account or the Lombard account made by McBride was either honored by the employees of Merrill

Scott or McBride withdrew the request before Merrill Scott could fail to honor the request. (Tr. 87:2–6, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 114:5–116:7, May 21, 2012).

74. On several occasions, employees of Merrill Scott asked for McBride's authorization or explicit instructions before transferring funds to and from the Drehpunkt account and the Lombard account. See, e.g., (Pl. Exs. 19, 64, 68).

75. Whether by telephone, facsimile, or email message, McBride directed employees of Merrill Scott to make several wire transfers to or from the Drehpunkt account and the Lombard account on his behalf or on the behalf of the Clip Company. See (Pl. Ex. 19–55, 63–69, 95–115).

G. McBride Funneled Profits of the Clip Company Through Its Taiwanese Manufacturer to his IBCs and Back to Himself Through a Sham Line of Credit.

76. Approximately $2.7 million in excess funds, which would have otherwise represented the profits of the Clip Company, were circuitously funneled through various foreign entities, including Drehpunkt and Lombard. (Tr. 109:19–23, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 118:23–119:22, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 128:10–132:12, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 274:25–275:12, May 22, 2012); (Tr. 276:12–278:25, May 22, 2012); (Tr. 277:5–278:18, May 22, 2012); (Pl. Exs. 82, 83, 84, 86).

77. Commencing on or around November 16, 1999, and continuing through December 6, 2001, at least $1.8 million was transferred from the Drehpunkt account to Fidelity Funding, Ltd., an entity controlled by Merrill Scott, and subsequently to Legacy Capital, another entity controlled by Merrill Scott. That money funded a "loan" from the Merrill Scott-controlled entities to the Clip Company in the form of a line of credit. (Tr. 53:3–6, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 118:23–119:22, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 128:10–132:12, May 21, 2012); (Pl. Exs. 66, 67, 82, 83, 84, 86).

78. During 2000 and 2001, the Clip Company "borrowed" more than $1.2 million dollars against this line of credit and only repaid a fraction of the principal and interest. (Pl. Ex. 118, Ackerson Dep. Tr. 156:1–158:23); (Pl. Ex. 16).

79. The Clip Company borrowed its own money from the line of credit. (Tr. 279:14–16, May 22, 2012).

80. The Clip Company treated the line of credit as a loan for tax purposes. (Tr. 128:20–129:9, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 152:13–154:1, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 282:22–283:7); (Tr. 309:14–20, May 22, 2012).

81. The Clip Company used the proceeds of the line of credit to pay regular business expenses. (Tr. 279:18–21, May 22, 2012).

82. McBride made several draws on the line of credit on behalf of the Clip Company. (Tr. 278:19–279:21, May 22, 2012).

83. Whenever the Clip Company reached the maximum amount allotted to the line of credit, Merrill Scott employees would raise the limit and again honor the requested draw on the line of credit. (Tr. 278:19–279:21, May 22, 2012).

1195 84. Hundreds of thousands of dollars of this "borrowed" money was distributed to McBride and Newell in the form of "partner draws" which were accounted for as "royalty payments." (Tr. 279:22–280:2, May 22, 2012).

85. Neither Piao Shang nor Vanli International ever received any payments on the line of credit. (Tr. 152:8–14, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 281:24–282:2).

H. McBride Used the Profits of the Clip Company Captured by Drehpunkt and Lombard for His Own Benefit.

86. McBride gave instructions to Merrill Scott employees to wire funds from the Drehpunkt account or the Lombard account to his designated recipient on multiple occasions during 2000 and 2001. See (Pl. Exs. 19–55, 63–69, 95–115).

87. On or around January 19, 2000, McBride directed Merrill Scott employees to transfer $141,900 to fund a mortgage for McBride's former wife. (Tr. 49:6–12, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 294:25–295:12, May 22, 2012); see (Pl. Ex. 22).

88. On or around December 20, 2000, McBride directed Merrill Scott employees to transfer $5,000 from the Lombard account to Brandon Carver, a neighbor of McBride's parents. That money was used by Carver to purchase Christmas presents for McBride's parents. (Tr. 124:20–125:10, May 21, 2012); (Pl. Ex. 27).

89. On or around September 1, 2000, McBride directed Merrill Scott employees to transfer $35,000 from the Lombard account to Court L. Armstrong. McBride directed that these funds be paid to Mr. Armstrong in consideration of airline travel provided by Mr. Armstrong for McBride's benefit. (Pl. Ex. 25); (Tr. 290:18–291:10, May 22, 2012).

90. McBride entered into two automobile leases with Merrill Scott Leasing, an entity controlled by Merrill Scott, using funds held in the Lombard account. (Tr. 49:6–12, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 293:23–294:21, May 22, 2012); (Pl. Exs. 4, 31, 32).

91. McBride directed employees of Merrill Scott to make a direct investment in GEET, International using funds from the Lombard account in the amount of $50,000. (Tr. 49:6–12, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 293:5–13, May 22, 2012); (Pl. Exs. 4, 29).

92. Employees of Merrill Scott transferred $50,000 from the Lombard account to GEET, International on McBride's behalf and as an investment for McBride. (Pl. Ex. 29)

93. McBride personally entered into a retainer agreement with attorney William Gregory Burdett to sue the principals of GEET International. (Tr. 293:2–22, May 22, 2012); (Pl. Exs. 4, 29).

94. McBride directed that Mr. Burdett's fees be paid from the Lombard account. (Tr. 293:2–22, May 22, 2012); (Pl. Exs. 4, 29).

95. McBride also directed employees of Merrill Scott to make a direct investment in Choice Sports Network in the amount of $50,000. (Pl. Exs. 23, 63).

96. Employees of Merrill Scott transferred $50,000 from the Lombard account to Choice Sports Network on McBride's behalf and as an investment for McBride. (Pl. Ex. 26).

97. McBride also directed employees of Merrill Scott to make a direct investment in ICUNET, Inc. in the amount of $50,000. (Tr. 292:4–9, May 22, 2012); (Pl. Exs. 4, 26).

98. Employees of Merrill Scott transferred $50,000 from the Lombard account to ICUNET, Inc. on McBride's behalf and as an investment for McBride. (Pl. Ex. 26).

99. McBride directed Merrill Scott employees to transfer $51,000 from the Drehpunkt 1196 account, $7,000 from the Lombard account, and $59,000 from Palisades for a total of $117,000 to the Clip Company. (Pl. Exs. 19, 33).

I. McBride Directed Employees of Merrill Scott to Create Other Accounts to Hold His Assets.

100. Among McBride's several requests were that Merrill Scott establish brokerage accounts so that he could purchase securities and make other investments with the funds that were held by Lombard. (Tr. 303:13–20, May 22, 2012); (Tr. 304:8–306:5, May 22, 2012); (Pl. Exs. 17, 24, 30, 61, 62).

101. Pursuant to McBride's request, a TD Evergreen Wealth Management/Toronto Dominion Bank (Canada) brokerage account number XX1350 (the “TD Evergreen account”) was established and held in the name of Phoenix Overseas Advisors, Ltd. (“POA”). (Tr. 50:5–12, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 51:8–18, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 112:18–113:16, May 21, 2012); see (Pl. Exs. 20, 61, 91).

102. The TD Evergreen account was located in Canada. See (Pl. Ex. 91).

103. POA was an entity controlled by Merrill Scott, used to invest its clients' funds in brokerage accounts, such as TD Evergreen Wealth Management/Toronto Dominion Bank. (Tr. 133:11–21, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 181:4–20, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 296:2–15, May 22, 2012); (Pl. Ex. 118, Ackerson Dep. Tr. 49:13–50:4); see (Pl. Exs. 20, 61, 68).

104. McBride directed employees of Merrill Scott as to which securities should be purchased by POA and held in the TD Evergreen account. (Tr. 49:19–50:23, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 86:21–87:1, May 21, 2012); see (Pl. Ex. 68).

105. The amounts that were transferred into the TD Evergreen account from POA were consistent with amounts transferred from the Lombard account to POA. (Tr. 249:6–18, May 22, 2012); (Tr. 254:14–255:8, May 22, 2012); (Tr. 254:14–255:8, May 22, 2012); (Pl. Ex. 118, Ackerson Dep. 169:25–170:12).

106. Whenever McBride directed that an investment be made in blue chip stocks, these stocks were purchased and held in the TD Evergreen account. (Tr. 255:9–256:6, May 22, 2012).

107. McBride also had an E*Trade account with a portfolio of stocks and securities he managed himself. (Tr. 255:9–15, May 22, 2012).

108. The stock purchases in the TD Evergreen account and in McBride's E*Trade portfolio were consistent with respect to which securities were purchased and when the securities were purchased. (Tr. 255:9–256:6, May 22, 2012).

109. The TD Evergreen account carried a balance of $39,507.22 in 2000. (Tr. 112:17–113:16, May 21, 2012); (Pl. Ex. 91, p. H & H02282); (Def. Exs. 27, 28).

110. The TD Evergreen account carried a balance of $10,899.63 in 2001. (Tr. 252:19–253:23, May 22, 2012); (Def. Ex. 28, p. H & H02289).

111. Pursuant to McBride's request, a Global Securities Corporation (Canada) brokerage account was established and held in the name of Lombard & Associates, Ltd., c/o Merrill Scott & Associates, account number XXX–308U–0 (the "Global Securities account"). (Tr. 111:20–112:18, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 134:8–23, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 183:8–15, May 21, 2012); see (Pl. Exs. 17, 18, 90, 116).

112. The Global Securities account was located in Canada. See (Pl. Exs. 17, 18).

113. The Global Securities account carried a balance of $299,977 in 2000. See (Pl. Ex. 90, p. H & H01063).

1197 114. The Global Securities account carried a balance of $308,377 in 2001. See (Pl. Ex. 90., p. H & H01060).

115. McBride was aware that his assets were being handled by Mark Stern, who worked for Global Securities. (Tr. 134:8–23, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 246:10–21, May 22, 2012); (Pl. Ex. 17); see (Pl. Ex. 71 at ¶ 13).

J. McBride Pulled His Assets Out of Merrill Scott in Mid–2001.

116. McBride stopped receiving biweekly spreadsheets reflecting the status of his assets in the foreign accounts sometime in early 2001. (Tr. 336:3–6, May 22, 2012).

117. McBride also stopped receiving billing statements for interest payments on the line of credit sometime around early 2001. (Tr. 336:7–12, May 22, 2012).

118. McBride was concerned about the legitimacy of Merrill Scott no later than March of 2001. (Tr. 339:11–14, May 22, 2012).

119. McBride convinced Merrill Scott employees to increase the amount of the line of credit by $665,000. He then immediately withdrew all those funds from the line of credit on March 2, 2001. (Tr. 339:1–10, May 22, 2012); (Pl. Ex. 86).

120. McBride filed a claim with a receiver appointed to administer Merrill Scott, stating that he had an interest in both Drehpunkt and Lombard. (Pl. Ex. 81); see (Tr. 152:15–153:16, May 21, 2012).

K. McBride Did Not File an FBAR Report for the Tax Years 2000 and 2001.

121. In 2000 and 2001, McBride knew that the Drehpunkt account, the Lombard account, the TD Evergreen account, and the Global Securities account, (collectively, the "foreign accounts"), were located in countries outside of the United States. (Tr. 274:1–6, May 22, 2012); (Tr. 276:16–22, May 22, 2012); (Tr. 283:20–25, May 22, 2012); (Pl. Exs. 17, 18, 91).

122. For all relevant periods prior to the filing of his 2001 federal income tax return, McBride's personal accountant was Craig Stayner ("Stayner"). (Tr. 204:12–15, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 268:25–269:7, May 2, 2012); (Tr. 270:18–25, May 22, 2012); (Tr. 310:16–22, May 22, 2012).

123. Stayner was also the accountant who prepared the federal tax returns for the Clip Company. (Tr. 270:18–25, May 22, 2012); (Tr. 306:11–13, May 22, 2012).

124. McBride never discussed his involvement with Merrill Scott with Stayner. (Tr. 270:18–25, May 22, 2012).

125. McBride never informed Stayner of either the TD Evergreen account or the Global Securities account. (Tr. 306:11–18, May 22, 2012).

126. No other person assisted McBride in the preparation of his federal tax returns for the tax year 2000. (Tr. 268:25–269:7, May 22, 2012).

127. McBride was the sole source of information used by Stayner in preparing McBride's personal federal tax return for the year 2000. (Tr. 360:6–21, May 22, 2012).

128. McBride prepared and sent Stayner statements of his financial affairs for the year, and informed him what deductions McBride sought to take. (Tr. 360:14–17, May 22, 2012).

129. McBride checked to see that Stayner accurately included at least some of the information he transmitted to Stayner on the schedules to the Form 1040. (Tr. 360:17–21, May 22, 2012).

130. For the tax year 2001, Taylor prepared McBride's personal federal income tax return. (Tr. 306:19–21, May 22, 2012).

131. On McBride's U.S. Individual Income Tax Return (Form 1040) for the tax 1198 year 2000, Schedule B, Line 7a contained the following question/instruction: "At any time during 2000, did you have an interest in or a signature or other authority over a financial account in a foreign country, such as a bank account, securities account, or other financial account? See instructions for exceptions and filing requirements for Form TD F 90–22.1" (Pl. Ex. 56).

132. On McBride's Form 1040 Schedule B for the tax year 2000, on Line 7a, the "No" box is filled. (Pl. Ex. 56).

133. On his federal income tax return (Form 1040) for the tax year 2000, McBride did not report that he had an interest in any foreign bank or financial account. (Tr. 310:23–311:3, May 22, 2012); see (Pl. Ex. 56).

134. McBride did not complete or file a Form TD F 90–22.1 for the tax year 2000. (Tr. 311:4–7, May 22, 2012).

135. The Form 1040 U.S. Individual Income Tax Return for the tax year 2000 signed by McBride contains the following declaration immediately above the signature line: "Under penalties of perjury, I declare that I have examined this return and accompanying schedules and statements, and to the best of my knowledge and belief, they are true, correct, and complete. Declaration of preparer (other than taxpayer) is based on all information of which preparer has any knowledge." (Pl. Ex. 56, p. 2).

136. On McBride's U.S. Individual Income Tax Return (Form 1040) for the tax year 2001, Schedule B, Line 7a contained the following question/instruction: "At any time during 2001, did you have an interest in or a signature or other authority over a financial account in a foreign country, such as a bank account, securities account, or other financial account? See instructions for exceptions and filing requirements for Form TD F 90–22.1" (Pl. Ex. 57).

137. On McBride's Form 1040 Schedule B for the tax year 2001, on Line 7a, the "No" box is filled. (Pl. Ex. 57).

138. On his federal income tax return (Form 1040) for the tax year 2001, McBride did not report that he had an interest in any foreign bank or financial account. (Tr. 312:1–7, May 22, 2012); see (Pl. Ex. 57).

139. McBride did not complete or file a Form TD F 90–22.1 for the tax year 2001. (Tr. 312:4–7, May 22, 2012).

140. The Form 1040 U.S. Individual Income Tax Return for the tax year 2001 signed by McBride contains the following declaration immediately above the signature line: "Under penalties of perjury, I declare that I have examined this return and accompanying schedules and statements, and to the best of my knowledge and belief, they are true, correct, and complete. Declaration of preparer (other than taxpayer) is based on all information of which preparer has any knowledge." (Pl. Ex. 57, p. 2).

141. McBride signed his Form 1040 U.S. Individual Income Tax Returns for the tax years 2000 and 2001. (Pl. Exs. 56, 57).

L. McBride Never Obtained a Legal Opinion Regarding the Consequences of Engaging in Merrill Scott's Master Financial Plan.

142. On December 10, 2009, McBride stated, under penalty of perjury, that he "reviewed and considered all [Merrill Scott]-based literature and marketing information, including its 'due diligence' information on each of its officers and its track record pertaining to being in 'good standing' with Utah. This information includes

(but is not all-inclusive) ... the legal opinion included as part of McBride's initial disclosures, and the packet of [Merrill 1199 Scott] literature ...” (Pl. Ex. 3, Response 6).

143. At trial, McBride contradicted that statement and testified that he did not read the legal opinion that was provided to him by the Estate Planning Institute, a Merrill Scott-controlled entity. (Tr. 402:9–16, May 22, 2012).

144. McBride never obtained an outside legal opinion from an attorney about his reporting or tax obligations under the Master Financial Plan. (Tr. 271:11, May 22, 2012).

145. Even though McBride was “concerned” about Merrill Scott no later than March, 2001, McBride did not discuss his involvement with Merrill Scott with Stayner, his accountant, in connection with the preparation of his federal income tax return, which Stayner signed and dated April 6, 2001, and McBride signed and dated April 14, 2001. (Tr. 270:18–22, May 22, 2012); (Tr. 392:10–20, May 22, 2012); (Pl. Ex. 56).

146. McBride never sought advice from Stayner on the legality of the strategies contemplated by the Master Financial Plan or otherwise employed by Merrill Scott. (Tr. 392:10–20, May 22, 2012).

147. McBride never provided Stayner any of the promotional or informational materials provided to him by Merrill Scott. (Tr. 270:18–25, May 22, 2012); (Tr. 392:10–20, May 22, 2012).

148. McBride never informed his accountant, Craig Stayner, of his involvement with Merrill Scott in connection with the preparation of the Clip Company's tax returns for 2000. (Tr. 270:23–25, May 22, 2012); (Pl. Ex. 3, Response 4).

149. McBride did not discuss his involvement with Merrill Scott with Stayner because he “thought that was the purpose of Merrill Scott because ... if you disclose the accounts on the form, then you pay tax on them, so it went against what [he] set up Merrill Scott for in the first place.” (Tr. 392:13–29, May 22, 2012).

150. McBride did not tell or otherwise inform Craig Stayner that Craig Taylor may have relevant information or expertise regarding McBride's tax and reporting obligations as a result of entering into a Master Financial Plan with Merrill Scott. (Tr. 270:18–22, May 22, 2012); (Tr. 392:10–20, May 22, 2012).

151. McBride sent the materials provided to him by Merrill Scott to Newell's accountant, Craig Taylor (“Taylor”), in or around July, 1999. (Tr. 322:18–323:2, May 22, 2012).

152. Taylor declared, under penalty of perjury, that he only used the information provided to him by McBride in order to prepare McBride's federal income tax returns. (Pl. Ex. 8, ¶ 2). Taylor also stated that McBride never informed him that he had any foreign bank accounts. (Pl. Ex. 8, ¶ 6).

M. McBride Lied to the IRS and the United States in Order to Hide his Ownership and Financial Interest in the Foreign Accounts.

153. Beginning in 2004, the IRS began to investigate McBride for potential issues related to his federal income tax returns as a result of his participation in Merrill Scott programs. (Tr. 92:22–93:2, May 21, 2012).

154. The IRS determined that McBride worked with Merrill Scott to set up an offshore business structure to move domestic profits of the Clip Company offshore by inflating the costs of inventory paid to Piao Shang and retaining the excess funds in foreign financial accounts. (Tr. 95:19–96:7, May 21, 2012); (Pl. Ex. 13).

155. Over the course of the examination, the IRS repeatedly requested that McBride produce various documents related 1200 to his participation in Merrill Scott programs. (Tr. 103:21–25, May 21, 2012).

156. Initially, McBride did not produce any emails, letters, or handwritten notes in response to the IRS's document requests. (Tr. 148:4–21, May 21, 2012).

157. In interviews with the IRS, McBride denied that he had utilized the programs described in the Master Financial Plan with offshore components. (Tr. 106:23–107:5, May 21, 2012).

158. In interviews with the IRS, McBride lied to the IRS, and denied knowledge of any wire transfer from the Drehpunkt account or the Lombard account. (Tr. 107:9–17, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 309:21–310:1, May 22, 2012).

159. In interviews with the IRS, McBride lied to the IRS, and claimed that the money funneled from Piao Shang through Fidelity Funding and Legacy Capital to the Clip Company constituted a valid loan from Piao Shang, as opposed to the profits of the Clip Company. (Tr. 309:14–20, May 22, 2012).

160. In interviews with the IRS, McBride lied to the IRS, and denied knowing Brandon Carver. (Tr. 124:20–125:24, May 21, 2012); (Tr. 310:2–6, May 22, 2012).

161. In interviews with the IRS, McBride lied to the IRS, and denied knowing Court Armstrong. (Tr. 310:7–11, May 22, 2012).

162. In the course of its examination, the IRS requested the McBride file an FBAR report, Form TD F 90–22.1 for the tax years 2000 and 2001, but McBride did not do so. (Tr. 158:5–14, May 21, 2012).

163. As a result of McBride's failure to comply with the FBAR requirements for the tax year 2000, the IRS assessed McBride with a civil penalty assessment in the amount of $100,000 ($25,000 per account) for his willful failure to report his interest in the foreign accounts as required by 31 U.S.C. § 5314. (Pl. Ex. 1).

164. As a result of McBride's failure to comply with the FBAR requirements for the tax year 2001, the IRS assessed McBride with a civil penalty assessment in the amount of $100,000 ($25,000 per account) for his willful failure to report his interest in the foreign accounts as required by 31 U.S.C. § 5314. (Pl. Ex. 2).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

I. STATUTORY FRAMEWORK

Section 5314(a) authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to require that U.S. citizens report when they "make[ ] a transaction or maintain[ ] a relation for any person with a foreign financial agency." 31 U.S.C. § 5314(a) (2001). The Secretary has exercised that authority, and requires that individuals "having a financial interest in, or signature or other authority over, a bank, securities or other financial account in a foreign country shall report such relationship ... for each year in which such relationship exists," 31 C.F.R. § 103.24(a) (2001), but only "with respect to foreign financial accounts exceeding $10,000 maintained during the previous calendar year." 31 C.F.R. § 103.27(c) (2001).[2] The Secretary may impose penalties upon taxpayers that violate this requirement. 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5) (2001). As it existed during 1201 the years at issue, prior to an amendment that took effect in 2004, Section 5321(a)(5) authorized penalties against taxpayers who "willfully" violated Section 5314, in the amount of $25,000, or the value of the unreported account (not to exceed $100,000). See also 31 C.F.R. § 103.57(g)(2) (2001).

Thus, in order to prevail, the United States must satisfy the following elements: (a) McBride was a citizen of the United States, or a resident or a person doing business in the United States during 2000 and 2001; (b) McBride had a financial interest in, or signatory or other authority over, a bank, securities or other financial account during 2000 and 2001; (c) the bank, securities or other financial account had a balance that exceeded $10,000 during 2000 and 2001; (d) the bank, securities or other financial account was in a foreign country; (e) McBride failed to disclose the bank, securities or other financial account; (f) the failure to report was willful; and (g) the amounts of the penalties were proper.

II. BURDEN OF PROOF

[1] The statute at issue, 31 U.S.C. § 5321(b)(2), permits the Secretary of Treasury to "commence a civil action to recover a civil penalty assessed under subsection (a)...." The statute does not specify the legal standard to be applied by courts in such an action. The one district court that has directly addressed the question of the burden of proof in a civil FBAR penalty case, United States v. Williams, concluded that the United States' burden of proof was "the preponderance of the evidence" on all questions before the court, including the question of whether the taxpayer's failure to report in that case was "willful." United States v. Williams, No. 1:09–cv–437, 2010 WL 3473311 (E.D.Va. Sep. 1, 2010), rev'd on other grounds, United States v. Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. 655 (4th Cir.2012). "In enforcement actions brought by the Government in other contexts, ... the Government is required to prove its case by a preponderance of the evidence on the record established at trial." Id. at *1 (internal citations omitted). In addition, the district court in Williams held that "[t]he Court's review is 'de novo, and the general rule is that it is a decision based on the merits of the case and not on any record developed at the administrative level.' " Id. (quoting Eren v. Comm'r, 180 F.3d 594 (4th Cir.1999)).

The preponderance of the evidence standard applied by the district court in Williams is the correct standard. As with Government penalty enforcement and collection cases generally, absent a statute that prescribes the burden of proof, imposition of a higher burden of proof is warranted only where "particularly important individual interests or rights," are at stake. See Herman & MacLean v. Huddleston, 459 U.S. 375, 389, 103 S.Ct. 683, 74 L.Ed.2d 548 (1983); Grogan v. Garner, 498 U.S. 279, 286, 111 S.Ct. 654, 112 L.Ed.2d 755 (1991). Because the FBAR penalties at issue in this case only involve money, it does not involve "particularly important individual interests or rights" as that phrase is used in Huddleston and Grogan. In Huddleston, the court of appeals had reversed the district court, stating that the district court's application of the preponderance-of-the-evidence standard in connection with a fraudulent misrepresentation case was incorrect and that a "clear and convincing evidence" standard should have applied in connection with allegations of fraud. 459 U.S. at 379, 103 S.Ct. 683. The Supreme Court reversed, stating that the applicable burden was merely a preponderance of the evidence in cases, even where allegations of fraud were involved, unless "particularly important individual interests or rights are at stake." Id. at 390, 103 S.Ct. 683.

> By contrast, imposition of even severe civil sanctions that do not implicate such 1202 interests has been permitted after proof by a preponderance of the evidence. See, e.g., United States v. Regan, 232 U.S. 37, 48–49, 34 S.Ct. 213, 58 L.Ed. 494 (1914) (proof by a preponderance of the evidence suffices in civil suits involving proof of acts that expose a party to a criminal prosecution).

Id. at 389–90, 103 S.Ct. 683. United States v. Regan held that, at least where the Government is suing to recover a monetary penalty (as is the case here), its suit is a "civil action" to be "conducted and determined according to the same rules and with the same incidents as are other civil actions." 232 U.S. at 46–47, 34 S.Ct. 213. The logic of Huddleston has been applied in the civil tax-penalty area. See, e.g., Mattingly v. United States, 924 F.2d 785, 787 (8th Cir.1991) ("The standard of proof in these [civil tax violation] cases is usually a preponderance of the evidence, and by statute the burden of proof is often placed on the government.").

Moreover, the Supreme Court has been unwilling to require that litigants meet a higher burden of proof than the preponderance of the evidence standard where the statute does not specify a higher burden of proof. See Grogan, 498 U.S. at 286, 111 S.Ct. 654 ("The language of [the statute] does not prescribe the standard of proof.... This silence is inconsistent with the view that Congress intended to require a special, heightened standard of proof."). With respect to 31 U.S.C. §§ 5314 and 5321, Congress did not specify any special, heightened standard of proof. As a result, there is no reason to deviate from the default burden of proof applicable in civil cases.

Therefore, the United States bears the burden of proving that McBride willfully failed to file FBARs with respect to the accounts at issue by the preponderance of the evidence.

III. THE UNITED STATES HAS PROVEN, BY A PREPONDERANCE OF THE EVIDENCE, EACH OF THE ELEMENTS OF THE ASSESSED CIVIL FBAR PENALTIES.

a. Jon McBride is a citizen of the United States.

There is no dispute that Jon McBride is a citizen of the United States. Findings of Fact, supra, ("FOF"), ¶ 1.

b. Jon McBride had a financial interest in the accounts at issue.

[2] McBride had a "financial interest" in the Drehpunkt, Lombard, TD Evergreen, and Global Securities accounts. Pursuant to 31 C.F.R. § 103.24(a) (2001), individuals must disclose "a financial interest in, or signature or other authority over, a bank, securities or other financial account." The Drehpunkt and Lombard accounts were bank accounts, and the TD Evergreen and Global Securities accounts were securities accounts. FOF, ¶ 51, 54, 101, 111. Unfortunately, Section 103.24(a) does not clarify what constitutes a "financial interest."

IRS Form TD F 90–22.1 (the form used for reporting interests in foreign financial accounts) states that an individual has a reportable "financial interest" in foreign accounts for which he "is the owner of record" or for which "the owner of record or holder of legal title is: (a) a person acting as an agent, nominee, attorney, or in some other capacity on behalf of the [individual]; (b) a corporation in which the United States person owns directly or indirectly more than 50 percent of the total value of shares of stock; [...] or (d) a trust in which the United States person either has a present beneficial interest in more than 50 percent of the assets or from which such person receives more than 50 percent of the current income." See Form 1203 TDF 90–22.1, (Plaintiff's Ex. No. 1; Uncontroverted Fact No. 9). This language captures a broad range of relationships through which a party may maintain an interest in a foreign financial account and is consistent with more recent regulation. [3]

Under this definition, McBride had a financial interest in each of the four foreign accounts at issue. The accounts were treated by Merrill Scott as "McBride's" accounts—as reflected on the documentation and communications related to those accounts and McBride's understanding and expectation as well as the course of dealing with Merrill Scott—and McBride had the expectation of enjoying the benefit of the assets in the accounts. FOF, ¶¶ 62, 64, 65. The documentation related to the foreign accounts shows that persons or entities employed by or otherwise associated with Merrill Scott would act on behalf of McBride as nominee officers/directors of IBCs or as the nominee holders of the accounts. FOF, ¶¶ 11, 45, 46, 64, 101, 103, 104, 111.

Through this deliberately disguised ownership structure, McBride was able to direct Merrill Scott to use the overpayments and profits—that would have otherwise flowed to the Clip Company but were instead captured overseas in the Drehpunkt and Lombard accounts—in whatever way he saw fit. FOF, ¶¶ 64–75, 86–115. Given McBride's tacit ownership of the value held in these accounts, Drehpunkt and Lombard were each a "corporation in which [McBride] own[ed] directly or indirectly more than 50 percent of the total value of shares of stock." McBride was then able to direct Merrill Scott to repatriate the Clip Company's overpayments by funneling them through Drehpunkt back to the Clip Company disguised as a "line of credit" from Legacy Capital, an entity controlled by Merrill Scott. See FOF, ¶¶ 76–85; (See Uncontroverted Fact No. 5). During 2000 and 2001, the Clip Company "borrowed" more than $1.2 million dollars of its own money and only repaid a fraction of the principal and interest. FOF, ¶¶ 78–81. Hundreds of thousands of dollars of this "borrowed" money was then distributed directly to McBride in the form of "partner draws" which were accounted for as "royalty payments." FOF, ¶ 84. McBride acted as though the assets contained in each of the foreign accounts, as well as the line of credit, were his and were maintained for his benefit. FOF, ¶¶ 45, 46, 62–75, 84, 86–115.

McBride was able to exercise substantial control over the Drehpunkt and Lombard accounts by communicating with Merrill Scott employees and instructing them on how to dispose of the assets, whether that disposition was to fund an investment or transfer the funds. FOF, ¶¶ 63–75, 86–115. These transfers were initiated at the request of McBride, and normally made exclusively for his own benefit without any possible business purpose for either Drehpunkt or Lombard (or Merrill Scott for that matter). FOF, ¶¶ 86–99. Not one of McBride's requests to transfer funds was ever denied by the employees of Merrill Scott. FOF, ¶ 73. In many instances, employees of Merrill Scott requested explicit authorization and instructions from McBride in order to dispose of the funds in the foreign accounts. FOF, ¶ 74. Through Merrill Scott and its affiliate, McBride was also able to establish the TD Evergreen account and the Global Securities account (held in the name of Lombard & Associates, Ltd.) and to direct the securities purchased and held in those accounts 1204 for McBride's benefit. FOF, ¶¶ 100–115. Although the money used to fund the TD Evergreen securities account was apparently routed through POA (which held money on behalf of many other Merrill Scott clients), the securities in both the TD Evergreen and Global Securities accounts were purchased at McBride's direction and were held on his behalf. FOR, ¶¶ 100, 105–108, 111.

The evidence thus demonstrates that there was an agency relationship between McBride and Merrill Scott through which McBride owned and controlled the Drehpunkt, Lombard, TD Evergreen, and Global Securities accounts. Accordingly, Mr. McBride's interest in the Drehpunkt, Lombard, TD Evergreen, and Global Securities accounts rises to the level of a financial interest that triggered the FBAR reporting requirements.

c. The foreign accounts were located outside of the United States.

The four foreign accounts at issue in this case were located in countries outside the United States. FOF ¶¶ 51, 54, 101, 111, Uncontroverted Fact No. 6.

d. The foreign accounts each had a balance that exceeded $10,000 in both 2000 and 2001.

The foreign bank accounts at issue had balances of at least $10,000 in 2000 and 2001 as demonstrated by statements issued for those accounts as well as the investigation by the IRS that traced the flow of funds from Piao Shang through the Drehpunkt account, the Lombard account, the TD Evergreen account, and the Global Securities account. FOF, ¶¶ 57–60, 109, 110, 113, 114.

e. McBride failed to disclose the foreign accounts in accordance with the FBAR requirements.

McBride filed U.S. Individual Income Tax Returns for both the tax years 2000 and 2001, which did not disclose any interest in any of the foreign accounts. FOF, ¶¶ 132, 137. McBride did not file a Form TD F 90–22.1 for either of the tax years 2000 or 2001. FOF, ¶¶ 134, 139.

f. McBride's Failure to Report His Interest in the Foreign Accounts was Willful.

[3] Section 5321(a)(5) does not define how to assess whether an individual acted willfully in his failure to comply with the reporting requirements imposed by § 5314. " '[W]illfully' is a 'word of many meanings whose construction is often dependent on the context in which it appears.' " Safeco Ins. Co. of Am. v. Burr, 551 U.S. 47, 57, 127 S.Ct. 2201, 167 L.Ed.2d 1045 (2007) (quoting Bryan v. United States, 524 U.S. 184, 191, 118 S.Ct. 1939, 141 L.Ed.2d 197 (1998)).

[4] Because § 5321(a)(5) involves civil penalties, the applicable definition of willfulness is that which has been used in other civil contexts, including civil tax collection matters and compliance with reporting requirements. Where willfulness is a condition of civil liability, it covers "not only knowing violations of a standard, but reckless ones as well." Safeco Ins. Co., 551 U.S. at 57, 127 S.Ct. 2201; cf. United States v. Illinois Central R. Co., 303 U.S. 239, 242–43, 58 S.Ct. 533, 82 L.Ed. 773 (1938) ("willfully" includes "conduct marked by careless disregard whether or not one has the right to so act") (citation omitted). Therefore, "willfulness" may be satisfied by establishing the individual's reckless disregard of a statutory duty, as opposed to acts that are known to violate the statutory duty at issue. See Safeco Ins. Co., 551 U.S. at 57, 127 S.Ct. 2201. An improper motive or bad purpose is not necessary to establish willfulness in the civil context. Am. Arms Int'l v. Herbert, 563 F.3d 78, 83 (4th Cir.2009); Prino v. Simon, 606 F.2d 449, 451 (4th Cir.1979).

1205 [5] The Supreme Court recently confirmed that acting with "willful blindness" to the obvious or known consequences of one's action also satisfies a willfulness requirement in both civil and criminal contexts. See Global–Tech Appliances, Inc. v. SEB S.A., ––– U.S. ––––, 131 S.Ct. 2060, 2068–69, 179 L.Ed.2d 1167 (2011) ("persons who know enough to blind themselves to direct proof of critical facts in effect have actual knowledge of those facts") (citing United States v. Jewell, 532 F.2d 697, 700 (9th Cir.1976) (en banc)). Under the "willful blindness" standard, "a willfully blind defendant is one who takes deliberate actions to avoid confirming a high probability of wrongdoing and who can almost be said to have actually known the critical facts." Id. at 2070–71. Where a taxpayer makes a "conscious effort to avoid learning about reporting requirements," evidence of such willful blindness is a sufficient basis to establish willfulness. United States v. Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. 655, 659–60 (4th Cir.2012) (internal quotations omitted).

[6] In civil contexts involving a requirement to report or disclose certain information to the IRS, willfulness has been defined as conduct which is voluntary, rather than accidental or unconscious. Lefcourt v. United States, 125 F.3d 79, 83 (2d Cir.1997) (defining "willfulness" in the context of a civil penalty for willfully failing to disclose required information to the IRS as conduct that "requires only that a party act voluntarily in withholding requested information, rather than accidentally or unconsciously."); accord Denbo v. United States, 988 F.2d 1029, 1034–35 (10th Cir.1993) (defining "willful" conduct as a "voluntary, conscious and intentional decision") (quoting Burden v. United States, 486 F.2d 302, 304 (10th Cir.1973), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 904, 94 S.Ct. 1608, 40 L.Ed.2d 109 (1974)). Conduct that evidences "reckless disregard of a known or obvious risk" or a "failure to investigate ... after being notified [of the violation]" also satisfies the civil standard for willfulness in such contexts. Denbo, 988 F.2d at 1033.

[7] Willfulness may also "be proven through inference from conduct meant to conceal or mislead sources of income or other financial information." United States v. Sturman, 951 F.2d 1466, 1476–77 (6th Cir.1991). Moreover, willful intent may be proved by circumstantial evidence and reasonable inferences drawn from the facts because direct proof of the taxpayer's intent is rarely available. See id. (citing Spies v. United States, 317 U.S. 492, 499, 63 S.Ct. 364, 87 L.Ed. 418 (1943)).

1. McBride Had Knowledge of the Duty to Comply with the FBAR Requirements.

McBride was aware that he was engaged in a plan to avoid income taxes by hiding his interest in assets in overseas shell corporations. FOF, ¶¶ 16–20, 44–63. Concomitant with this intention is his willfulness with respect to whether or not he complied with the FBAR filing requirements. McBride was "gung ho" about retaining Merrill Scott to assist in avoiding the payment of his income taxes, FOF, ¶ 32, and he was similarly willful with respect to the FBAR filing requirement. After all, McBride reasoned, "that was the purpose of Merrill Scott because ... if you disclose the accounts on the form, then you pay tax on them, so it went against what [he] set up Merrill Scott for in the first place." FOF, ¶ 149.

A. Constructive Knowledge of the Reporting Requirement Is Imputed to Taxpayers Who Sign Their Federal Tax Returns.

[8] [9] All persons in the United States are charged with knowledge of the Statutes–at–Large. Jones v. United States, 121 F.3d 1327 (9th Cir.1997) (citing Bollow 1206 v. Federal Reserve Bank, 650 F.2d 1093, 1100 (9th Cir.1981)). It is well established that taxpayers are charged with the knowledge, awareness, and responsibility for their tax returns, signed under penalties of perjury, and submitted to the IRS. Magill v. Comm'r, 70 T.C. 465, 479–80 (1978), aff'd, 651 F.2d 1233 (6th Cir.1981); Teschner v. Comm'r, T.C. Memo. 1997–498, *17 (1997); accord United States v. Overholt, 307 F.3d 1231, 1245–46 (10th Cir.2002) (observing that in Bryan v. United States, 524 U.S. 184, 194–95, 118 S.Ct. 1939, 141 L.Ed.2d 197 (1998), the Supreme Court distinguished cases like Cheek v. United States, 498 U.S. 192, 111 S.Ct. 604, 112 L.Ed.2d 617 (1991) and Ratzlaf v. United States, 510 U.S. 135, 114 S.Ct. 655, 126 L.Ed.2d 615 (1994) from another context of willfulness on the grounds that the "highly technical statutes" involved in criminal tax prosecutions "carve out an exception to the traditional rule that ignorance of the law is no excuse and require that the defendant have knowledge of the law.") (internal quotation marks and citations omitted); see also Am. Vending Group, Inc. v. United States, 102 A.F.T.R.2d 2008–6305, 2008 WL 4605934, *6 (D.Md.2008) ("Failing to read does not absolve a filer of his or his corporation's legal obligations. Of course if one does not read the instructions, one does not know of the obligation to file the informational returns.").

In United States v. Williams, the only case to examine willfulness in the context of a civil FBAR penalty, the Fourth Circuit recently held that a taxpayer was willful in failing to comply with FBAR requirements when he signed a federal tax return that failed to disclose the existence of foreign accounts, "thereby declaring under penalty of perjury that he had 'examined this return and accompanying schedules and statements' and that, to the best of his knowledge the return was 'true, accurate, and complete.' " See United States v. Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. 655, 659 (4th Cir.2012). The Fourth Circuit reversed the district court's findings of fact as "clearly erroneous," on the grounds that the district court failed to consider the taxpayer's signature on his returns sufficient evidence of his knowledge of his failure to comply with the FBAR requirement. "A taxpayer who signs a tax return will not be heard to claim innocence for not having actually read the return, as he or she is charged with constructive knowledge of its contents." Id. (quoting Greer v. Comm'r, 595 F.3d 338, 347 n. 4 (6th Cir.2010)). At a minimum, "line 7a's directions to '[s]ee instructions for exceptions and filing requirements for Form TD F 90–22.1' " puts a taxpayer "on inquiry notice of the FBAR requirement." Id. As a result, the Fourth Circuit held that Williams's explicit statement that he never consulted Form TD F 90–22.1 or its instructions, never read line 7a, and "never paid any attention to any of the written words on his federal tax return" constituted a " 'conscious effort to avoid learning about reporting requirements,' " and his false answers on his federal tax return "evidence conduct that was 'meant to conceal or mislead sources of income or other financial information.' " Id. (quoting Sturman, 951 F.2d at 1476).

[10] [11] A taxpayer's signature on a return is sufficient proof of a taxpayer's knowledge of the instructions contained in the tax return form and in other contexts. "In general, individuals are charged with knowledge of the contents of documents they sign—that is, they have 'constructive knowledge' of those contents." Consol. Edison Co. of N.Y., Inc. v. United States, 221 F.3d 364, 371 (2d Cir.2000). In In re Crawley, 244 B.R. 121, 130 (Bankr.N.D.Ill.2000), the debtors contended that they did not read and review the information in their tax returns, which were prepared for 1207 them by their accountant, so they could not have failed to pay their taxes willfully. Despite not reviewing the returns, the court charged the debtors with knowledge of the contents of their returns, stating:

> [P]eople who sign tax returns omitting income or overstating deductions often blame their accountant or tax preparer. But these arguments never go anywhere. People are free to sign legal documents without reading them, but the documents are binding whether read or not.

Id. at 130 (quoting Novitsky v. Am. Consulting Engr's, L.L.C., 196 F.3d 699, 702 (7th Cir.1999)).

Many cases have cited the proposition that "[a] taxpayer's signature on a return does not in itself prove his knowledge of the contents, but knowledge may be inferred from the signature along with the surrounding facts and circumstances, and the signature is prima facie evidence that the signer knows the contents of the return." See, e.g., United States v. Mohney, 949 F.2d 1397, 1407 (6th Cir.1991); accord Hayman v. Comm'r, 992 F.2d 1256, 1262 (2d Cir.1993) (holding that where a taxpayer "claims to have signed the returns without reading them, [he or] she nevertheless is charged with constructive knowledge of their contents"). However, the "knowledge of the contents" discussed therein refers to the knowledge of what entries and submissions are made by the taxpayer or the taxpayer's preparer. Mohney, 949 F.2d at 1407 ("Such surrounding facts and circumstances include the defendant's knowledge of the business' revenues, his active role in the operations, his hiring of the accounting firm, and his payment of the taxes."); accord United States v. Drape, 668 F.2d 22, 26 (1st Cir.1982) ("Appellant's signature on his return was sufficient to establish knowledge once it had been shown that the return was false." (citing United States v. Romanow, 509 F.2d 26, 27 (1st Cir.1975))). On the other hand, knowledge of what instructions are contained within the form is directly inferable from the contents of the form itself, even if it were a blank. FOF, ¶¶ 132, 137. If this court were to read Mohney otherwise, that result would conflict with the well-established legal principle that citizens are charged with knowledge of the law.

By the same token, in Burack v. United States, 461 F.2d 1282 (Ct.Cl.1972), the court held that disregard of one's duties should not "be able to defeat the statutory liability fixed upon responsible persons by pleading that he did not know what he was signing and that his action was therefore not 'willful.' " Id. at 1292–93. That is precisely what McBride asks this court to do—to excuse his liability and knowledge of a plainly evident duty because he failed to read what he was signing. Accord Katz v. United States, 321 F.2d 7, 10 (1st Cir.1963) ("A return is not short of wilful [sic] falsity because the taxpayer chooses to keep himself uninformed as to the full extent that it is insufficient, or as to what exact figures should have been inserted. Innocence cannot outdistance ignorance.").

Inferring knowledge of the contents of a return signed by the taxpayer is consistent with the conclusion drawn by the Sixth Circuit in United States v. Sturman, which held that, "It is reasonable to assume that a person who has foreign bank accounts would read the information specified by the government in tax forms," including the reference on Schedule B to the FBAR. 951 F.2d at 1477. Moreover, the line of criminal cases dealing with whether or not a taxpayer's signature on a return demonstrates knowledge of the contents has upheld convictions where the jury was permitted to infer knowledge of the contents of the return from the signature on the return alone. See, e.g., United States v. Olbres, 61 F.3d 967, 971 (1st Cir.1995) (in 1208 prosecution for tax fraud, "jury may permissibly infer that a taxpayer read his return and knew its contents from the bare fact that he signed it"); United States v. Romanow, 509 F.2d 26, 27 (1st Cir.1975) (jury could believe from the uncontested signature of the defendant on return that he had read the form, despite his claim that he merely signed the return that was prepared by bookkeeper).

In another case where plaintiffs alleged that a bank had a duty to inform its depositors of the FBAR requirement, the district court held that the plaintiffs could not show justifiable or reasonable reliance on any advice given (or not given) by the bank in interpreting the instructions on the tax return. See Thomas v. UBS AG, No. 11C4798, 2012 WL 2396866, *5 n. 2 (N.D.Ill. Jun. 21, 2012). “The simple yes-or-no question of Schedule B makes it inconceivable that [a taxpayer] could have misinterpreted this question.” Id. (holding that it was not possible to have reasonably or justifiably relied on any negligent or fraudulent representation concerning the applicability of the FBAR requirement).

B. McBride had knowledge of his obligation to file FBAR reports for the foreign accounts, and failed to do so.

Knowledge of the law, including knowledge of the FBAR requirements, is imputed to McBride. The knowledge of the law regarding the requirement to file an FBAR is sufficient to inform McBride that he had a duty to file a Form TD F 90–22.1 for any foreign account in which he had a financial interest.

McBride signed his federal tax returns for both the tax year 2000 and 2001. FOF. ¶¶ 135, 140, 141. Accordingly, McBride is charged with having reviewed his tax return and having understood that the federal income tax return asked if at any time during the tax year, he held any financial interest in any foreign bank or financial account. FOF, ¶¶ 131, 136. The federal income tax returns contained a plain instruction informing individuals that they have the duty to report their interest in any foreign financial or bank accounts held during the taxable year. See Thomas, 2012 WL 2396866, at *5 n. 2. McBride is therefore charged with having had knowledge of the FBAR requirement to disclose his interest in any foreign financial or bank accounts, as evidenced by his statement at the time he signed the returns, under penalty of perjury, that he read, reviewed, and signed his own federal income tax returns for the tax years 2000 and 2001, as indicated by his signature on the federal income tax returns for both 2000 and 2001. FOF, ¶¶ 131–141. See Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. at 659. As a result, McBride's willfulness is supported by evidence of his false statements on his tax returns for both the 2000 and the 2001 tax years, and his signature, under penalty of perjury, that those statements were complete and accurate. FOF, ¶¶ 131–141.

More importantly, McBride actually read the marketing and promotional materials provided to him by Merrill Scott. FOF, ¶ 142. The marketing and promotional materials informed McBride of the duty imposed by federal law that U.S. taxpayers are required to report their interest in foreign bank and financial accounts. FOF, ¶¶ 21–23 (“As a U.S. taxpayer, the law requires you to report your financial interest in, or signature authority over, any foreign bank account, securities account, or other financial account”). As a result, McBride had actual knowledge of his duty to file an FBAR for any account in which he had a financial interest prior to filing his 2000 and 2001 tax returns. McBride even testified that “the purpose of Merrill Scott” was to avoid disclosure and reporting the existence of interests “because ... if you disclose the accounts on the form, then you pay tax on them, so 1209 it went against what [he] set up Merrill Scott for in the first place.” FOF, ¶ 149.

McBride's claim that he did not know he had a legal duty to file FBARs is not credible. During his interviews with the IRS, McBride admitted to misleading the IRS, lying about several pertinent factual details, withholding information, and failing to disclose documentary evidence. FOF, ¶¶ 155–161. McBride has not only lied to the IRS, but has also made contradictory statements in his sworn responses to interrogatories and his testimony on the stand. Compare FOF, ¶¶ 26, 28 with ¶ 27. Moreover, once it was apparent the IRS was considering imposing the FBAR penalty, McBride has had every incentive to continue to conceal his awareness of the FBAR requirement. As a result, McBride's evasive course of conduct in lying to the IRS and concealing information is circumstantial evidence of McBride's willfulness. See Sturman, 951 F.2d at 1476 (holding that where a taxpayer “concealed his signature authority, his interests in various transactions, and his interest in corporations transferring cash to foreign banks” was conduct adequate to infer willfulness); see also United States v. Dashney, 117 F.3d 1197, 1203 (10th Cir.1997) (“[I]n the structuring context, ‘proof of concealment tends to prove knowledge of illegality.’ ”) (quoting United States v. Marder, 48 F.3d 564, 574 (1st Cir.1995)).

2. McBride's Conduct was Reckless.

A. Recklessness Satisfies the Civil Willfulness Requirement.

Under the wilfulness analysis in the analogous § 6672 context, "A responsible person is reckless if he knew or should have known of a risk that the taxes were not being paid, had a reasonable opportunity to discover and remedy the problem, and yet failed to undertake reasonable efforts to ensure payment." Jenkins v. U.S., 101 Fed. Cl. 122, 134 (Fed.Cl.2011). In the same context, willfulness has been found where "the facts and circumstances of a particular case, taken as a whole, demonstrate" that the taxpayer "knew or should have known that there was a risk [of noncompliance] and failed to take available corrective action," with the result being the violation of the law. Id. (citing Ghandour v. United States, 36 Fed. Cl. 53, 63 (Fed.Cl.1996)); accord Monday v. United States, 421 F.2d 1210 (7th Cir.1970).

In Sorenson v. United States, a case which involved a civil penalty for the willful failure to pay trust fund taxes to the United States, the taxpayer claimed he "mistakenly believed that withholding need not be made on salaries paid out of 'personal' funds." 521 F.2d 325 (9th Cir.1975). However, the Ninth Circuit specifically rejected the argument that this subjective lack of knowledge excused the defendant from having knowledge of the duty imputed to him, stating, "He also had an accountant and an attorney available when he sought advice. If he did not understand his responsibilities it is because he did not ask those who could have informed him; and if he did not ask we are inclined to believe that was because he preferred ignorance." Id. at 329 (concluding that "he acted with a reckless disregard for obvious risks," sufficient to satisfy the willfulness requirement).

[12] An individual's actions may be deemed willful if the individual recklessly ignores the risk that conduct is illegal by failing to investigate whether the conduct is legal. Taxpayers have long been cautioned that they have a responsibility to "investigate claims when they are likely 'too good to be true.' " Pasternak v. Comm'r, 990 F.2d 893, 903 (6th Cir.1993) (quoting McCrary v. Comm'r, 92 T.C. 827, 850 (1989)). "When, as here, a taxpayer is presented with what would appear to be a fabulous opportunity to avoid tax obligations, he should recognize that he proceeds 1210 at his own peril." Neonatology Associates, P.A. v. Comm'r, 299 F.3d 221, 234 (3rd Cir.2002).

B. Willful Blindness Satisfies the Civil Willfulness Requirement.

[13] The same logic applies to those who deliberately avoid learning of their legal duty or the facts that would give rise to their wrongdoing. For an individual to have acted "wilfully," an individual need not have been subjectively aware of the FBAR reporting requirement or else an individual would be able to defeat liability by deliberately avoiding learning of his or her legal duties. "To allow the most clever, inventive, and sophisticated wrongdoers to hide behind a constant and conscious purpose of avoiding knowledge of criminal misconduct would be an injustice in its own right." United States v. Jinwright, 683 F.3d 471, 478 (4th Cir.2012). In order to demonstrate willful blindness, "a defendant must subjectively believe that there is a high probability that a fact exists and the defendant must take deliberate actions to avoid learning of that fact." Global–Tech Appliances, 131 S.Ct. at 2070–2071.

C. McBride's Conduct Was Reckless and Willfully Blind as to the Obvious Risk of Failing to Comply With the FBAR Requirements.

McBride was either in reckless disregard of a known or obvious risk or willfully blind to the possibility of the failure to make the proper disclosures to the IRS as a result of his involvement in the Master Financial Plan.

i. Known or obvious risk.

Because McBride acted in reckless disregard of the known or obvious risks created by his involvement with Merrill Scott actual, subjective knowledge is not required for him to have willfully failed to comply with the FBAR requirements. See Sorenson, 521 F.2d at 329.

As described above, McBride had notice of the potential risks of failing to report one's interest in foreign bank accounts as a result of the correspondence between Taylor and himself, as well as the article attached by Taylor. FOF, ¶¶ 40–42. By the time McBride filed his income tax return for the tax year 2000, McBride was concerned about Merrill Scott, and it was, or should have been, obvious to McBride that Merrill Scott was employing illegal strategies. FOF, ¶¶ 145; see FOF, ¶ 13; see also SEC v. Merrill Scott & Associates, Ltd. et al., Complaint for Temporary Restraining Order, Preliminary and Permanent Injunctions and Legal and Other Equitable Relief (Case No. 2:02–cv–0039, January 15, 2002).

The risk of failing to comply with all applicable reporting requirements with respect to assets hidden through the Master Financial Plan was also obvious. McBride understood that he was engaging Merrill Scott in order to take advantage of a scheme to avoid or defer taxes using means that initially appeared to him to be tax evasion. FOF, ¶¶ 17, 19, 20. McBride was aware that the strategies used by Merrill Scott involved using nominee directors and IBCs that would disguise the true ownership of his assets in the Master Financial Plan. FOF, ¶¶ 64, 66, 69, 70, 74. When Merrill Scott explained the Master Financial Plan, McBride's initial reaction was to say, “This is tax evasion,” demonstrating that the risk of potential noncompliance was obvious. FOF, ¶ 17. McBride even testified that “the purpose of Merrill Scott” was to avoid disclosure and reporting the existence of his financial interests “because ... if you disclose the accounts on the form, then you pay tax on them, so it went against what [he] set up Merrill Scott for in the first place.” FOF, ¶ 149. 1211 And yet, McBride did not attempt to obtain a legal opinion that would identify whether or not the scheme had any consequences with respect to his filing obligations. FOF, ¶¶ 30, 31, 34. The risk of failing to comply with the FBAR requirements was therefore known to McBride and obvious.

In addition, because the federal tax returns contain a plain instruction regarding the disclosure of interests in foreign financial or bank accounts, the risk of failing to disclose an interest in such a foreign account is obvious. The risk of failing to disclose a financial interest in a foreign account is an obvious risk, given that the question on line 7a of Schedule B is available to anyone who looks at a blank Form 1040 individual income tax return. See Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. at 659–60. Moreover, the question is simple and appraises anyone who reads it of an obvious risk of failure to disclose one's interest in foreign financial accounts: “The simple yes-or-no question of Schedule B makes it inconceivable that [a taxpayer] could have misinterpreted this question.” See Thomas, 2012 WL 2396866, at *5 n. 2. As a result, the risk of failing to comply with the FBAR requirements is an obvious risk.

Therefore, even if McBride did not have actual, subjective knowledge of the FBAR requirements when he signed and filed his federal income tax returns for the tax years 2000 and 2001, the risk of failing to comply with the FBAR requirements was known or obvious.

ii. Reckless disregard.

In this case, McBride deliberately engineered a financial scheme, with the help of Merrill Scott, that he believed allowed him to remain unaware of his filing duties. His stated purpose of entering the Master Financial Plan was to make it appear that, for tax purposes, he did not have a financial interest in the foreign accounts that could be subject to any reporting requirements, whether reporting income or FBAR. FOF, ¶ 149.

McBride was aware of the potential risks, which include criminal liability, of engaging in activities resembling the strategies taken pursuant to the Master Financial Plan: placing assets in foreign bank accounts without reporting income or the existence of those accounts. FOF, ¶¶ 40–42. However, McBride did not care about the potential legal ramifications of the Master Financial Plan; he was “gung ho” about the plan. FOF, ¶ 32. He did not attempt to obtain an outside legal opinion to assess the legality of Merrill Scott's strategies. FOF, ¶¶ 30, 144. He now claims he did not even attempt to read the legal opinion provided to him. FOF, ¶ 143. He did not discuss the legality or consequences of the Master Financial Plan with Stayner, his accountant at the time. FOF, ¶ 31. He did not obtain any kind of feedback from his partner's accountant before cutting two of the three checks paid to Merrill Scott in consideration of the Master Financial Plan. FOF, ¶¶ 34, 37, 38.

Moreover, McBride was already suspicious of whether or not Merrill Scott was a legitimate business before he signed or filed his federal income taxes for the tax years 2000 or 2001. FOF, ¶¶ 116–118, 145. However, he did not seek a legal opinion regarding the validity of the Master Financial Plan, or his reporting obligations under it at that time either.

iii. Tax year 2000.

McBride's failure to disclose all of the pertinent and relevant information that must be disclosed constitutes evidence of willfulness. See, e.g., Korecky v. Comm'r, 781 F.2d 1566 (11th Cir.1986) (holding that a taxpayer who failed to disclose all relevant financial statements and affairs to his accountant cannot rely on advice from that accountant as a defense to fraud, which 1212 includes a requirement of showing willfulness).

By virtue of his deliberately engineered belief that he did not have a financial interest in the foreign accounts, McBride did not disclose the existence of those accounts to Stayner, his accountant who prepared his income tax returns for the tax year 2000. FOF, ¶¶ 146–149. McBride was the only source of information regarding his financial affairs from which Stayner based the preparation of his returns, but McBride did not include any of the information regarding the Master Financial Plan or his involvement with Merrill Scott to Stayner. FOF, ¶¶ 145–150. McBride's decision to not disclose his involvement with Merrill Scott to Stayner was deliberate and knowing. FOF, ¶ 149. The fact that McBride did not discuss these significant financial strategies, involving millions of dollars, with his accountant for the tax year 2000 is significant evidence of willfulness or at least recklessness and willful blindness. See Drape, 668 F.2d at 25 (considering it "significant" in determining whether the taxpayer had acted willfully that the taxpayer never discussed his participation in a tax shelter with his accountant for the previous year). Moreover, the fact that Stayner prepared McBride's return does not negate willfulness on McBride's part in failing to furnish Stayner with information concerning all of the relevant facts of his financial affairs. See United States v. Samara, 643 F.2d 701, 703 (10th Cir.1981) ("Defendant's reliance on the advice of his lawyer and accountant does not negate willfulness unless defendant made a complete disclosure of all pertinent facts.") (citing United States v. Jett, 352 F.2d 179, 182 (6th Cir.1965))

As such, McBride's failure to disclose all relevant information to Stayner is evidence of his willfulness, or at least his reckless disregard, of the potential consequences of failing to comply with the FBAR requirements. See Korecky, 781 F.2d at 1569. McBride subjectively believed that there was a high probability that a fact exists—namely, that there were reporting obligations that might be shirked by engaging in Merrill Scott and the Master Financial Plan. McBride further took steps to avoid learning of this fact by failing to disclose his participation in Merrill Scott to his accountant Stayner. As a result, McBride was willfully blind to the possibility that he had failed to comply with the FBAR requirements. In addition, McBride's failure to seek a legal opinion concerning his reporting requirements was in reckless disregard of the known or obvious risk of failure to disclose his interest in a foreign account. Therefore, McBride signed his returns with either full knowledge or reckless disregard of the high probability that they did not include all pertinent and required information.

Even if McBride did not already know of his legal duty to file an FBAR with respect to the foreign accounts, he did act deliberately in engineering a scheme that he believed would not require learning of this duty by reporting his financial affairs related to the Master Financial Plan. McBride's belief, that the purpose of entering into the arrangement with Merrill Scott was to "avoid reporting" the income one received, demonstrates that he had a sufficiently willful mental state as to the reporting of either income or his financial interests in overseas accounts. At the very least, McBride must have been reckless as to the consequences of failing to report or disclose income sources, and therefore reckless as to whether or not his failure to report income would also result in a failure to comply with the FBAR requirements.

Furthermore, even if McBride were not charged with knowledge of the contents of a tax return by virtue of having signed it, 1213 the fact that McBride signed a federal income tax return without having an understanding as to its contents, while simultaneously engaging in transactions with foreign entities designed to avoid or defer tax, constitutes evidence of either willful blindness or recklessness.

iv. Tax Year 2001.

Though McBride asserted repeatedly that he relied on representations by Merrill Scott and its affiliated attorneys that the Master Financial Plan was legal, that reliance cannot negate willfulness. "Taxpayers may not rely on someone with an inherent conflict of interest, or someone with no knowledge concerning that matter upon which the advice is given." Chamberlain v. Comm'r, 66 F.3d 729, 732 (5th Cir.1995) (citations omitted). McBride accepted responsibility for completing his own federal income tax returns, despite offers by Merrill Scott to prepare them for him. FOF, ¶¶ 35, 36.

In 2001, McBride claims to have relied on Taylor to determine whether or not he was subject to any reporting requirements for his interest in the foreign accounts. However, McBride did not call Taylor as a witness, so the court was presented only with conflicting evidence as to Taylor's out of court statements.

[14] In a declaration signed by Taylor on March 3, 2010, Taylor stated that McBride "never informed [him] that [McBride] had any foreign bank accounts." Plaintiff's Ex. 8 at ¶ 6. There was no testimony that Taylor told McBride not to report his interests in the foreign bank accounts. Even if Taylor was fully aware of the Merrill Scott scheme, yet failed to properly advise McBride to report his interests in the foreign accounts, this would not excuse McBride. The taxpayer, not the preparer, has the ultimate responsibility to file his or her return and pay the tax due. Kooyers v. Comm'r, T.C. Memo. 2004–281 (2004). This duty cannot generally be avoided by relying on an agent. Estate of Clause v. Comm'r, 122 T.C. 115, 123–24 (2004); Am. Props., Inc. v. Comm'r, 28 T.C. 1100 (1957), aff'd, 262 F.2d 150 (9th Cir.1958). McBride knew, or at least made himself willfully blind, about the need to report his interests in the foreign accounts when he signed his 2000 return. That Mr. Taylor may have further facilitated McBride's willful blindness a year later by failing to dispense proper advice does not render McBride's failure to report his interest in foreign accounts any less willful.

Moreover, even if the decision not to disclose McBride's interest in the foreign accounts was based on McBride's belief that he did not hold sufficient interest in those accounts to warrant disclosure, that failure to disclose those interests would constitute willfulness. Lefcourt, 125 F.3d at 83 ("Once it is determined, as it was here, that the failure to disclose ... information was done purposefully, rather than inadvertently, it is irrelevant that the filer may have believed he was legally justified in withholding such information. The only question that remains is whether the law required its disclosure."). Because McBride signed his tax returns, he is charged with knowledge of the duty to comply with the FBAR requirements. United States v. Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. at 659. Whether McBride believed Taylor had determined that a disclosure was not required is irrelevant in light of Lefcourt, which states that the only question is whether the decision not to disclose was voluntary, as opposed to accidental. The government does not dispute that McBride's failure to comply with FBAR was the result of his belief that he did not have a reportable financial interest in the foreign accounts. However, because it is irrelevant that McBride "may have believed he was legally justified in withholding such information[,] [t]he only question that remains is whether the law required 1214 its disclosure." Lefcourt, 125 F.3d at 83. Here, the FBAR requirements did require that McBride disclose his interests in the foreign accounts during both the 2000 and the 2001 tax years. As a result, McBride's failure to do so was willful.

g. The amounts of the assessed FBAR penalties are proper.

[15] As it existed prior to an amendment that took effect in 2004, Section 5321(a)(5)(B)(ii) authorized penalties of "(I) an amount (not to exceed $100,000) equal to the balance in the account at the time of the violation; or (II) $25,000." The penalties at issue were assessed against McBride in the amount of $200,000—$100,000 for 2000, and $100,000 for 2001. See FOF ¶¶ 163, 164. These penalties were justified under Section 5321(a)(5)(B)(ii)(I) because the foreign bank accounts each had balances of at least $10,000 in 2000 and 2001 as demonstrated by statements issued for those accounts. FOF, ¶¶ 57–60, 109, 110, 113, 114. Accordingly, the amounts of the penalties were proper. In addition to the amounts assessed, the United States is entitled to interest and penalties pursuant to 31 U.S.C. § 3717.

CONCLUSION AND ORDER

The United States has established, by a preponderance of the evidence, each of the requirements of 31 U.S.C. § 5321 with respect to the assessment against McBride for the tax years 2000 and 2001.

IT IS THEREFORE ORDERED that judgment is ENTERED in favor of the Plaintiff United States of America and against Defendant Jon McBride in the amount of $200,000, plus interest and penalties in the amount of $74,621.92 pursuant to 31 U.S.C. § 3717.

United States District Court, D. Connecticut.

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff,
v.
Richard SIMONELLI, Defendant.

Civil No. 3:06cv653 (JBA).
Sept. 30, 2008.

Synopsis

Background: After defendant, a holder of foreign bank accounts, obtained a general discharge in bankruptcy, the United States filed civil case against defendant to collect penalty, plus interest and penalty interest for failure to file FBAR (report of foreign bank and financial accounts). Government filed motion for summary judgment.

Holding: In resolving an issue of first impression, the District Court, Janet Bond Arterton, J., held that debt for FBAR penalty was nondischargeable.

Motion granted.

RULING ON PLAINTIFF'S MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT [Doc # 20]

JANET BOND ARTERTON, District Judge.

I. Background

This case stands at the intersection of the Currency and Foreign Transactions Reporting Act, also known as the Bank Secrecy Act, 31 U.S.C. § 5311 et seq. ("Bank Secrecy Act"), and 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(7), the provision of the Bankruptcy Codes that governs exceptions to discharge of debts after a debtor-petitioner is adjudged bankrupt. The material facts of the case are straightforward and undisputed, and the issue to be resolved is a legal one, apparently one of first impression.

The Bank Secrecy Act is a statutory and regulatory scheme that seeks to detect and prosecute criminal activity, pursue tax code enforcement, and engage in other "regulatory investigations or proceedings." 31 U.S.C. § 5311. Its focus on reports and records derives from the "increasing use of banks and other institutions as financial intermediaries by persons engaged in criminal activity." Ratzlaf v. United States, 510 U.S. 135, 138, 114 S.Ct. 655, 126 L.Ed.2d 615 (1994). One part of the Act requires persons who have financial interests in, or authority over, banks, securities or other financial accounts in foreign countries to report such information to the federal government. To this end, the Act requires covered entities to report their foreign transactions and accounts in a document called the Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts ("FBAR"). 31 U.S.C. § 5314(a).

During 1999, Defendant Richard Simonelli held three accounts at two banks in the Bahamas, Barclay's Bank and Leadenhall Bank & Trust, which rendered him a 242 covered entity under the Bank Secrecy Act. As such, under 31 U.S.C. § 5314(a) Defendant was obligated to file with the Internal Revenue Service an FBAR disclosing these accounts.[1] Defendant did not file the required FBAR for calendar year 1999, and on April 7, 2004 consented to an assessment and collection of $25,000 under § 5321(a)(5) (2000), plus interest and penalties, for his willful failure to file the FBAR. On May 5, 2004, the Internal Revenue Service ("IRS"), acting as a delegate of the Secretary of the Treasury and pursuant to 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5), made this assessment and demanded payment. (Def.'s Local R. 56(a)1 Stmt. ¶¶ 1–5.) After Defendant failed to make any payment, the Plaintiff United States of America, acting for the Secretary of the Treasury and the IRS, filed this civil case against Defendant in April 2006 to collect the FBAR penalty, plus interest and penalty interest.

After the IRS assessed the FBAR penalty on Defendant but before this suit was filed, Defendant obtained a general discharge in bankruptcy on December 26, 2005 under 11 U.S.C. § 727. In re Simonelli, No. 05–34621 (Bankr.D.Conn.2005). He claims that the FBAR penalty assessed was discharged at that time. In its motion for summary judgment, the government maintains that this FBAR penalty is excepted from bankruptcy discharge by 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(7). (Pl.'s Mot. Summ. J. at 1; Pl.'s Mem.

in Supp. at 7–10.) In response, Defendant argues that his bankruptcy discharge relieves him of his obligation to pay the FBAR penalty under § 523(a)(7)(B) because the FBAR penalty is in actuality a "tax penalty."

In that the parties agree on the material facts recited above and their dispute presents a purely legal question, it is "particularly conducive to disposition by summary judgment." Connecticut ex rel. Blumenthal v. Crotty, 346 F.3d 84, 93 (2d Cir.2003).[2] For the reasons that follow, the Court concludes that the FBAR penalty was not discharged in bankruptcy and Plaintiff's Motion for Summary Judgment will be granted.

II. Statutory Framework

Under the Bankruptcy Code certain kinds of debts are not discharged when a petitioner is adjudged bankrupt. Specifically, 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(7) establishes that a discharge under 11 U.S.C. § 727 does not relieve the debtor-petitioner of "any debt ... to the extent such debt is for a fine, penalty, or forfeiture payable to and for the benefit of a governmental unit, and is not compensation for actual pecuniary loss, other than" two kinds of "tax penalt[ies]." Defendant maintains that the FBAR penalty is one of these kinds of tax penalties and thus was discharged.

As the Supreme Court has explained, "[o]n its face, [§ 523(a)(7)] creates a broad exception [to discharge in bankruptcy] for all penal sanctions, whether they be denominated fines, penalties, or forfeitures. Congress included two qualifying phrases; the fines must be both 'to and for the benefit of a governmental unit,' and 'not compensation for actual pecuniary loss.' " Kelly v. Robinson, 479 U.S. 36, 52, 107 S.Ct. 353, 93 L.Ed.2d 216 (1986). Thus, to be excluded from this broad class of penal sanctions whose discharge is prohibited, a debt must either fall outside that class or 243 must fall within one of three exclusions. A debt for a penal sanction is dischargeable if it: (1) is not "payable to and for the benefit of a governmental unit,"[3] or (2) is "compensation for actual pecuniary loss,"[4] or (3) is one of two kinds of "tax penalt[ies]." The two kinds of "tax penalt[ies]" excluded from the § 523(a)(7) exception to discharge are certain kinds of "tax or customs dut[ies]" listed at § 523(a)(1), and penalties for taxes that are "imposed with respect to a transaction or event that occurred before three years before the date of the filing of the petition." § 523(a)(7)(A), (B). Defendant conceded at oral argument that neither (1) nor (2) would exclude his FBAR penalty, and focuses on (3).

III. Discussion

A. Defendant's Arguments

At oral argument Defendant clarified his position to be that his debt for the FBAR penalty is dischargeable under § 523(a)(7)(B), which discharges any debt for a "tax penalty" that is "imposed with respect to a transaction or event that occurred before three years before the date of the filing of the petition." He conceded that if the FBAR was not a "tax penalty" under this provision, it could not be discharged at all. The government conceded that if it is a "tax penalty," it was incurred with respect to a transaction or occurrence that occurred more than three years prior to the bankruptcy petition and would be dischargeable.

In support of his argument that the FBAR penalty is a tax penalty under § 532(a)(7)(B), Defendant claims that the IRS assessed the $25,000 to which he consented, in lieu of assessing taxes on him because his failure to file the FBAR deprived the IRS of any information about his foreign bank transactions, making it impossible for the IRS to know how much tax to assess on him. In Defendant's view, the IRS uses the FBAR documents to track money in offshore accounts (or transactions occurring outside the United States) of which the IRS otherwise has no knowledge but on which it would otherwise seek to assess taxes. Once the IRS knows, from reviewing the information contained in the FBAR, how much a person owed in taxes if the accounts had been located (or the transaction occurred) in the United States, it assesses that person a tax in this amount. When a person fails to file an FBAR, the IRS cannot track how much she would owe in taxes, and thus instead of collecting these would-be taxes, Defendant reasons, the IRS imposes a civil penalty—the FBAR penalty—as a rough approximation of those taxes it has lacked sufficient information to assess. Defendant thus argues that the FBAR penalty is imposed in lieu of taxes, and thus is, in fact, a tax. Relatedly, Defendant also argues that the FBAR penalty is a tax penalty because the IRS uses it to penalize persons who fail to file FBARs, frustrating the IRS's ability to track, assess and collect their would-be taxes.

Defendant relies on the statute and regulations pursuant to which the IRS assessed the FBAR penalty. At oral argument he pointed to 31 U.S.C. §§ 5311 and 244 5321 and 31 C.F.R. § 103.24. As discussed above, § 5311 lays out the Bank Secrecy Act's multiple purposes and § 5321 authorizes the maximum and minimum assessments of the FBAR penalty, which it denominates a "penalty." [5] In 31 C.F.R. § 103.24 the Secretary of the Treasury delegates to the IRS the authority to assess and collect civil penalties under 31 U.S.C. § 5321, and to "investigate possible civil violations" of the Bank Secrecy Act. These provisions say nothing about the Bank Secrecy Act serving as a mechanism to collect otherwise uncollected taxes, and do not contradict the Bank Secrecy Act's own articulation, at 31 U.S.C. § 5311, of its purposes.

B. Whether Defendant's debt for the FBAR penalty is for a "penalty" or "tax"

A plain text reading of the Bank Secrecy Act is that the FBAR penalty is a "penalty" for purposes of 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(7). The statutory penalty for willful failure to comply with § 5314(a) is a "civil money penalty" whose parameters are outlined in § 5321(a)(5). The Secretary's regulations specify that the penalty for a failure to file an FBAR is "a civil penalty." See 29 C.F.R. §§ 103.56(g) & 103.57 (2004). The Bank Secrecy Act and its implementing regulations thus expressly denominate the penalty imposed on Defendant to be a "civil penalty." [6]

Defendant argues that, notwithstanding the FBAR penalty's statutory denomination as a "penalty," the FBAR penalty is, in essence, actually a tax. (Def.'s Mem. in Supp. Obj. Pl.'s Mot. Summ. J. at 1.) He points to United States v. Sotelo, 436 U.S. 268, 98 S.Ct. 1795, 56 L.Ed.2d 275 (1978), for the proposition that a pecuniary burden imposed on a debtor can be characterized as a "tax" even if the statute under 245 which it is imposed denominates it a "penalty." (Def.'s Mem. in Supp. Obj. Pl.'s Mot. Summ. J. at 4–5.) Beyond that general proposition, however, Sotelo is not applicable here. That case involved a debtor who, before filing for bankruptcy, had collected funds from his employees in the form of withheld taxes, but had failed to pay them over to the IRS. The Internal Revenue Code imposed a "penalty" on him equal to the amount of taxes he failed to pay over. Sotelo, 436 U.S. at 270 n. 1, 98 S.Ct. 1795. The Supreme Court held that the collected funds' "essential character" was taxes because the funds were taxes when the debtor withheld them from his employees, and as a result they were taxes dischargeable under bankruptcy law. Id. at 275, 98 S.Ct. 1795.

In this case, by contrast, the debt to be collected from Defendant was imposed pursuant to a non-tax law (the Bank Secrecy Act), that Defendant seeks to recharacterize as a tax (rather than a non-tax) and its dischargeability involves a different Bankruptcy Code section.

Alternatively, Defendant urges the Court to use the four-part definition of a "tax" from In re Lorber Industries of California, Inc., 675 F.2d 1062 (9th Cir.1982) to determine whether his FBAR penalty is a "tax" rather than a "non-tax charge[ ]." In re Lorber concerned the priority of debts, including "taxes," to be repaid out of a debtor's estate after a petitioner is adjudged bankrupt. See id. at 1063. According to In re Lorber, a tax is characterized as:

> (a) An involuntary pecuniary burden, regardless of name, laid upon the individuals or property;
> (b) Imposed by, or under authority of the legislature;
> (c) For public purposes, including the purposes of defraying expenses of government or undertakings authorized by it;

Id. at 1066. [7]

The FBAR penalty is not an "involuntary pecuniary burden;" the Bank Secrecy Act does not impose any pecuniary burden on covered entities who fulfill their obligations under the Act, only those who violate federal law by failing to file FBARs when the Act requires them to do so. The term "involuntary" connotes an inability of an individual to avoid assessment of a pecuniary burden in carrying out otherwise lawful activities. See Boston Reg'l Med. Ctr., Inc. v. Mass. Div. of Health Care Fin. & Policy (In re Boston Reg'l Med. Ctr., Inc.), 365 F.3d 51, 60 (1st Cir.2004) (rejecting argument that a pecuniary burden was "voluntary" if a covered entity could avoid it by "ceas [ing] all... operations," because under that argument, "the federal income tax would not qualify as a 'tax' because the taxpayer may voluntarily minimize his or her tax liability by earning less income or by taking advantage of deductions"). [8] Here, simply, Defendant 246 could have continued to hold his foreign bank accounts and avoid assessment of the FBAR penalty if he had filed an FBAR.[9] The FBAR penalty is therefore not "involuntary" and thus falls outside In re Lorber's definition of "tax."[10]

Finally, Defendant argues that § 5321(a)(5) (2000) allows the government to collect "taxes in situations where assessment based on actual taxes due may be impossible to determine as a result of the barriers created by the nature of the accounts." (Def.'s Mem. in Supp. Obj. Pl.'s Mot. Summ. J. at 6.) In Defendant's view, the "tax" collected by the IRS under the Bank Secrecy Act could equal 100 percent of the value of the transaction or account, and would be collectible only where the person failed to file an informational document with the government. Although Defendant argues that the negotiated FBAR penalty to which he stipulated incorporated his potential tax liabilities, he provides no authority or evidence in support of this assertion.

For the reasons stated above, Defendant's attempt to characterize the Bank Secrecy Act as "a mechanism to collect [covered entities'] taxes due" (Def.'s Mem. in Supp. Obj. Pl.'s Mot. Summ. J. at 6) is unavailing. The IRS's assessment of the FBAR penalty is not, as Defendant argues, "government collecting, for lack of better terminology, back taxes." (Id. at 4.) Given the text, framework, and history of the Bank Secrecy Act, as well as the plain meanings of the terms "tax" and "penalty" and the operation of § 5321(a)(5), the "better terminology" to describe the FBAR penalty is as a "civil money penalty."

C. The "tax penalty" exclusion from § 523(a)(7)'s exceptions to discharge.

A debt may be discharged if the debt is for one of two kinds of "tax penalt [ies]." Defendant argues that his debt is dischargeable under this exclusion. In order to be a tax penalty, the FBAR penalty would have to be linked in some way to an underlying tax. For Defendant's argument to have any viability, the FBAR itself would have to be a tax. The FBAR is a document, not a tax: indeed, the document specifically instructs filers: "Do NOT file with your Federal Tax Return." (Department of the Treasury Form TD F 90–22.1 (Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts).) The Act requires covered entities to file the FBAR with the government, but not to remit money or property. 247 Neither the FBAR nor the Bank Secrecy Act impose any pecuniary burden on covered entities who fulfill their obligations under the Act. Because there is no tax underlying the FBAR penalty, the FBAR penalty cannot be considered a "tax penalty." Because the Court concludes that the FBAR penalty is not a "tax penalty,"[11] the fact that more than three years have elapsed since the "transaction or occurrence" before the bankruptcy petition filing, is of no import.

IV. Conclusion

Defendant's debt for the FBAR penalty is for a "penalty" within the meaning of 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(7), and therefore falls within that section's broad class of debts excepted from discharge. Defendant's debt does not fall within any of the three exclusions to the § 523(a)(7) class of excepted debts. Therefore, § 523(a)(7) bars discharge of Defendant's debt stemming from the May 2004 assessment of the FBAR penalty.

Accordingly, Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment [Doc. # 20] is GRANTED. The Clerk is directed to close this case and enter Judgment in favor of Plaintiff in the amount of $25,000.00, plus interest pursuant to 31 U.S.C. §§ 3717(a)(1), (e)(2) and (f). To the extent that Defendant wishes to pursue the issue raised at oral argument of whether the accrual of interest was stayed during the pendency of the automatic bankruptcy stay, he may do so in a Motion for Modification of Judgment setting forth the legal basis for such a stay. Such motion shall be filed within 30 days.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

Footnotes

[1] Specifically, 31 U.S.C. § 5314(a) obligates entities to file an FBAR with the IRS if they "make[ ] a transaction or maintain[ ] a relation for any person with a foreign financial agency."

2 The well-known summary judgment standard is familiar to the Court and will be applied without recitation in detail. See, e.g., Milardo v. City of Middletown, 528 F.Supp.2d 41, 44–45 (D.Conn.2007).

3 A debt is dischargeable even if it is a “fine, penalty or forfeiture” if it is not “payable to and for the benefit of a governmental unit.” Because the FBAR penalty is payable to the IRS and because it is, by virtue of the fact that it incentivizes compliance with the Act, for the benefit of the federal government, this exclusion is not applicable here.

4 A debt is dischargeable if it is “compensation for actual pecuniary loss.” Although Defendant argues that the IRS assessed the FBAR penalty on him in lieu of collecting taxes on his offshore accounts, he does not claim that his debt is “compensation for actual pecuniary loss.”

5 When Defendant failed to file the FBAR, he violated 31 U.S.C. § 5314(a). Under the version of 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5) in effect at the time Defendant was penalized, the statute authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to “impose a civil money penalty on any person who willfully violates or any person willfully causing any violation of any provision of section 5314.” For failures to file an FBAR, the value of that “civil money penalty” was required to be no more than “the greater of (I) an amount (not to exceed $100,000) equal to the balance in the account at the time of the violation; or (II) $25,000.” 31 U.S.C. §§ 5321(a)(5)(A), (B)(ii) (2000). The Secretary's regulations specify that the penalty for a failure to file an FBAR is a “civil penalty.” See 29 C.F.R. §§ 103.56(g) (2004) (authorizing the IRS “to assess and collect civil penalties under 31 U.S.C. [§] 5321 ... [and] investigate possible civil violations of these provisions”); 103.57(g)(2) (2004) (imposing, for violations of 31 U.S.C. § 5314 and 31 C.F.R. § 103.24, “a civil penalty” within the parameters articulated in 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5) (2000)).

After the IRS assessed the FBAR penalty on Defendant in May 2004, Congress amended § 5321(a)(5), but the provision still denominates the FBAR penalty a “penalty.” See American Jobs Creation Act of 2004, Pub.L. 108–357, § 821(a), 118 Stat. 1418, 1586 (Oct. 22, 2004). The current version of the provision authorizes penalties for willful violations of § 5314 up to the greater of (1) half the value of the account or transaction that should have been reported, or (2) $100,000. 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5) (2006).

6 The FBAR penalty also fits the definition of a “penalty” in Black's Law Dictionary. A penalty is “[p]unishment imposed on a wrongdoer, usu[ally] in the form of imprisonment or fine; esp[ecially], a sum of money exacted as a punishment for either a wrong to the state or a civil wrong (as distinguished from compensation for the injured party's loss).” BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY 1168 (8th ed.2004). Defendant's failure to file an FBAR was a wrong to the state; while Defendant's omission violated 31 U.S.C. § 5314, it resulted in no injured private party and no pecuniary harm, either to a private party or to the state. The FBAR penalty is assessed on Defendant as punishment, not as any sort of compensation for any pecuniary harm.

7 The Ninth Circuit's decision in In re Lorber was premised on a reading of the now-superseded Bankruptcy Act of 1898, as amended. Nonetheless, the Second Circuit adopted the In re Lorber test for purposes of the analogous provision of the current Bankruptcy Code of 1978, as amended, governing the priority of debts to be repaid out of a bankrupt's estate. See LTV Steel Co. v. Shalala (In re Chateaugay Corp.), 53 F.3d 478, 498 (2d Cir.1995).

8 Under MASS. GEN. LAWS ch. 118G, § 18 (1996), the law at issue in Boston Reg'l Med. Ctr., Inc., all covered hospitals contributed to or received credits from a Massachusetts Uncompensated Care Pool based on how much health care they provided to indigent patients. Boston Reg'l Med. Ctr., Inc., 365 F.3d at 54. Covered hospitals which failed to contribute to or credit the Uncompensated Care Pool would lose their licenses. Id. at 54 n. 3. If a hospital wanted to engage in its otherwise lawful activity of providing health care, it was obligated to pay into or credit the Uncompensated Care Pool. The law thus imposed an involuntary pecuniary burden on all covered entities.

9 Defendant argues that the FBAR penalty assessment is involuntary under In re Lorber because “a tax amount would have been imputed upon him whether he voluntary [sic] agreed to the negotiated amount due or not.” (Def.'s Mem. in Supp. Obj. Pl.'s Mot. Summ. J. at 5.) Defendant therefore tautologically assumes the FBAR is a tax, for purposes of arguing that it is a tax.

10 The FBAR penalty is also not a tax under the even broader definition of the term in Black's Law Dictionary, which defines “tax” as “[a] monetary charge imposed by the government on persons, entities, transactions, or property to yield public revenue.” BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY 1496 (8th ed.2004). Neither the Bank Secrecy Act generally, nor the penalty associated with violations of 31 U.S.C. § 5314(a) specifically, is designed “to yield public revenue.” The Act requires covered entities to file documents listing their foreign transactions and accounts.; it does not contemplate any mechanism for “yield[ing] public revenue” except in the event that a covered entity, like Defendant, fails to comply with its reporting requirements. The FBAR penalty better fits the Black's Law Dictionary definition of “penalty.” See supra note 6.

11 The Court's conclusion that the penalty at issue in this case is a civil penalty, and not a tax, is bolstered by the fact that the statutory and regulatory framework governing FBARs bears none of the hallmarks of a “tax.” Indeed, different legal presumptions apply to IRS assessments in tax assessment cases than in FBAR violation cases. Compare United States v. Fior D'Italia, 536 U.S. 238, 242, 122 S.Ct. 2117, 153 L.Ed.2d 280 (2002) ("It is well established in the tax law that an assessment is entitled to a legal presumption of correctness"), with United States v. Dollar Bank Money Market Account, 980 F.2d 233, 238 n. 2 (3d Cir.1992) ("the government has the burden [of proof regarding means rea]" in both civil and criminal FBAR violation cases).

I. INTRODUCTION

1 This matter comes before the court on the Government's motion for summary judgment. Although the Government requested oral argument, Plaintiff James Moore did not, and the court finds this case suitable for partial disposition based on the material already before it. For the reasons stated below, the court GRANTS the Government's motion in part and DENIES it in part. Dkt. # 32. Because the court is aware of no factual disputes that would necessitate a trial, the court VACATES the trial date and all other pending pretrial deadlines. Part IV of this order includes instructions to the parties to supplement the record so that the court may conduct judicial review in accordance with § 706(2) of the Administrative Procedure Act ("APA").

II. BACKGROUND

Among the responsibilities of the Internal Revenue Service is the enforcement of a portion of the Bank Secrecy Act of 1970 requiring reports from people within the United States who "make[ ] a transaction or maintain a relation for any person with a foreign financial agency." 31 U.S.C. § 5314(a). That statute has led to regulations that require a person subject to the statute in any calendar year (essentially any person residing in the United States with foreign accounts totaling more than $550,000) to file a report with the IRS by June 30 of the following year. 31 C.F.R. § 103.24(a), § 103.27(c).[1] The IRS has prescribed form TD F 90–22.1 ("Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Account") for that task. The IRS refers to this yearly report as an "FBAR." The IRS can impose a civil penalty on a person who fails to file FBARs. 31 U.S.C. § 5321(5)(A). For non-willful violations, the penalty cannot exceed $10,000. 31 U.S.C. § 5321(5)(B)(i).

Mr. Moore filed this lawsuit to contest the IRS's decision to assess the maximum penalty of $10,000 against him four times, once for each year from 2005 through 2008.

A. Mr. Moore Has Had a Foreign Account Since 1989, But He Filed No FBARs Until 2010.

There is no dispute that for nearly two decades, Mr. Moore maintained a foreign account subject to FBAR requirements. Its predecessor was an account Mr. Moore opened at a Bahamian bank in about 1989 when he moved to The Bahamas. He opened that account in the name of a Bahamian corporation that he created (and solely controlled) for the purpose of investing in a resort in The Bahamas. He soon transferred the balance to an "investment account" with a Bahamian branch of a Swiss bank, again holding the account in the name of his Bahamian corporation. Mr. Moore moved back to the United States in 1990, but the account remained in The Bahamas. In about 2003, when the Swiss bank ceased its Bahamian operations, the account migrated to Switzerland, where it has remained ever since. At all relevant times, the balance in the account exceeded $300,000, but was less than $550,000.

There is also no dispute that Mr. Moore filed no FBARs until at least 2009. It was around that time that he became aware of an effort by the IRS to encourage people who had not been reporting foreign accounts to come forward. See United States v. Simon, 727 F.3d 682, 686 (7th Cir.2013) (describing IRS's 2009 Offshore Voluntary Disclosure Program). Through his counsel, he approached the IRS. Ultimately, he amended six years of tax returns (from 2003 through 2008) to report income for each of those years from his foreign account. Mr. Moore and the Government appear to agree that those amendments increased the taxes he owed by about $18,000. Even assuming there is any dispute over Mr. Moore's tax liabilities, that dispute is not before the court. In addition to amending his tax returns, Mr. Moore in 2010 filed late FBARs for 2003 through 2008, as well as his first timely-filed FBAR, for 2009.

B. The IRS Investigates, Proposes a $40,000 Penalty, Then Assesses That Penalty.

2 At some point, the IRS requested an interview with Mr. Moore. He agreed, and IRS Agent Shu Lin Tjoa interviewed him, with his counsel present, by telephone in October 2011. Although Mr. Moore contends that he was not aware that the IRS was considering an FBAR penalty, he admits that he knew that the IRS intended to "enforce something in regards to me." Moore Depo. at 146–47. The interview took no more than five minutes. Id. at 147.

Agent Tjoa prepared an FBAR Penalty Summary Memo recommending that the IRS impose a penalty of $10,000 for each of the four years from 2005 to 2008. Mr. Moore had no access to the Summary Memo until he received it in connection with this lawsuit. The Summary Memo is an eight-page, relatively detailed account of Agent Tjoa's reasons for recommending a $40,000 penalty.

On December 13, 2011, the IRS sent Mr. Moore a letter stating that it was "proposing a penalty" totaling $40,000. In contrast to the Summary Memo, the letter provided almost no information about the basis for that penalty. It identified the applicable portions of the Bank Secrecy Act and the years in question. It did not explain why the IRS had selected the maximum penalty. The letter demanded that Mr. Moore either accept the penalty or "request a conference with our Appeals Office" by no later than January 28, 2012. It also explained that if Mr. Moore did nothing by January 28, 2012, it would "assess the penalty and begin collection procedures."

The IRS ignored the terms of its own letter and assessed a $10,000 penalty against Mr. Moore on January 23, 2012. That penalty covered only 2005. Agent Daisy Batman declares that the IRS imposed that penalty after Mr. Moore refused to agree to an extension of the applicable statute of limitations. No one explains why the IRS did not honor its agreement to delay assessment of the penalty pending the "appeal" deadline. The court assumes, because the parties do not assert otherwise, that the six-year limitations period for assessing an FBAR civil penalty for 2005 would have run on July 1, 2012, six years after the June 30, 2006 deadline for submitting an FBAR for 2005. 31 U.S.C. § 5321(b)(1) ("The Secretary of the Treasury may assess a civil penalty ... at any time before the end of the 6–year period beginning on the date of the transaction with respect to which the penalty is assessed."). In any event, the IRS does not argue that a statute of limitations would have expired between its assessment of a $10,000 penalty on January 23, 2012 and the January 28, 2012 response deadline it gave to Mr. Moore.

Mr. Moore requested an "appeal"[2] of the proposed assessment. Although the IRS had already assessed the 2005 penalty, it is apparent that it permitted Mr. Moore to contest that assessment along with his request that it not impose penalties for 2006 through 2008. In both his January 2012 request for an appeal and his December 2012 letter in support of the appeal, Mr. Moore's counsel provided detailed argument in support of his request that the IRS either assess no penalty or assess a reduced penalty. Among other things, counsel insisted that Mr. Moore satisfied the requirements of 31 U.S.C. § 5321(b)(5)(B)(ii)(I), which prohibits the imposition of a penalty for an FBAR violation "due to reasonable cause...." The IRS's response, in a December 18, 2012 letter, was terse:

3 Dear Taxpayer:

> I have completed my review of your request to adjust the penalty(s) assessed against you. Based on the facts presented, including additional information you submitted, I find that no basis for abatement of the penalty(s) is warranted within the protective framework of reasonable cause. Your case is now closed in Appeals.

The remainder of the letter provided payment information and a statement that Mr. Moore could sue in federal court, along with an invitation to participate in a "Appeals customer satisfaction survey." The letter said nothing about when the IRS would assess the penalties. It assessed $10,000 penalties for 2006, 2007, and 2008 on January 24, 2013.

Mr. Moore filed this suit in late 2013. His complaint contended that the IRS violated the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause, the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause, and the Eighth Amendment's Excessive Fines Clause. He also contended that the IRS violated the APA, and that the Bank Secrecy Act unlawfully delegated judicial power to the IRS. He asked for a refund of $10,500 he paid toward the 2005 penalty, and for the court to set aside the remaining $30,000 in penalties.

The Government has moved for summary judgment against all of Mr. Moore's claims, as well as on its counterclaims seeking to reduce the 2006, 2007 and 2008 penalties to judgment. In opposing that motion, he did not mention his equal protection claim or his claim of unlawfully delegated judicial authority. The court deems those claims abandoned.

The court reaches the following conclusions as to the Government's request for summary judgment on Mr. Moore's remaining claims:

1) As a matter of law, Mr. Moore committed non-willful violations of the Bank Secrecy Act and its subject to civil penalties in accordance with the Act.

2) The IRS has failed to provide a record from which the court can determine, via the judicial review provisions at § 706(2) of the APA, if it acted arbitrarily or capriciously in determining the amount of the penalties it assessed.

4) The IRS's assessment of penalties did not violate the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment or the Eighth Amendment's Excessive Fines Clause.

This order concludes with instructions to the parties to address the impact of both the IRS's early assessment of the 2005 penalty and the lack of an administrative record that provides an adequate basis for the assessment of all four penalties.

III. ANALYSIS

On a motion for summary judgment, the court must draw all inferences from the admissible evidence in the light most favorable to the non-moving party. Addisu v. Fred Meyer, Inc., 198 F.3d 1130, 1134 (9th Cir.2000). Summary judgment is appropriate where there is no genuine issue of material fact and the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Fed.R.Civ.P. 56(a). The moving party must initially show the absence of a genuine issue of material fact. Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 323, 106 S.Ct. 2548, 91 L.Ed.2d 265 (1986). The opposing party must then show a genuine issue of fact for trial. Matsushita Elect. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 586, 106 S.Ct. 1348, 89 L.Ed.2d 538 (1986). The opposing party must present probative evidence to support its claim or defense. Intel Corp. v. Hartford Accident & Indem. Co., 952 F.2d 1551, 1558 (9th Cir.1991). The court defers to neither party in resolving purely legal questions. See Bendixen v. Standard Ins. Co., 185 F.3d 939, 942 (9th Cir.1999).

A. On De Novo Review, the Court Concludes that Mr. Moore Violated the Law By Not Filing FBARs and is Subject to a Civil Penalty.

4 No binding case law provides standards for judicial review of FBAR civil penalty assessments. The Government's proposal is as follows: the court should determine de novo whether Mr. Moore is subject to an FBAR penalty, but should review the IRS's determination of the amount of that penalty only for abuse of discretion.[3] The court will adopt the first part of that proposal. It does so only because Mr. Moore has not objected to de novo review and because no standard of review is more favorable to him. The court therefore declines to decide whether a court must conduct de novo review of the IRS's assessment of a civil FBAR penalty.

1. “Reasonable Cause” is an Escape Hatch for FBAR Penalty Liability.

The Bank Secrecy Act permits the assessment of penalties for violation of the reporting requirements in 31 U.S.C. § 5314, but mandates that “[n]o penalty shall be imposed” if “such violation was due to reasonable cause” and “the amount of the transaction or balance in the account at the time of the transaction was properly reported.” 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(B)(ii). The requirement regarding proper reporting of the transaction or balance is not at issue in this case. Mr. Moore concedes that he violated the reporting requirements, but contends that the Government cannot penalize him for that violation because he had “reasonable cause.”

“Reasonable cause” is nowhere defined in the Bank Secrecy Act or in regulations interpreting it. That phrase, however, appears repeatedly in statutes governing the IRS's tax assessment role. For example, 26 U.S.C. § 6664(c)(1) prohibits penalties for any portion of an underpayment of tax "if it is shown that there was reasonable cause for such portion and that the taxpayer acted in good faith with respect to such portion." Another statute, applicable to foreign trusts, prohibits penalties for "any failure which is shown to be due to reasonable cause and not due to willful neglect." 26 U.S.C. § 6677(d). And, in the statute that the Government identifies as an analogue, Congress prohibited monthly penalties for failing to file tax returns where "such failure is due to reasonable cause and not due to willful neglect...." 26 U.S.C. § 6651(a)(1). In 1985, the Supreme Court noted that the meaning of the terms "reasonable cause" and "willful neglect" "ha[d] become clear over the near–70 years of their presence in the statutes." United States v. Boyle, 469 U.S. 241, 245, 105 S.Ct. 687, 83 L.Ed.2d 622 (1985). It also noted that regulations defined "reasonable cause" for purposes of § 6651(a)(1). Id. ("[T]he relevant Treasury Regulation calls on the taxpayer to demonstrate that he exercised 'ordinary business care and prudence' but nevertheless was 'unable to file the return within the prescribed time.' ").

There is no reason to think that Congress intended the meaning of "reasonable cause" in the Bank Secrecy Act to differ from the meaning ascribed to it in tax statutes. As with the tax statutes, Congress entrusted enforcement of the Bank Secrecy Act to the Treasury Department. If it intended Treasury to interpret "reasonable cause" differently in the newer statute, it left no clues to which any party has pointed. The court thus takes guidance from tax statutes and authority interpreting them, and concludes that a person has "reasonable cause" for an FBAR violation when he committed that violation despite an exercise of ordinary business care and prudence.

2. Mr. Moore Ignored Notice of His Duty to Report His Foreign Account.

5 The court now examines the evidence relevant to whether Mr. Moore had reasonable cause for his FBAR violations.

When the Government posed an interrogatory to Mr. Moore asking for all facts supporting his assertion of "reasonable cause," he responded as follows:

> [I] established a Bahamian Corporation, Dornlas Hardick Ltd[.,] through Graham Thompson Ltd. and capitalized it with $300,000 previously taxed in the United States. [I] believed the establishment of a legal Bahamian Corporation was sufficient to isolate the corporate assets from [my] personal assets, and that [I] was not required to disclose it on [my] personal tax return.

Gov't Interrog. No. 1. At his deposition, however, Mr. Moore established that he had no objective basis for that belief. Although he contended that in about 1990 he asked Graham Thompson, the Bahamian law firm who assisted him in incorporating, about the "tax implications of running a business in the Bahamas and staying an American citizen," Moore Depo. at 28, he points to no advice he received that made him believe he was free from any obligation to report the account to authorities in the United States. He admitted that Graham Thompson gave him no advice as to whether it was necessary to report to United States authorities any account held by his corporation. Moore Depo. at 55–56. Indeed, he admitted that Graham Thompson gave him no advice about United States law. Moore Depo. at 67, 150–51. Although he steadfastly asserts that he believed that his corporation shielded him from any responsibility to report the account to the Government, he admitted that since at least 2003, he has no idea if his corporate entity still exists. Moore Depo. at 113–14. When Mr. Moore's account migrated to Switzerland, he met with bank representatives, but again declined to ask about his obligation to report the account to United States authorities. Moore Depo. at 38, 45.

Mr. Moore's tax materials show that he clung to his belief that he did not have to report the account even in the face of plain notice that he was mistaken. Prior to the 2006 tax year, Mr. Moore prepared his own income tax returns. On his Form 1040 for the 2003 tax year, he filled out Schedule B, relating to interest and dividends. Schedule B, which is a single page, contains a section prominently labeled "Foreign Accounts and Trusts." That section contains this statement: "You must complete this part if you (a) had over $1,500 of taxable interest or ordinary dividends; or (b) had a foreign account; or (c) received a distribution from, or were a grantor of, or a transferor to, a foreign trust." The section contained just two questions, one of which was as follows:

> At any time during 2003, did you have an interest in or a signature or other authority over a financial account in a foreign country, such as a bank account, securities account, or other financial account? See page B–2 for exceptions and filing requirements for form TD F 90–22.1.

6 Mr. Moore checked neither "Yes" nor "No" in response. His signature on his Form 1040 is adjacent to a statement that his signature was a declaration, under penalty of perjury, that he had "examined this return and accompanying schedules and statements, and to the best of my knowledge and belief, they are true, correct, and complete."

Mr. Moore does not deny that he noticed the portion of Schedule B devoted to foreign accounts; he claims that he believed that because his foreign account was held in the name of his Bahamian corporation, that portion did not apply to him. Moore Depo. at 118–19. Had he at least read page B–2 of the instructions (as the question directed him), he would have discovered that he should answer "Yes" to the question on Schedule B if he "own[ed] more than 50% of the stock in any corporation that owns one or more foreign bank accounts" or if he "had an interest in or signature or other authority over a financial account in a foreign country (such as a bank account, securities account, or other financial account)." Mr. Moore admitted that he understood, at a minimum, that he owned more than 50% of the stock of his Bahamian corporation. Moore Depo. at 123.

Although Mr. Moore did not file schedule B in subsequent years that he prepared his own taxes; his 2003 tax return does not stand alone as evidence of Mr. Moore's refusal to acknowledge his control over his foreign bank account. Beginning in the 2006 tax year, he used a tax preparer for his returns. For each of those years, the tax preparer sent Mr. Moore a "tax organizer"—a questionnaire designed to assess Mr. Moore's tax needs. Mr. Moore completed the questionnaire in its entirety. The questionnaire for the 2006 tax year is not in the record. In the questionnaire for the 2007 tax year, in response to a question asking if he had "an interest in or signature or other authority over a financial account in a foreign country, such as a bank account, securities account, or other financial account," he checked "No." He did so again the following year when he filled out the questionnaire for his 2008 tax return. There is no evidence that Mr. Moore disclosed the existence of his foreign account to his tax preparer.

3. Viewing the Evidence in the Light Most Favorable to Mr. Moore, He Did Not Have Reasonable Cause for His FBAR Violations.

Mr. Moore did not, as a matter of law, have reasonable cause for his failure to file FBARs prior to 2009. Clinging to advice given in 1989 or 1990 that he admits had nothing to do with United States law is not an exercise of ordinary business care or prudence. Even if that were not the case, however, no fact finder could conclude that ignoring the question on Schedule B of his 2003 tax return was an exercise of ordinary business care or prudence. Again, that question asked if he had "signature or other authority over a financial account in a foreign country...." That phrase is not difficult to understand. As a matter of law, it placed Mr. Moore at least on notice that he should inquire further as to whether his corporation's foreign account was subject to disclosure. His decision to avoid further inquiry is not an exercise of ordinary business care or prudence. He admits that if he had done even the most minimal inquiry (looking on page B–2 of the instructions for form 1040, as his tax form explicitly directed him), he would have learned unequivocally that he needed to report his foreign account. Mr. Moore's "Williams I"). The Act permits steeper civil penalties for willful violations of FBAR requirements. 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(C). The appellate court in Williams reversed the conclusion that the defendant had not acted willfully, finding that the district court had "clearly erred." Williams II, 489 Fed. Appx. At 660. Among the evidence the court relied on was that the defendant had testified that he paid no attention to the same question on Schedule B of Form 1040 that Mr. Moore did not answer. Id. at 656–57, 659. It noted that a taxpayer is charged with knowledge of the contents of his tax return, meaning that a failure to read portions of a tax return was tantamount to a "conscious effort to avoid learning about reporting requirements...." Id . at 659 (quoting United States v. Sturman, 951 F.2d 1466, 1476 (6th Cir.1991)); see also United States v. Crooks, 804 F.2d 1441, 1448 (9th Cir.1986) (noting that taxpayer's "signature on [his tax] return is sufficient to establish knowledge once it has been shown that the return was false").

7 Much like Mr. Moore, the defendant in Williams had answered "no" to a "tax organizer" question asking whether he had signatory authority over a foreign account. Id. at 656. The court found that to be evidence of conduct meant to mislead. Williams II, 489 Fed. Appx. at 659. Indeed, the only evidence materially distinguishing the defendant in Williams II from Mr. Moore is that defendant pleaded guilty to criminal tax evasion for failing to report the income from the foreign account he had not disclosed. Id. at 657, 660. That is an important distinction, to be sure, but it does not change the other lessons of Williams II. Evidence that a taxpayer ignored relevant questions on Schedule B and in tax organizers is evidence of willful conduct. In this court's view, it suffices as a matter of law to demonstrate a lesser FBAR violation—one made without "reasonable cause."

B. Section 706 of the APA Guides the Court's Review of the IRS's Assessment of Penalties, Including the Amount of the Penalties .

Having decided that Mr. Moore is subject to an FBAR penalty, what remains of his suit is his challenge to the IRS's method of assessing the penalty and his challenge to the amount of that penalty. Again, no binding case law addresses the standard that applies to judicial review of either issue in the context of FBAR penalties. As the court has mentioned, the Government suggests that the court review the amount of the penalty only for abuse of discretion. The Government does not mention a standard of review as to the methods it employed to assess Mr. Moore's penalty. The APA, however, provides a comprehensive guide to the court's review of the IRS's penalty assessments.

1. Parts (A)-(D) of § 702 of the APA Govern Judicial Review in this Case.

The APA makes agency action presumptively subject to judicial review. 5 U.S.C. § 702 ("A person ... adversely affected or aggrieved by agency action within the meaning of a relevant statute, is entitled to judicial review thereof."). The only exceptions are where a statute precludes judicial review or the "agency action is committed to agency discretion by law." 5 U.S.C. § 701(a). Both are narrow exceptions, Citizens to Preserve Overton Park, Inc. v. Volpe, 401 U.S. 402, 410, 91 S.Ct. 814, 28 L.Ed.2d 136 (1971), and no one argues that the exceptions apply in this case.

Although the APA creates more than one standard of review, all agency action is subject to review to determine if it is "arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with the law." 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(A); Volpe, 401 U.S. at 413–14. Similarly, all agency action must meet applicable statutory, procedural, and constitutional requirements. 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(B)-(D); Volpe, 401 U.S. at 414. In certain circumstances, a court reviews an agency action for "substantial evidence," 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(E), but no one argues that standard applies here.[4] Volpe, 401 U.S. at 414 ("Review under the substantial-evidence test is authorized only when the agency action is [rulemaking] or when the agency action is based on a public adjudicatory hearing."). Finally, a court may conduct a de novo trial of facts underlying an agency action, 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(F), but that standard of review applies only where the agency's adjudicative factfinding procedures are inadequate. Volpe, 401 U.S. at 415. Here, the court finds no evidence of inadequate factfinding procedures. The IRS interviewed Mr. Moore, gave him plain notice of the penalty he was facing, permitted him to contest that penalty before assessing it (except as to the 2005 penalty), and permitted him to present his arguments against the penalty both in a written statement and in a telephone interview. Taking guidance from other cases finding similar factfinding procedures adequate, the court concludes that the IRS's factfinding was adequate for purposes of avoiding trial de novo via § 706(2)(F) of the APA. See Pac. Architects & Eng'rs, Inc. v. Dep't of State, 906 F.2d 1345, 1348 (9th Cir.1990); see also Acumenics Research & Tech. v. Dep't of Justice, 843 F.2d 800, 805 (4th Cir.1988) (cited favorably in Pac. Architects).

2. No Statute Other than the APA Dictated the Procedures for the IRS to Use to Assess Mr. Moore's Penalties.

8 The court will consider the IRS's procedures for assessing Mr. Moore's penalties again when it discusses his claim that those procedures violated the Due Process Clause. For now, the court notes that no codified procedures bind the IRS when it assesses FBAR penalties. In contrast to well-worn procedures for assessing tax deficiencies, a person searching the Code of Federal Regulations or United States Code for information on the procedure for FBAR penalty assessment will come up nearly empty-handed. See Williams. v. Comm'r, 131 T.C. 54, 57–58, 2008 WL 4443057 (2008) (noting that because FBAR penalties are beyond the scope of the deficiency procedures of 26 U.S.C. §§ 6212–14, United States Tax Court has no jurisdiction to review their assessment). The Bank Secrecy Act suggests that penalties must first be "assess [ed]," 31 U.S.C. § 5321(b)(1), and provides that the Government may "commence a civil action to recover a civil penalty assessed" within two years of the assessment," 31 U.S.C. § 5321(b)(2). Beyond that, statutes and regulations are silent as to what procedure is necessary. In circumstances like these, agencies have considerable latitude to fashion their own procedures,[5] subject only to constitutional limits. Vermont Yankee Nuclear Power Corp. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 435 U.S. 519, 543–44, 98 S.Ct. 1197, 55 L.Ed.2d 460 (1978).

In circumstances where no other law governs agency procedure, only the requirements of the Due Process Clause and § 555 of the APA apply. Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. v. LTV Corp., 496 U.S. 633, 654–55, 110 S.Ct. 2668, 110 L.Ed.2d 579 (1990). Section 555 of the APA provides minimal procedural guarantees for "informal adjudication," a phrase that covers agency adjudication not subject to § 554, § 556 and § 557 of the APA. See id.; see also United States v. Iron Mountain Mines, 987 F.Supp.2d 1250, 1259 (E.D.Cal.1997) ("Informal adjudication ... is a 'residual category including all agency actions that are not rulemaking and that need not be conducted through 'on the record' hearings.' ") (quoting Izaak Walton League v. Marsh, 655 F.2d 346, 361 n. 37 (D.C.Cir.1981)).

As to Mr. Moore, the only portion of § 555 that is relevant is the requirement that an agency must give "[p]rompt notice ... of the denial in whole or in part of a written application, petition, or other request ... made in connection with any agency proceeding." 5 U.S.C. § 555(e). That portion also requires that, "[e]xcept in affirming a prior denial or when the denial is self-explanatory, the notice shall be accompanied by a brief statement of the grounds for denial." Id. The court has already observed that the IRS's December 2012 statement denying Mr. Moore's "appeal" of its proposed penalties was a very brief statement. For reasons the court now discusses, it concludes that it was not a "brief statement" that satisfied § 555(e).

3. The Court Cannot, On the Record Before It, Determine if the IRS Acted Arbitrarily, Capriciously or Abused Its Discretion in Assessing the Penalties.

9 To determine if an agency acted arbitrarily or capriciously or in abuse of its discretion, the court conducts a "thorough, probing, in-depth review." Volpe, 401 U.S. at 415. The court presumes that the agency acted correctly, and is not permitted to substitute its judgment for the agency's. Id. at 415, 417. The court must nonetheless be certain that the agency acted within the scope of its authority, and its must determine whether the "decision was based on a consideration of relevant factors and whether there has been a clear error of judgment." Id. at 415–16; see also Ocean Advocates v. Army Corps of Engineers, 361 F.3d 1108, 1118 (9th Cir.2004) (explaining review under § 706(2)(A) of the APA). The court's conclusion that Mr. Moore lacked reasonable cause is sufficient to answer any question about the IRS's authority to impose penalties.

The court can only guess, however, as to whether the IRS considered relevant factors or made a clear error of judgment. The record before the court contains no administrative explanation of the IRS's decision to impose penalties. The IRS's December 2012 "appeals" letter to Mr. Moore contains three sentences of "explanation" that do nothing to illuminate what the IRS considered or why it arrived at its decision. The letter at least mentions the "reasonable cause" standard; it says nothing at all about why it choose a $40,000 maximum penalty as opposed to a smaller amount. The court looks for a "rational connection between the facts found and the choice [the agency] made." Nat'l Ass'n of Home Builders v. Norton, 340 F.3d 835, 841 (9th Cir.2003). That connection must, however, come from the administrative record. Id.

The administrative record is, with one exception, devoid of any explanation of the IRS's reasons for imposing the maximum penalty. Agent Tjoa's 2011 Summary Memo is in the record before the court, but (so far as the court is aware), Mr. Moore did not see the Summary Memo until the IRS produced it in discovery in this case. Even then, the IRS redacted portions of the Summary Memo. The Summary Memo at least arguably provides an explanation of Agent Tjoa's decision to recommend the maximum penalty. Indeed, Agent Tjoa cited the portions of the IRM that are relevant to determining the amount of an FBAR penalty, and explained many other facets of her recommendation. What the Government ignores in its motion, however, is that the Summary Memo is not an explanation of the ultimate decision to impose a penalty. [6] The Summary Memo was, at least on the record before the court, the basis for the IRS to require Mr. Moore to either accept the assessment of penalty or "appeal" it before the assessment. The issue before the court is the basis for the IRS's decision to actually impose the penalties. As to the 2005 penalty, the court can only guess. The IRS disregarded its own promise and assessed the penalty before Mr. Moore could request an "appeal."

10 As to its decision on "appeal" to assess four penalties, the IRS has already refused to produce the only document (so far as the court is aware) that addresses the material Mr. Moore submitted in support of his appeal or provides explanation of the reasons for imposing the maximum penalty. On January 8, 2015, the court denied Mr. Moore's motion to compel production of an "Appeals Memo" that Agent Batman authored at some point in the "appeal" process. The IRS claimed that the deliberative process privilege protected the Appeals Memo. The court agreed. What the court did not know at the time is that the Appeals Memo is apparently the only contemporaneous source of explanation for the IRS's decision to assess maximum penalties against Mr. Moore.

The Government asks the court to rubber-stamp a decision that lacks any explanation in the administrative record. That the Government offers an explanation for that decision in the briefing before the court is irrelevant. What the court requires is evidence from which it could conclude that the IRS did not act arbitrarily, capriciously, or in abuse of its discretion when it imposed $40,000 in penalties on Mr. Moore. That evidence is absent.

The court cannot, however, overturn the agency's decision merely because it failed to articulate a basis for it:

> If the record before the agency does not support the agency action, if the agency has not considered all relevant factors, or if the reviewing court simply cannot evaluate the challenged agency action on the basis of the record before it, the proper course, except in rare circumstances, is to remand to the agency for additional investigation or explanation. The reviewing court is not generally empowered to conduct a de novo inquiry into the matter being reviewed and to reach its own conclusions based on such an inquiry.

Florida Power & Light Co. v. Lorion, 470 U.S. 729, 744, 105 S.Ct. 1598, 84 L.Ed.2d 643 (1985). When there is "such failure to explain administrative action as to frustrate effective judicial review, the remedy ... [is] to obtain from the agency, either through affidavits or testimony, such additional explanation of the reasons for the agency decision as may prove necessary." Camp v. Pitts, 411 U.S. 138, 142–143, 93 S.Ct. 1241, 36 L.Ed.2d 106 (1973). What is preferable is contemporaneous evidence of the factors the agency considered when it made its decision. Volpe, 401 U.S. at 420; see Alaska Dep't of Environmental Conservation v. EPA, 540 U.S. 461, 497, 124 S.Ct. 983, 157 L.Ed.2d 967 (2004) ("Even when an agency explains its decision with less than ideal clarity, a reviewing court will not upset the decision on that account if the agency's path may reasonably be discerned.") (internal quotations omitted). That may, in appropriate cases, permit the court to rely on contemporaneous evidence (like the Appeals Memo) that the agency did not disclose during the decisionmaking process. For example, in Tourus Records, Inc. v. Drug Enforcement Admin., 259 F.3d 731, 737–38 (D.C.Cir.2001), the court permitted an agency to supplement its bare-bones written decision with memoranda that explained the basis for that decision. In any event, that is preferable to an after-the-fact rationalization of the agency's decision. See Volpe, 401 U.S. at 420.

11 The court will permit the Government to supplement the record to provide some basis for the court to conduct review of its penalty assessment. Specific instructions for that supplementation will come in Part IV of this order. For now, the court concludes only that unless the Government provides evidence articulating its reasons for assessing a maximum penalty against Mr. Moore, the court will have no recourse but to hold that it acted arbitrarily and capriciously.

The Government may also choose to supplement the record to provide contemporaneous explanation of its decision to assess the 2005 penalty without providing the "appeal" it promised Mr. Moore. On the record before the court, that decision is baffling. The only reason the Government offered, its concern that the statute of limitations would expire, is nonsensical on the record before the court. The statute of limitations would not have expired until at least the end of June 2012; the IRS assessed the penalty in January 2012. The court acknowledges that the IRS's inexplicable conduct was perhaps harmless. The IRS apparently considered Mr. Moore's "appeal" of the 2005 penalty just as it considered the "appeal" as to later years. Nonetheless, the IRS assessed a penalty without providing Mr. Moore the "appeal" it promised. The Government can perhaps supplement the record to provide an explanation for its failure to honor its promise, or clear explanation that the failure was harmless. If it does not, the court will rule that assessing the 2005 penalty in January 2012 was arbitrary and capricious.

4. The Penalty Assessment Procedures Satisfied the Due Process Clause.

The Due Process Clause requires only "such procedural protections as the particular situation demands." Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 334, 96 S.Ct. 893, 47 L.Ed.2d 18 (1976). Determining what process is necessary requires a consideration of the private interest at stake, the risk that the procedures will lead to an erroneous deprivation of that interest, the probable value of different procedures, and the governmental interest in avoiding unnecessary fiscal or administrative burdens. Id.

The IRS used two procedures. As to the 2006, 2007, and 2008 penalties, it conducted an interview with Mr. Moore and his counsel to determine his reasons for not filing FBARs, issued a notice proposing to assess $40,000 in FBAR penalties and the opportunity to internally "appeal" that decision before assessment, conducted an "appeal" process where Mr. Moore presented his arguments against imposition of the penalty both in writing and by telephone, and issued a notice of assessment of the penalty. As to the 2005 penalty, the IRS provided no meaningful pre-deprivation review. It nonetheless allowed him to contest the assessment through its internal "appeal" process. Mr. Moore also had the opportunity to seek judicial review of all of the IRS's decisions.

The IRS's penalty assessment procedures served all of the purposes of due process. It ensured that Mr. Moore received notice of the penalty and an opportunity to contest it. See Memphis Light, Gas & Water Div. v. Craft, 436 U.S. 1, 13, 98 S.Ct. 1554, 56 L.Ed.2d 30 (1978). No formal trial-like hearing is necessary, it suffices that the Government provided "some kind of hearing" at some time before "finally depriv[ing]" Mr. Moore of his property. Id. at 16 (quoting Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 557–58, 94 S.Ct. 2963, 41 L.Ed.2d 935 (1974)). The opportunity that the IRS gave Mr. Moore to present his arguments in writing and by telephone is adequate, under the circumstances. Id . at 16 n. 17 (noting that the "opportunity for informal consultation with designated personnel empowered to correct a mistaken determination" is sufficient in some circumstances); Buckingham v. Sec'y of Dep't of Agriculture, 603 F.3d 1073, 1082 (9th Cir.2010) (noting that due process does not always require an adversarial hearing, a full evidentiary hearing, or a formal hearing). The opportunity for judicial review after assessment of the penalties is further insurance against a deprivation of due process. Even as to the 2005 penalty that the IRS assessed without an opportunity for pre-deprivation review, the availability of both the opportunity to contest that assessment in the administrative "appeal" and to obtain later judicial review satisfies due process. See Memphis Light, 436 U.S. at 19–20 (explaining that post-deprivation review suffices in some circumstances).

12 Mr. Moore offers no cogent argument that these procedures are inadequate. He neither cites Mathews nor attempts to conduct the analysis it requires. His invocation of the Due Process Clause consists of just four objections: (1) that the IRS's use of its own ORDER—21 employees to assess penalties means that their decisions are biased, (2) that even the explanation Agent Tjoa provided in the Summary Memo is inadequate support for the penalties she assessed, (3) that the IRS's terse notice of the denial of his "appeal" violated due process, and (4), that the IRS's attempts to collect on its penalties before judicial review violated due process.

It is long-settled that an agency's use of its own employees to investigate and adjudicate matters entrusted to it does not necessarily violate due process. Withrow v. Larkin, 421 U.S. 35, 55–56, 95 S.Ct. 1456, 43 L.Ed.2d 712 (1975). There is no evidence that any of the IRS employees involved in assessing penalties against Mr. Moore bore any bias against him. See Stivers v. Pierce, 71 F.3d 732, 741 (9th Cir.1995) (stating requirements for proving that an agency decisionmaker had a bias sufficient to deny a petitioner due process).

Mr. Moore's second and third objections conflate the lack of an adequate explanation for the IRS's decisions with a violation of due process. Even the IRS's bare-bones notice that it was denying Mr. Moore's appeal sufficed to inform him that penalties had been assessed and that his only remaining recourse was judicial review. Mr. Moore cited no authority for the proposition that the Due Process Clause requires more.

Mr. Moore's final objection is that the IRS denied him Due Process by attempting to collect on its penalties without permitting him to complete judicial review. Once the IRS assessed its penalties, they began to accrue interest and perhaps additional penalties for non-payment. [7] Nonetheless, the Due Process Clause prohibits enforcement of an administrative decision in advance of judicial review only where “the practical effect of coercive penalties for noncompliance [is] to foreclose all access to the courts.” Thunder Basin Coal Co. v. Reich, 510 U.S. 200, 218, 114 S.Ct. 771, 127 L.Ed.2d 29 (1994). Mr. Moore offers no evidence that the interest and penalties he may accrue are so punitive as to leave him with no realistic choice except to pay the assessments. He decries that the Government has threatened to garnish his Social Security benefits to pay the penalties. There is no evidence that the Government has attempted to make good on that threat. Even if it had, there is no evidence that Mr. Moore could not remedy the harm from garnishment with a decision in his favor in this court.

5. Even the Maximum Penalty the IRS Assessed Does Not Violate the Eighth Amendment.

Finally, the court considers Mr. Moore's contention that the $40,000 penalty violates the Excessive Fines Clause of the Eighth Amendment. The court assumes without deciding that civil FBAR penalties are “fines” within the meaning of the Eighth Amendment, i.e. “punishment for an offense.” United States v. Bajakajian, 524 U.S. 321, 328, 118 S.Ct. 2028, 141 L.Ed.2d 314 (1998). Even under that assumption, the penalties are invalid only if they are “grossly disproportional to the gravity of the defendant's offense.” Id. at 337. Although no rigid inquiry governs the court's proportionality inquiry, it should consider the “severity of the offense, the statutory maximum penalty available, and the harm caused by the offense.” Horne v. Dep't of Agriculture, 673 F.3d 1071, 1081 (9th Cir.2011), rev'd on other grounds at ––– U.S. ––––, 133 S.Ct. 2053, 186 L.Ed.2d 69 (2013); see also United States v. Mackby, 339 F.3d 1013, 1016–19 (9th Cir.2003).

13 Mr. Moore falls well short of convincing the court that his FBAR penalties are disproportionate to his offense. He failed to report an account worth between $300,000 and $550,000. A small penalty is unlikely to serve as much deterrent for a person holding an account of that size. In Bajakajian, the defendant forfeited the entirety of about $350,000 in currency because he failed to report it before transporting it out of the country. Id. at 324–25. The Court found that to be an excessive fine. Id. at 337. The court has no reason to believe it would have reached the same conclusion as to a fine nearly an order of magnitude smaller. Mr. Moore would forfeit about 10% of the value of his account for failing to report it. That does not strike the court as disproportional, much less grossly disproportional. Admittedly, the Government has wholly failed to point out the harm that Mr. Moore's failure to report caused, and has given the court no basis to compare the severity of Mr. Moore's offense to similar violations. [8] Nonetheless, Congress authorized both the FBAR reporting mandate and penalties of up to $10,000 without regard to the size of the unreported account. The court concludes that the Government's interest in enforcing its laws is at least roughly proportional to the penalty it imposed here. See Mackby, 339 F.3d at 1019 (noting the government's cost of enforcing the law against the person as justification for a fine). The court has no basis to conclude that Mr. Moore's $40,000 penalty is grossly disproportionate.

IV. SUPPLEMENTAL BRIEFING

No later than 14 days following the issuance of this order, the parties shall meet and confer. They shall discuss, at a minimum, whether they can reach agreement as to supplementing the record in accordance with this order.

No later than 28 days following the issuance of this order, the Government shall supplement the record. Its supplementation shall consist solely of the following:

1) A brief of five pages or fewer that describes contemporaneous evidence for the IRS's penalty assessment decision, or, alternatively, proposes other evidence from which the court could conclude that the IRS did not act arbitrarily, capriciously, or in abuse of its discretion in assessing the maximum penalty against Mr. Moore.

2) A declaration or declarations containing the contemporaneous or other evidence described in the brief.

No later than 14 days following the Government's supplementation of the record, Mr. Moore may submit a brief of five pages or fewer addressing (in light of the expanded record) whether the IRS's penalty assessment was arbitrary, capricious, or an abuse of discretion.

V. CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, the court GRANTS the Government's motion for summary judgment (Dkt.# 32) in the following respects:

1) The court rules that Mr. Moore violated the Bank Secrecy Act by failing to file FBARs for 2005 through 2008, and that he had no reasonable cause for that violation. He is subject to the assessment of a civil penalty.

14 2) The court grants summary judgment against Mr. Moore's claims invoking the Due Process Clause and Excessive Fines Clause.

3) The court rules that Mr. Moore abandoned any claim based on the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment or based on Congress's allegedly unlawful delegation of judicial power to the Treasury Department or the IRS.

What remains undecided is Mr. Moore's claim invoking the APA and requesting that the court set aside or otherwise modify the IRS's assessment of penalties in accordance with that Act's judicial review provisions at 5 U.S.C. § 706. The parties shall comply with Part IV of this order to bring that claim to a resolution. Because the court has no indication that there are factual disputes appropriate for resolution at a trial, the court VACATES the trial date and all deadlines related to trial preparation.

Footnotes

[1] The Bank Secrecy Act makes the Secretary of the Treasury responsible for issuing regulations on foreign financial reporting. 31 U.S.C. § 5314(b). Until 2010, Treasury regulations applicable to FBARs were at Part 103 of Title 31 of the Code of Federal Regulations. Among other things, those regulations make the IRS responsible for enforcing the statute's reporting requirements. 31 C .F.R. § 103.56(g). In 2010, those regulations were moved to Part 1010 of Title 31 of the Code of Federal Regulations. So far as the court is aware, the substance of the regulations relevant to this suit did not change. The Government relies on the pre–2010 regulations; Mr. Moore does not object. The court thus cites the older regulations.

[2] When referring to the “appeal” the IRS offered Mr. Moore, the court uses quotation remarks to emphasize that the procedure does not resemble a traditional appeal. The IRS's December 13, 2011 letter did not impose any penalties, it proposed them. The IRS's offer of an “appeal” was akin to an order to show cause why it should not impose penalties for the first time.

[3] A few district court decisions on civil FBAR liability take approaches not dissimilar from what the Government recommends. In United States v. McBride, 908 F.Supp.2d 1186 (D.Utah 2012), the court adjudicated the Government's suit to collect an FBAR penalty in a bench trial. Although the trial was de novo, the court did not discuss whether it owed deference to the administrative determination that the defendant had violated the Bank Secrecy Act. By contrast to its extensive findings and conclusions regarding liability, the court devoted just a paragraph to its conclusion that the penalties the IRS assessed were proper. Id. at 1214. The court did not discuss the standard of review applicable to the amount of the penalty.

In United States v. Hom, No. C 13–03721 WHA, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 77489, 2014 WL 2527177 (N.D.Cal. Jun. 4, 2014), the court granted the Government's motion for summary judgment that the defendant was liable for a civil FBAR penalty, suggesting no deference to the IRS's administrative decision that he was liable. The court deferred to the IRS's assessment of a $40,000 penalty without discussion.

In several decisions in United States v. Williams, judges in the Fourth Circuit and the Eastern District of Virginia considered a civil FBAR penalty. The district court concluded that “a de novo standard of review is appropriate given that 31 U.S.C. § 5321 provides for no adjudicatory hearing before an FBAR penalty is assessed." United States v. Williams, No. 1:09–cv–437, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 90794, at *4, 2010 WL 3473311 (E.D.Va. Sept. 1, 2010). The district court initially had no occasion to consider the amount of the penalty, because it concluded after a bench trial that the defendant was not liable for a willful FBAR violation. The Fourth Circuit reversed, concluding that the trial court had clearly erred in concluding that the defendant did not act willfully. United States v. Williams, 489 Fed. Appx. 655, 660 (4th Cir.2012). The appellate panel suggested no concern with the trial court's de novo review. On remand, the district court reviewed the amount of the penalty "for abuse of discretion under the 'arbitrary and capricious' standard of the Administrative Procedure Act." United States v. Williams, No. 1:09–cv–437, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 105666, at *4 (E.D.Va. Jun. 26, 2014).

[4] The "substantial evidence" standard applies only where the formal administrative adjudication procedures of § 554, § 556, and § 557 of the APA apply. Portland Audubon Society v. Endangered Species Comm., 984 F.2d 1534, 1540 (9th Cir.1993). Those procedures only apply when a statute requires an adjudication, on the record, after the opportunity for an agency hearing. Id.; see also National Wildlife Found. v. Burford, 871 F.2d 849, 855 (9th Cir.1989). Mr. Moore points to no statute or other authority suggesting that formal adjudication procedures are required before imposing FBAR penalties.

[5] The Internal Revenue Manual contains detailed procedures for the assessment of FBAR penalties, as well as standards for determining the amount of those penalties. See IRM 4.26.17 (stating procedures), 4.26.16 (stating substantive standards, including standards for determining penalty amount). The IRM does not have the force of law, Fargo v. Comm'r, 447 F.3d 706, 713 (9th Cir.2006), although the IRS may take guidance from it, Keller v. Comm'r, 568 F.3d 710, 720–21 (9th Cir.2009). No one argues that either the APA or any other source of law required the IRS to follow the IRM when assessing Mr. Moore's FBAR liability. As the court will later discuss, the Agent Tjoa's 2011 Summary Memo stated that she followed the IRM, but the record does not reveal whether the IRS followed it when it ultimately penalized Mr. Moore.

[6] The APA's informal adjudication procedures exempt a decision "affirming a prior denial" from the requirement that an agency provide a "brief statements of the grounds for denial" of a request for relief. 5 U.S.C. § 555(e). The Government invokes that section, but does not acknowledge that there is no "prior denial" in the record in this case. The only denial of Mr. Moore's request that no penalty be imposed came in the December 2012 letter closing the "appeal" process.

[7] The IRS asserts in its reply brief that as to the 2005 penalty, it did not begin to assess interest or demand payment until Mr. Moore's "appeal" was complete. Mr. Moore had no opportunity to respond to that assertion. The parties should clarify this point in their supplemental briefing. If the Government's assertion is correct, Mr. Moore likely suffered no prejudice as a result of the IRS's premature assessment of the 2005 penalty.

[8] Mr. Moore points out that his liability for the unpaid taxes on the account, even including penalties, was smaller than his FBAR penalty. That is beside the point. FBAR is not a tax requirement, it is a requirement that allows the Government to track accounts held abroad. Nothing prevents Congress or the IRS from choosing to penalize that reporting offense more harshly than underpayment of taxes.

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff–Appellant,
v.
J. Bryan WILLIAMS, Defendant–Appellee.

No. 10–2230.
Argued: March 21, 2012.
Decided: July 20, 2012.

Synopsis
Background: Government brought action seeking to enforce civil penalties assessed against taxpayer for his failure to report his interest in two foreign bank accounts for tax year 2000. The United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, Liam O'Grady, J., 2010 WL 3473311, entered judgment in favor of taxpayer, and government appealed.

Holding: The Court of Appeals, Shedd, Circuit Judge, held that taxpayer's undisputed actions established reckless conduct, which satisfied the proof requirement for wilfulness under Internal Revenue Code section requiring annual report of any financial interests in any bank, securities, or other financial accounts in a foreign country.

Reversed.

Agee, Circuit Judge, filed dissenting opinion.

655 Appeal from the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, at Alexandria. Liam O'Grady, District Judge. (1:09–cv–00437–LO–TRJ).

Opinion

Reversed by unpublished opinion. Judge SHEDD wrote the majority opinion, in which Judge MOTZ concurred. Judge AGEE wrote a dissenting opinion.

Unpublished opinions are not binding precedent in this circuit.

656 SHEDD, Circuit Judge:

*1 The Government brought this action seeking to enforce civil penalties assessed against J. Bryan Williams for his failure to report his interest in two foreign bank accounts for tax year 2000, in violation of 31 U.S.C. § 5314. Following a bench trial, the district court entered judgment in favor of Williams. The Government now appeals. Because we conclude that the district court clearly erred in finding that the Government failed to prove that Williams willfully violated § 5314, we reverse.

I

Federal law requires taxpayers to report annually to the Internal Revenue Service ("IRS") any financial interests they have in any bank, securities, or other financial accounts in a foreign country. 31 U.S.C. § 5314(a). The report is made by filing a completed form TD F 90–22.1 ("FBAR") with the Department of the Treasury.[1] See id. § 5314; 31 C.F.R. § 1010.350. The FBAR must be filed on or before June 30 of each calendar year with respect to foreign financial accounts maintained during the previous calendar year, 31 C.F.R. § 1010.306(c), and the Secretary of the Treasury may impose a civil money penalty on any person who fails to timely file the report, 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(A). Moreover, in cases where a person "willfully" fails to file the FBAR, the Secretary may impose an increased maximum penalty, up to $100,000 or fifty percent of the balance in the account at the time of the violation. Id. § 5321(a)(5)(C). The authority to enforce such assessments has been delegated to the IRS. 31 C.F.R. § 1010.810(g).

In 1993, Williams opened two Swiss bank accounts in the name of ALQI Holdings, Ltd., a British Corporation (the "ALQI accounts"). From 1993 through 2000, Williams deposited more than $7,000,000 into the ALQI accounts, earning more than $800,000 in income on the deposits. However, for each of the tax years during that period, Williams did not report to the IRS the income from the ALQI accounts or his interest in the accounts, as he was required to do under § 5314.

By the fall of 2000, Swiss and Government authorities had become aware of the assets in the ALQI accounts. Williams retained counsel and on November 13, 2000, he met with Swiss authorities to discuss the accounts. The following day, at the request of the Government, the Swiss authorities froze the ALQI accounts.

Relevant to this appeal, Williams completed a "tax organizer" in January 2001, which had been provided to him by his accountant in connection with the preparation of his 2000 federal tax return. In response to the question in the tax organizer regarding whether Williams had "an interest in or a signature or other authority over a bank account, or other financial account in a foreign country," Williams answered "No." J.A. 111. In addition, the 2000 Form 1040, line 7a in Part III of Schedule B asks:

> At any time during 2000, did you have an interest in or a signature or other authority over a financial account in a foreign country, such as a bank account, securities account, or other financial account? See instructions for exceptions and filing requirements for Form TD F 90–22.1.

657 2 J.A. 131. On his 2000 federal tax return, Williams checked "No" in response to this question, and he did not file an FBAR by the June 30, 2001, deadline. Subsequently, upon the advice of his attorneys and accountants, Williams fully disclosed the ALQI accounts to an IRS agent in January 2002. In October 2002 he filed his 2001 federal tax return on which he acknowledged his interest in the ALQI accounts. Williams also disclosed the accounts to the IRS in February 2003 as part of his application to participate in the Offshore Voluntary Compliance Initiative.[2] At that time he also filed amended returns for 1999 and 2000, which disclosed details about his ALQI accounts.

In June 2003, Williams pled guilty to a two-count superseding criminal information, which charged him with conspiracy to defraud the IRS, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 371, and criminal tax evasion, in violation of 26 U.S.C. § 7201, in connection with the funds held in the ALQI accounts from 1993 through 2000. As part of the plea, Williams agreed to allocute to all of the essential elements of the charged crimes, including that he unlawfully, willfully, and knowingly evaded taxes by filing false and fraudulent tax returns on which he failed to disclose his interest in the ALQI accounts. In exchange for his allocution, Williams received a three-level reduction under the Sentencing Guidelines for acceptance of responsibility.[3]

In his allocution, Williams admitted the following:

> I knew that most of the funds deposited into the Alqi accounts and all the interest income were taxable income to me. However, the calendar year tax returns for #93 through 2000, I chose not to report the income to my—to the Internal Revenue Service in order to evade the substantial taxes owed thereon, until I filed my 2001 tax return.
> I also knew that I had the obligation to report to the IRS and/or the Department of the Treasury the existence of the Swiss accounts, but for the calendar year tax returns 1993 through 2000, I chose not to in order to assist in hiding my true income from the IRS and evade taxes thereon, until I filed my 2001 tax return.
> ....
> I knew what I was doing was wrong and unlawful. I, therefore, believe that I am guilty of evading the payment of taxes for the tax years 1993 through 2000. I also believe that I acted in concert with others to create > a mechanism, the Alqi accounts, which I intended to allow me to escape detection by the IRS. Therefore, I am—I believe that I'm guilty of conspiring with the people would (sic) whom I dealt regarding the Alqi accounts to defraud the United States of taxes which I owed.

J.A. 55 (emphasis added).

In January 2007, Williams finally filed an FBAR for each tax year from 1993 through 2000. Thereafter, the IRS assessed two $100,000 civil penalties against him, pursuant to § 5321(a)(5), for his failure to file an FBAR for tax year 2000.[4] 658 Williams failed to pay these penalties, and the Government brought this enforcement action to collect them. Following a bench trial, the district court entered judgment in favor of Williams, finding that the Government failed to establish that Williams willfully violated § 5314. The Government timely appealed.

II

*3 The parties agree that Williams violated § 5314 by failing to timely file an FBAR for tax year 2000. The only question is whether the violation was willful. The district court found that (1) Williams "lacked any motivation to willfully conceal the accounts from authorities" because they were already aware of the accounts and (2) his failure to disclose the accounts "was not an act undertaken intentionally or in deliberate disregard for the law, but instead constituted an understandable omission given the context in which it occurred."[5] J.A. 378–79. Therefore, the district court found that Williams's violation of § 5314 was not willful.

"Willfulness may be proven through inference from conduct meant to conceal or mislead sources of income or other financial information," and it "can be inferred from a conscious effort to avoid learning about reporting requirements." United States v. Sturman, 951 F.2d 1466, 1476 (6th Cir.1991) (internal citations omitted) (noting willfulness standard in criminal conviction for failure to file an FBAR). Similarly, "willful blindness" may be inferred where "a defendant was subjectively aware of a high probability of the existence of a tax liability, and purposefully avoided learning the facts point to such liability." United States v. Poole, 640 F.3d 114, 122 (4th Cir.2011) (affirming criminal conviction for willful tax fraud where tax preparer "closed his eyes to" large accounting discrepancies). Importantly, in cases "where willfulness is a statutory condition of civil liability, [courts] have generally taken it to cover not only knowing violations of a standard, but reckless ones as well." Safeco Ins. Co. of America v. Burr, 551 U.S. 47, 57, 127 S.Ct. 2201, 167 L.Ed.2d 1045 (2007) (emphasis added).Whether a person has willfully failed to comply with a tax reporting requirement is a question of fact. Rykoff v. United States, 40 F.3d 305, 307 (9th Cir.1994); accord United States v. Gormley, 201 F.3d 290, 294 (4th Cir.2000) ("[T]he question of willfulness is essentially a finding of fact.").

We review factual findings under the clearly erroneous standard set forth in Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 52(a). 659 Walton v. Johnson, 440 F.3d 160, 173–74 (4th Cir.2006) (en banc). "Our scope of review is narrow; we do not exercise de novo review of factual findings or substitute our version of the facts for that found by the district court." Id. at 173. "If the district court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety, the court of appeals may not reverse it even though convinced that had it been sitting as the trier of fact, it would have weighed the evidence differently." Id. (quoting Anderson v. City of Bessemer City, 470 U.S. 564, 573–74, 105 S.Ct. 1504, 84 L.Ed.2d 518 (1985)). However, notwithstanding our circumscribed review or the deference we give to a district court's findings, those findings are not conclusive if they are "plainly wrong." Id. (quoting Jiminez v. Mary Washington College, 57 F.3d 369, 379 (4th Cir.1995)). The clear error standard still requires us to engage in "meaningful appellate review," United States v. Abu Ali, 528 F.3d 210, 261 (4th Cir.2008), and where objective evidence contradicts a witness' story, or the story itself is "so internally inconsistent or implausible on its face that a reasonable factfinder would not credit it, ... the court of appeals may well find clear error even in a finding purportedly based on a credibility determination." United States v. Hall, 664 F.3d 456, 462 (4th Cir.2012) (citing Anderson, 470 U.S. at 575, 105 S.Ct. 1504). Thus, "[a] finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support it, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with a definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed." F.C. Wheat Maritime Corp. v. United States, 663 F.3d 714, 723 (4th Cir.2011).

*4 Here, the evidence as a whole leaves us with a definite and firm conviction that the district court clearly erred in finding that Williams did not willfully violate § 5314. Williams signed his 2000 federal tax return, thereby declaring under penalty of perjury that he had "examined this return and accompanying schedules and statements" and that, to the best of his knowledge, the return was "true, accurate, and complete." "A taxpayer who signs a tax return will not be heard to claim innocence for not having actually read the return, as he or she is charged with constructive knowledge of its contents." Greer v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 595 F.3d 338, 347 n. 4 (6th Cir.2010); United States v. Doherty, 233 F.3d 1275, 1282 n. 10 (11th Cir.2000) (same). Williams's signature is prima facie evidence that he knew the contents of the return, United States v. Mohney, 949 F.2d 1397, 1407 (6th Cir.1991), and at a minimum line 7a's directions to "[s]ee instructions for exceptions and filing requirements for Form TD F 90–22.1" put Williams on inquiry notice of the FBAR requirement.

Nothing in the record indicates that Williams ever consulted Form TD F 90–22.1 or its instructions. In fact, Williams testified that he did not read line 7a and "never paid any attention to any of the written words" on his federal tax return. J.A. 299. Thus, Williams made a "conscious effort to avoid learning about reporting requirements," Sturman, 951 F.2d at 1476, and his false answers on both the tax organizer and his federal tax return evidence conduct that was "meant to conceal or mislead sources of income or other financial information," id. ("It is reasonable to assume that a person who has foreign bank accounts would read the information specified by the government in tax forms. Evidence of acts to conceal income and financial information, combined with the defendant's failure to pursue knowledge of further reporting requirements as suggested on Schedule B, provide a sufficient basis to establish willfulness on the part of the defendant."). This conduct constitutes willful blindness to the FBAR requirement. Poole, 640 F.3d at 122 ("[I]ntentional ignorance and actual knowledge are equally culpable under the law.")

660 Williams's guilty plea allocution further confirms that his violation of § 5314 was willful. During that allocution, Williams acknowledged that he willfully failed to report the existence of the ALQI accounts to the IRS or Department of the Treasury as part of his larger scheme of tax evasion. This failure to report the ALQI accounts is an admission of violating § 5314, because a taxpayer complies with § 5314 by filing an FBAR with the Department of the Treasury. In light of his allocution, Williams cannot now claim that he was unaware of, [6] inadvertently ignored, or otherwise lacked the motivation to willfully disregard the FBAR reporting requirement.

Thus, we are convinced that, at a minimum, Williams's undisputed actions establish reckless conduct, which satisfies the proof requirement under § 5314. Safeco Ins., 551 U.S. at 57, 127 S.Ct. 2201. Accordingly, we conclude that the district court clearly erred in finding that willfulness had not been established.

III

*5 For the foregoing reasons, we reverse the judgment of the district court and remand this case for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

REVERSED.

AGEE, Circuit Judge, dissenting:

*5 The majority correctly recites that we review only for clear error the district court's dispositive factual finding that Williams' failure to file the FBAR was not willful. Maj. Op. at 658–59. The majority also correctly notes the limited scope of review under that standard. Id. In my view, however, my colleagues in the majority do not adhere to that standard, instead substituting their judgment for the judgment of the district court. As appellate judges reviewing for clear error, we are bound by the standard of review and therefore I respectfully dissent.

We recently explained how circumscribed our review under the clear error standard must be:

> "This standard plainly does not entitle a reviewing court to reverse the finding of the trier of fact simply because it is convinced that it would have decided the case differently." Anderson v. Bessemer City, 470 U.S. 564, 573, 105 S.Ct. 1504, 84 L.Ed.2d 518 (1985). "If the district court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety, the court of appeals may not reverse it even though convinced that had it been sitting as the trier of fact, it would have weighed the evidence differently." Id. at 573–74, 105 S.Ct. 1504.

> "When findings are based on determinations regarding the credibility of witnesses," we give "even greater deference to the trial court's findings." Id. at 575, 127 S.Ct. 2201.

United States v. Hall, 664 F.3d 456, 462 (4th Cir.2012). Applying this standard to the case at bar, I conclude the district court's judgment should be affirmed.

661 The majority opinion rightly points out that there is evidence supporting the conclusion that Williams' failure to file the FBAR was willful, particularly if adopting the majority's conclusion that a "willful violation" can include "willful blindness to the FBAR requirement" or "intentional ignorance." Maj. Op. at 659. That evidence could have led a reasonable factfinder to conclude that the violation was willful, as the majority believes. [1]

But there is also evidence supporting the opposite view. First, there is Williams' direct testimony that he was unaware of the FBAR requirement in June 2001 (when it was supposed to be filed) and that he did not willfully (or recklessly) fail to file it. The district judge, who had the opportunity to observe Williams' demeanor while testifying, expressly found that "Williams' testimony that he only focused on the numerical calculations on the Form 1040 and otherwise relied on his accountants to fill out the remainder of the Form is credible...." J.A. 379.

Significantly, the district court also found that there was no objective incentive for Williams to continue to conceal the ALQI account in June 2001, because at that time he knew that the United States government had requested the ALQI accounts be frozen, and thus Williams knew the United States government knew about those accounts. As the district court reasoned, if Williams had known about the FBAR requirement, there would have been little incentive for him under those circumstances to refuse to comply with it as of June 2001.

*6 Additional evidence supporting the district court's finding includes the undisputed evidence that, after June 2001, Williams and his advisors began formal disclosures of the ALQI accounts, including the filing of amended income tax returns, but they did not backfile FBAR reports. These disclosures included direct disclosures of the ALQI accounts to the IRS in January 2002. The district court explained the significance of this disclosure to the IRS: "[t]hough made after the June 30, 2001" FBAR filing deadline, the disclosure "indicates to the Court that Williams continued to believe the assets had already been disclosed. That is, it makes little sense for Williams to disclose the ALQI accounts merely six months after the deadline he supposedly willfully violated." J.A. 378. This was a logical and supported finding for the district court to make on the record before it.

The district court's decision was set forth in a detailed opinion that fully explained the evidence supporting its findings. Had I been sitting as the trier of fact in this bench trial, I may well have decided differently than did the district judge. But I cannot say that I am left with a "definite and firm conviction" that he was mistaken. Thus, I cannot agree with the majority that the Government has established clear error.

I also address briefly the two other grounds for reversal asserted by the United States and rejected by the district court: collateral estoppel and judicial estoppel. [2] Specifically, the Government 662 points to Williams' criminal conviction and, in particular, the language in his plea allocution, see Maj. Op. at 657, as requiring a finding that both types of estoppel apply. I disagree.

We review the district court's denial of judicial estoppel only for abuse of discretion, see Jaffe v. Accredited Sur. & Cas. Co., 294 F.3d 584, 595 n. 7 (4th Cir.2002), and its denial of collateral estoppel de novo, Tuttle v. Arlington Cnty. Sch. Bd., 195 F.3d 698, 703 (4th Cir.1999).

Judicial estoppel generally requires three elements:

> First, the party sought to be estopped must be seeking to adopt a position that is inconsistent with a stance taken in prior litigation. The position at issue must be one of fact as opposed to one of law or legal theory. Second, the prior inconsistent position must have been accepted by the court. Lastly, the party against whom judicial estoppel is to be applied must have intentionally misled the court to gain unfair advantage.

Zinkand v. Brown, 478 F.3d 634, 638 (4th Cir.2007) (citations and internal quotations omitted).

Similarly, a party seeking to apply collateral estoppel must establish five elements:

> (1) the issue sought to be precluded is identical to one previously litigated; (2) the issue [was] actually determined in the prior proceeding; (3) determination of the issue [was] a critical and necessary part of the decision in the prior proceeding; (4) the prior judgment [is] final and valid; and (5) the party against whom estoppel is asserted ... had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the issue in the previous forum.

*7 Sedlack v. Braswell Servs. Grp., Inc., 134 F.3d 219, 224 (4th Cir.1998); Collins v. Pond Creek Mining Co., 468 F.3d 213, 217 (4th Cir.2006). "The doctrine ... may apply to issues litigated in a criminal case which a party seeks to relitigate in a subsequent civil proceedings.... [For example], a defendant is precluded from retrying issues necessary to his plea agreement in a later civil suit." United States v. Wight, 839 F.2d 193, 196 (4th Cir.1987).

> In my view, the district court correctly concluded that there remains a factual incongruence between those facts necessary to [Williams'] guilty plea to tax evasion and those establishing a willful violation of § 5314. That Williams intentionally failed to report income in an effort to evade income taxes is a separate matter from whether Williams specifically failed to comply with disclosure requirements contained in § 5314 applicable to the ALQI accounts for the year 2000.

J.A. 379. Put differently, Williams never allocuted to failing to file the FBAR form, and certainly did not admit willfully failing to file it. Neither his plea agreement nor his allocution even referred to the FBAR or § 5314. Indeed, the Treasury Department itself notes that the FBAR is a separate reporting requirement and not a tax return, nor is it to be attached to a taxpayer's tax returns. See J.A. 225, 237, 246. In short, pleading guilty to hiding the existence of the two accounts for income tax purposes does not necessarily establish that Williams willfully failed to file a FBAR for 2000. Indeed, other separate and distinct tax penalties (including penalties for fraud) were separately sought by the IRS from Williams for his failure to report the income in the accounts, pursuant to 26 U.S.C. §§ 6662 and 6663. See Williams v. Comm'r of Internal Revenue, 97 T.C.M. (CCH) 1422, *4 (Apr. 16, 2009). 663 The FBAR-related penalty is not a tax penalty, but a separate penalty for separate conduct.

Thus, viewed as distinct issues, collateral estoppel is inapplicable here because Williams' willfulness in failing to file the FBAR is not an issue "identical to one previously litigated." Sedlack, 134 F.3d at 224. Likewise, judicial estoppel is inapplicable because there is nothing about Williams' stance on willfulness here that is "inconsistent with [the] stance taken" in his criminal proceedings. Zinkand, 478 F.3d at 638. Accordingly, I would further hold that the district court did not err in declining to apply either collateral estoppel or judicial estoppel.

For all of these reasons, I respectfully dissent and would affirm the judgment of the district court.

For ease, our citations are to the recodified sections.

[2] The IRS rejected the application and turned it over to the attorney for the United States who was conducting a grand jury investigation of Williams.

3 Williams also agreed to pay all taxes and criminal penalties due for tax years 1993 through 2000, but he has since refused to pay some of those taxes and penalties and has engaged the IRS in litigation over that issue. See Williams v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 97 T.C.M. (CCH) 1422 (Apr. 16, 2009).

4 The statute of limitations for assessing penalties for tax years 1993 through 1999 had expired by the time the IRS assessed the civil penalties. See 31 U.S.C. § 5321(b)(1) and (2).

5 In making its determination, the district court emphasized Williams's motivation rather than the relevant issue of his intent. See Am. Arms Int'l v. Herbert, 563 F.3d 78, 83 (4th Cir.2009) ("[M]alice or improper motive is not necessary to establish willfulness."). To the extent the district court focused on motivation as proof of the lack of intent, it simply drew an unreasonable inference from the record. In November 2000, Swiss authorities met with Williams to discuss the ALQI accounts and thereafter froze them at the request of the United States Government. Although the Government knew of the existence of the accounts, nothing in the record indicates that, when the accounts were frozen, the Government knew the extent, control, or degree of Williams's interest in the accounts or the total funds held in the accounts. As Williams admitted in his allocution, his decision not to report the accounts was part of his tax evasion scheme that continued until he filed his 2001 tax return. Thus, his failure to disclose information about the ALQI accounts on his 2000 tax return in May 2001 was motivated by his desire not to admit his interest in the accounts, even after authorities had been aware of them for over six months. Rarely does a person who knows he is under investigation by the Government immediately disclose his wrongdoing because he is not sure how much the Government knows about his role in that wrongdoing. Thus, without question, when Williams filed in May of 2001, he was clearly motivated not to admit his interest in the ALQI accounts.

6 In fact, seven months before his criminal allocution, Williams sent a letter to the IRS requesting to participate in the Offshore Voluntary Compliance Initiative "[p]ursuant to Rev. Proc.2003–11." J.A. 183–84. On the first page of Revenue Procedure 2003–11, the IRS specifically informs applicants that a primary benefit of the Initiative is that participating taxpayers can avoid penalties for having failed to timely file an FBAR. Clearly, Williams was aware of the FBAR at the time of his allocution. Further, to the extent Williams asserts he was unaware of the FBAR requirement because his attorneys or accountants never informed him, his ignorance also resulted from his own recklessness. Williams concedes that from 1993–2000 he never informed his accountant of the existence of the foreign accounts—even after retaining counsel and with the knowledge that authorities were aware of the existence of the accounts.

1 Some of that evidence, of course, is subject to two interpretations. For example, the majority reasons that Williams' reference in his allocution to the "Department of the Treasury" is necessarily an admission he violated § 5314. Because the IRS is a bureau of the Department of the Treasury, however, the reference in his plea could instead be interpreted as a simple acknowledgement of that fact. Indeed, there was no reference in the criminal proceedings to Section 5314 or the FBAR at all.

2 In light of its holding that the district court clearly erred in finding the violation not willful, the majority did not have cause to address either estoppel argument. Because I would affirm the district court and the Government contends that both types of estoppel prevent Williams from challenging the willfulness of his violation, it is necessary to address those points.

UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff–Appellee,
v.
James A. SIMON, Defendant–Appellant.

No. 11–1837.
Argued Feb. 10, 2012.
Decided Aug. 15, 2013.

Synopsis

Background: Defendant was convicted, by a jury in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Indiana, Robert L. Miller, Jr., J., of filing false income tax returns, failing to file reports of foreign bank accounts, mail fraud and financial aid fraud. He appealed.

Holdings: The Court of Appeals, Rovner, Circuit Judge, held that:

[1] evidence that defendant was ineligible for extensions of the deadlines for filing reports of his foreign bank accounts (FBAR) was sufficient to support conviction for failing to file such reports;

[2] district court did not err in excluding evidence of loans allegedly made to defendant's business entities; and

[3] evidence that defendant failed to disclose on his tax returns that he held signature authority over foreign accounts was sufficient to support conviction for filing false tax returns.

Affirmed.

ROVNER, Circuit Judge.

A jury convicted James A. Simon of filing false income tax returns, failing to file reports of foreign bank accounts, mail fraud and financial aid fraud. He challenges the legal basis for his convictions on failing to file reports of foreign bank accounts and also contests the district court's decision to limit the evidence he could present in his defense on the false income tax return counts. He also contends that the court erred in its rulings on jury instructions, and he maintains that a reversal on some counts necessarily requires reversal on other counts. We affirm.

I.

James Simon is a Certified Public Accountant, a professor of accounting, and an entrepreneur whose business dealings require a flowchart to unravel. At the center of Simon's financial life was JAS Partners, a Colorado limited partnership. Simon and his wife Denise[1] each owned one percent of JAS Partners. The Simon Family Trust (hereafter "the Trust"), based in the Cook Islands, owned the other ninety-eight percent. The Trust existed for the benefit of Simon, his wife and their children; the trustees were a Cook Islands corporation and a retired attorney. Simon's sisters, Sherri Johnson and Sandra Simon, each owned forty-three percent of Elekta Ltd, a Gibralter company for which Simon served as the managing director. The Simon sisters are retired teachers who entrusted the entirety of the business to their brother. Elekta owned nineteen percent of JS Elekta, a Cyprus corporation, also managed by Simon. JS Elekta, in turn, owned seventy-five percent of Ichua Company, a Cyprus corporation also managed by Simon. Ichua owned 100% of Intellecom, a Ukrainian telecommunications business entity.[2] Simon thus was the managing director of three foreign companies, Elekta, JS Elekta and Ichua. In his capacity as managing director, he held signature authority over foreign bank accounts for each of these companies.

For tax years 2003 through 2006, the Simon family received approximately $1.8 million from JAS Partners, Elekta, JS Elekta, Ichua and William R. Simon 684 Farms, Inc., most of this recorded as loans in Simon's personal financial records. Simon and his family spent approximately $1.7 million during this same period of time. Yet Simon paid just $328 in income taxes for 2005, and claimed refunds for the other three years, at the same time pleading poverty to financial aid programs in order to gain need-based scholarships for his children at private schools. The government charged Simon with four counts of filing false tax returns, in violation of 26 U.S.C. § 7206(1) and 18 U.S.C. § 2; four counts of failing to file reports related to foreign bank accounts, in violation of 31 U.S.C. §§ 5314, 5322 and 18 U.S.C. § 2; eleven counts of mail fraud, in violation of 18 U.S.C. §§ 1341 and 2; and four counts of financial aid fraud, in violation of 20 U.S.C. § 1097 and 18 U.S.C. § 2. In his defense, Simon sought to demonstrate that the money he received from various entities was loaned to him and thus was not taxable. Alternately, he characterized the money he received as partnership distributions that were not taxable because they did not exceed his basis in the partnership. At worst, he explained, he mischaracterized some of the transactions, but not in a manner that violated any criminal law. As for any failure to file reports regarding his signature authority over foreign bank accounts, Simon contended that the IRS did not require him to file these reports by the dates alleged by the government, that the IRS had extended the filing deadlines for the tax years in question past the date of his indictment, and that he filed the reports within the extended time period. The other counts, he contended, were largely dependent on the false income tax counts, and he therefore maintained that a failure to prove the income tax counts necessarily required reversal of the other counts.

In ruling on pre-trial motions, the district court rejected Simon's claim regarding the extended deadlines for filing reports of foreign bank accounts as a matter of law. The court concluded that the relief the IRS granted from civil liability for certain failures to report foreign bank accounts could not relieve Simon of criminal liability for offenses completed before the IRS granted the civil relief. The court also found that evidence related to the funding of some of Simon's business entities would be excluded except to the extent that Simon himself provided that funding. A jury subsequently found Simon guilty of four counts of filing false tax returns; guilty of three counts (one count was dismissed) of failing to file reports related to foreign bank accounts; guilty of eight counts (and not guilty of three counts) of mail fraud; and guilty of four counts of financial aid fraud. Simon appeals.

II.

On appeal, Simon first contends that his convictions for failing to file reports of foreign bank accounts must be reversed because he filed the required documents within the time allotted by extensions granted by the IRS. He characterizes the issue as one of conflicting interpretations of the law by the Treasury Department and the Justice Department. He maintains that the courts should defer to the agency entrusted with implementing the statute at issue, in this case the Treasury Department, and that deferring to Treasury would require reversal of those counts. Second, Simon argues that evidentiary errors and jury instruction errors require reversal of his convictions for filing false tax returns. He complains that the court's rulings in limine prevented him from presenting a valid defense to the charges when he was not allowed to present certain evidence of his basis in JAS Partners. He also challenges the government's second theory underlying the false 685 tax return counts: that the returns were false because Simon failed to check the "yes" box on Schedule B of his return in response to a question regarding whether he had signature authority over foreign bank accounts. If the conviction on the foreign bank reporting counts must be reversed, then the conviction on the false returns must also be reversed, he argues, because it was no more necessary to check the "yes" box revealing his signature authority over foreign accounts than it was to file reports for those accounts. Third, he maintains that the evidentiary errors he asserted on the false return counts led to an error in the jury instructions. Finally, Simon contends that if the false tax return counts are reversed, then he is also entitled to a new trial on the mail fraud and student loan fraud counts, because these convictions were dependent on the validity of the false tax return convictions.

A.

[1] The Bank Secrecy Act of 1970, 31 U.S.C. § 5311, et seq. (the "Act"), requires "certain reports or records where they have a high degree of usefulness in criminal, tax, or regulatory investigations or proceedings, or in the conduct of intelligence or counterintelligence activities, including analysis, to protect against international terrorism." 31 U.S.C. § 5311. Section 5314 of the Act provides that the Secretary of the Treasury ("Secretary") "shall require ... a person in, and doing business in, the United States, to keep records, file reports, or keep records and file reports, when the ... person makes a transaction or maintains a relation for any person with a foreign financial agency." Although the Act specifies the information that must be collected, it provides to the Secretary the discretion to prescribe the classification of persons subject to the law and regulations, the foreign countries to which record requirements may be applied, the magnitude and types of the transactions subject to record and reporting requirements, and the manner in which the information should be kept, among other things. See 31 U.S.C. § 5311(a)-(b). The persons required by the Act and its accompanying regulations to keep the designated records also must disclose them "as required by law." 31 U.S.C. § 5314(c). Willful violations of the disclosure requirements carry criminal and civil penalties. See 31 U.S.C. § 5322.

In each year from 2005 through 2007, Simon had signature authority over foreign bank accounts. Regulations in place at that time provided that Simon was required to file with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue (hereafter "IRS") a Form TDF 90–22.1, "Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts," also known as an "FBAR." See 31 C.F.R. § 103.24(a).[3] The deadline for filing FBARs was "June 30 of each calendar year with respect to foreign financial accounts exceeding $10,000 maintained during the previous calendar year." 31 C.F.R. § 103.27(c).[4]

Simon concedes that he did not file the required FBARs for each calendar year from 2005 through 2007 by June 30 of the next year in each instance.[5] He nonetheless 686 contends that he did not violate the law because the IRS issued guidance in 2009 and 2010 that granted retroactive extensions for filing FBARs for the 2008 and earlier calendar years. The initial guidance, which we discuss below, was published in the form of frequently asked questions and answers, and this document purported to extend the deadline for filing FBARs to September 29, 2009. An IRS notice then extended the FBAR filing date to June 30, 2010, and a second IRS notice later extended the deadline even further to June 30, 2011. See IRS Notice 2009–62, 2009–35 I.R.B. 260, 2009 WL 2414299 (hereafter "Notice 2009–62"); IRS Notice 2010–23, 2010–11 I.R.B. 441, 2010 WL 672300 (hereafter "Notice 2010–23"). By then, Simon asserts, he had filed the required FBARs and thus could not, as a matter of law, face prosecution for his failure to meet the original deadlines. Indeed, he filed the FBARs prior to his indictment and within the extended deadlines set forth in Notices 2009–62 and 2010–23 (collectively the "Notices"). The government counters that Simon's crimes were complete before the IRS issued the Notices, and that the Notices cannot serve to absolve a person of his then-existing criminal liability for completed acts. The government also contends that amendment of a regulation does not relieve criminal liability for conduct occurring prior to the amendment, even when the amendment purports to have retroactive application. Moreover, the government maintains that the Notices specified only that the IRS would not impose civil penalties for persons whose failure to comply was not willful, but that nothing in the Notices evidenced an intention to relieve from criminal liability taxpayers who willfully failed to file their FBARs. Finally, the Notices did not apply to taxpayers like Simon, the government contends, who had not reported all of their taxable income, had not paid all of their taxes, and instead willfully violated the FBAR provisions.

We turn to the language of the Notices themselves as well as earlier guidance that the IRS published on FBAR issues. In March 2009, the IRS initiated the "2009 Offshore Voluntary Disclosure Program," intended to "get those taxpayers hiding assets offshore back into the system."[6] See http://www.irs. gov/uac/Statement-from-IRSCommissioner-Doug-Shulman-on-Offshore-Income (last visited July 12, 2013). On May 6, 2009, the IRS posted on its website a series of Frequently Asked Questions ("FAQs") explaining the program to taxpayers in plain language. Several of the FAQs addressed FBAR issues, and one purported to extend the FBAR filing deadline:

> Q9. I have properly reported all my taxable income but I only recently learned that I should have been filing FBARs in prior years to report my personal foreign bank account or to report the fact that I have signature authority over bank accounts owned by my employer. May I come forward under the voluntary disclosure practice to correct this?

> A9. The purpose for the voluntary disclosure practice is to provide a way for taxpayers who did not report taxable income in the past to voluntarily come forward and resolve their tax matters. Thus, If [sic] you reported and paid tax on all taxable income but did not file FBARs, do not use the voluntary disclosure process.
> For taxpayers who reported and paid tax on all their taxable income for prior years but did not file FBARs, you 687 should file the delinquent FBAR reports according to the instructions ... and attach a statement explaining why the reports are filed late. Send copies of the delinquent FBARs, together with copies of tax returns for all relevant years, by September 23, 2009, to the Philadelphia Offshore Identification Unit....
> The IRS will not impose a penalty for the failure to file the FBARs.

See http://www.irs.gov /uac/Voluntary-Disclosure:-Questions-and-Answers (last visited July 12, 2013). FAQ 7 instructs that taxpayers who are already under examination by the IRS are not eligible for the Voluntary Disclosure Program, and FAQ 14 explains that there are criminal penalties for failing to file FBARs.

Notice 2009–62 purports to address "technical issues" for certain FBAR filers and states that the Notice "provides temporary relief to those filers while formal guidance is developed." Notice 2009–62 also states that it "extends the due date for filing an FBAR for one year until June 30, 2010, for U.S. persons having signature authority over, but no financial interest in, a foreign financial account[.]" After referencing the earlier issued FAQs, Notice 2009–62 clarified that affected persons "have until June 30, 2010, to file an FBAR for the 2008 and earlier calendar years with respect to these foreign financial accounts. Thus, eligible persons that avail themselves of the administrative relief provided in this notice may need to file FBARs for the 2008, 2009 and earlier calendar years on or before June 30, 2010, to the extent provided in future guidance." Finally, the filing extension provided in the Notice expressly "supplements the filing extension to September 23, 2009, previously provided by the IRS on its public website."

The "future guidance" referenced in Notice 2009–62 came the next year in Notice 2010–23. Public comment received after issuance of Notice 2009–62 led the IRS and Treasury Department to provide additional administrative relief:

> Persons with signature authority over, but no financial interest in, a foreign financial account for which an FBAR would otherwise have been due on June 30, 2010, will now have until June 30, 2011, to report those foreign financial accounts. The deadline of June 30, 2011, applies to FBARs reporting foreign financial accounts over which the person has signature authority, but no financial interest, for the 2010 and prior calendar years.
> Provided the taxpayer has no other reportable foreign financial accounts for the year in question, a taxpayer who qualifies for the filing relief provided in this notice should check the "no" box in response to FBAR-related questions found on federal tax forms for 2009 and earlier years that ask about the existence of a financial interest in, or signature authority over, a foreign financial account.

Notice 2010–23. A third notice later extended further the deadline for FBARs for 2009 and earlier calendar years to November 1, 2011. See IRS Notice 2011–54, 2011–29 I.R.B. 53, 2011 WL 2409318 (hereafter "Notice 2011–54").

The government contends that Simon was not eligible for either the Voluntary Disclosure Practice or the administrative relief set forth in the FAQs and the Notices. Second, the government asserts, the crime was complete when Simon did not file the three FBARs on June 30 of the year following each calendar year at issue. Any subsequent notice issued by the IRS could not relieve criminal liability already 688 incurred under the government's interpretation. Finally, the government insists that any relief granted by the FAQs and the Notices was strictly civil, and that the IRS could not and did not promise to retroactively relieve from criminal liability any persons who had already completed a criminal act when they willfully failed to meet the original deadlines.

Simon counters that the Treasury Department and IRS expressly granted retroactive relief to taxpayers like himself who had signature authority over foreign financial accounts. Simon characterizes the issue as one of conflicting interpretations of the regulations by the Treasury Department and the Justice Department. The Treasury Department, he contends, retroactively extended the deadline for filing FBARs for taxpayers like himself who properly reported all of their taxable income but failed to file FBARs by the original deadlines. In such a scenario, the FAQs directed taxpayers not to use the Voluntary Disclosure Practice but to simply file the FBARs by the new deadlines published in the FAQs and subsequent Notices. See FAQ 9; Notice 2009–62; Notice 2010–23. For these otherwise compliant taxpayers who simply failed to file FBARs by the original deadlines, the IRS promised it would "not impose a penalty for the failure to file the FBARs." FAQ 9. Simon reads that promise as applying to both civil and criminal penalties. This asserted conflict between the Treasury Department and the Justice Department presents an issue of first impression, Simon contends, that can be answered by extending the principles set forth in Director, Office of Workers' Compensation Programs v. Ball, 826 F.2d 603 (7th Cir.1987). Under Ball, Simon maintains that we must defer to the interpretation given to the regulations by the agency that is charged with administration of the statute and regulations. Although Ball involved two parts of the same agency, namely, the Director of the Department of Labor and the Review Board of that same department, Simon urges us to apply that principle here to defer to the Treasury Department's interpretation of the regulations here.

The government counters that there is no conflict between the Justice Department and the Treasury Department in the interpretations of the regulations. The Treasury Department never opposed Simon's prosecution and, in fact, the case agent and several testifying witnesses were IRS employees. As the government reads the regulations and the Notices, any relief granted was from civil penalties only. Moreover, the Notices expressed no intention to refrain from prosecuting persons like Simon who were already being investigated for wilfully violating the tax laws and wilfully failing to file FBARs. The government also maintains that the IRS could not, as a matter of law, extinguish criminal liability for crimes that were completed before any regulations were repealed or amended with new deadlines. Relying on United States v. Hark, 320 U.S. 531, 64 S.Ct. 359, 88 L.Ed. 290 (1944), and a number of similar cases, the government argues that the amendment of a regulation does not relieve criminal liability for conduct occurring prior to the amendment. [7]

689 We need not address the thorny issue of whether an IRS Notice can retroactively wipe out criminal liability for an already completed crime because, as we discuss below, Simon is not one of the persons to whom the IRS granted retroactive relief. That is, even if we assume solely for the purpose of this appeal that the IRS has the power to retroactively relieve criminal liability by publishing FAQs or Notices, we agree with the government that Simon was not in the class of persons to whom the relief was granted. As Simon himself notes, the IRS Notices and FAQs address relief for two groups of taxpayers. First, through the Voluntary Disclosure Practice, taxpayers who failed to report all of their taxable income could come forward to belatedly report the income and resolve their tax liabilities while minimizing their chances of criminal prosecution. FAQs 3 & 4. But persons who were already under civil examination by the IRS were not eligible to participate in the Voluntary Disclosure Practice. FAQ 7. Second, persons who properly reported all of their income and paid all of their taxes but simply failed to timely file their FBARs could file their "delinquent" FBARs, along with a statement explaining why the FBARs were late. [8] In that instance, the IRS stated it would "not impose a penalty for the failure to file the FBARs." FAQ 9. Simon agrees that he was not eligible for the Voluntary Disclosure Practice. He claims it did not apply to him because he reported all of his taxable income; the government asserts he was not eligible because the IRS had already initiated a civil examination. No matter the reason, the government and Simon agree that he was not eligible for a program that, at most, minimized his chances for criminal prosecution.

Nor was Simon in the second group of taxpayers eligible for administrative relief. As we will discuss below, because he had not "properly reported all [his] taxable income," he was not eligible to avoid penalties (civil or criminal) for filing delinquent FBARs as described in the FAQs and the subsequent Notices that extended the filing dates further. See FAQ 9 ("Q9. I have properly reported all my taxable income but I only recently learned that I should have been filing FBARs ... A9. For taxpayers who reported and paid tax on all their taxable income for prior years but did not file FBARs, you should file the delinquent FBAR reports according to the instructions ... by September 29, 2009"); FAQ 43 ("Taxpayers who reported and paid tax on all their 2008 taxable income but only recently learned of their FBAR filing obligation and have insufficient time to gather the necessary information to complete the FBAR, should file the delinquent FBAR report according to the instructions ... by September 23, 2009"); Notice 2009–62; Notice 2010–23. FAQs 9 and 43, which extend the filing deadline to 690 September 29, 2009, both refer to FBARs filed under the extended deadline as "delinquent" and both apply by their terms only to taxpayers who reported all of their income, paid all of their taxes and "only recently learned" that they should be filing FBARs. Notice 2009–62 specifically references FAQs 9 and 43, and expressly notes that the new filing extension to June 30, 2010 "supplements the filing extension to September 23, 2009, previously provided by the IRS on its public website." Notice 2010–62, in turn, notes that it is extending the relief provided in Notice 2009–62, extending the June 30, 2010 deadline to June 30, 2011.

Thus, the extensions described in the Notices applied only to the persons described in FAQs 9 and 43, persons who had properly reported all of their income, paid their taxes, and "only recently" learned of their obligations to file FBARs. Moreover, the late-filed FBARs were considered "delinquent" even if filed by the extended deadlines, but the IRS would not impose penalties[9] for FBARs filed within these narrow parameters, so long as the affected taxpayers met the new deadlines and explained why the FBARs were late. As we will discuss below, at trial, the government proved that Simon had not "properly reported" all of his taxable income, and had not paid all of the taxes due, and he concedes that he never filed a statement explaining why his FBARs were late. Thus, as a factual matter, he was not eligible for any of the administrative relief described in the FAQs and the Notices. Indeed, by the time the IRS had decided to extend the FBAR deadlines for otherwise-complaint taxpayers, Simon was already under investigation by the IRS and was not even eligible for the Voluntary Disclosure Practice, a special program that minimized but did not eliminate the risk of criminal prosecution. So even if we assume that the IRS could grant "administrative relief" in a notice that would erase already-incurred criminal liability, it is clear in this instance that the IRS Notices did not extend that relief to taxpayers like Simon who had not reported all of their taxable income, had not paid all of their taxes and had not filed statements explaining why their FBARs were delinquent.

To the extent that the Notices and FAQs were relevant to the issue of wilfulness, the district court granted the government's motion in limine to exclude the Notices, and Simon has not appealed that ruling. In any case, Simon could not have seen the 2009 and 2010 Notices until several years after he had already violated the law requiring him to file FBARs for the 2005, 2006 and 2007 tax years. He could not have mistakenly relied on the advice given in the Notices because it had yet to be issued. To the extent the Notices were evidence that he lacked wilfulness because the Notices demonstrated that many taxpayers found the FBAR requirements confusing, Simon was not harmed by the exclusion 691 of this evidence because he was able to bring forth other evidence that taxpayers found the requirements confusing. In sum, we need not decide whether the IRS had the power to retroactively eliminate criminal liability for FBAR violations because we affirm the judgment on the grounds that the extensions granted expressly did not apply to otherwise noncompliant taxpayers like Simon.

B.

[2] We turn to Simon's claim of evidentiary error. Simon was charged with four counts of filing false tax returns, in violation of 26 U.S.C. § 7206(1) and 18 U.S.C. § 2. The government sought to prove that the returns were false in two respects. First, Simon failed to indicate on Schedule B that he had access to foreign bank accounts. Second, he failed to report all of his income. On this second theory, Simon sought to introduce evidence that any money he received from JAS Partners and the other business entities was not taxable because it was loaned to him by those entities and he was obliged to repay it. If the funds could not be legally characterized as loans, he wished to argue in the alternative that the money he withdrew from JAS Partners did not exceed his basis in the partnership, and thus the funds were non-taxable partnership distributions.

Prior to trial, the government moved in limine to exclude evidence regarding loans to Simon's business entities. Up to that point, Simon's defense appeared to be that the money he received from all of the business entities was not taxable income but rather constituted loans. The government conceded that legitimate loans by the businesses to Simon would not be taxable but that loans to the businesses by others were irrelevant to Simon's loan defense and would serve to confuse the jury. R. 77. Simon countered that loans to his business entities by others were relevant circumstantial evidence of how he usually conducted business. In other words, Simon contended that his history of borrowing and lending as a course of dealing in his businesses provided circumstantial evidence of whether the money he received personally from the assorted business entities were loans or taxable income. He also intended to demonstrate that, if he had loaned money to his business entities, repayment of those loans was not taxable income to him. R. 86. See also R. 95.

Prior to the start of trial and after hearing argument, the court entered a preliminary ruling on the matter:

> As to the evidence of loans to Mr. Simon's business entities, I think the motion is well taken to the extent I —if I understand it, the motion is directed to whether the business entities received loans with which they then made the money transfers, and I'll just [sic] call it that trying to find some neutral description, the money transfers to Mr. Simon, and I think the issues for jury determination relate to whether the money-the money transfers from the entities to Mr. Simon were loans or income and not how the entities acquired the money, and I think it might well be confusing.
> This is the closest of the issues I'm ruling on, and I may well re-evaluate this during trial. But to the extent the Government's motion is directed to how the money came into the hands of the business entities, specifically whether it was a loan, I think, to the extent the business was doing something and got money as a result of it, that, obviously, would not create the same jury confusion.

Trial Tr. at 148–49. Simon's counsel sought to clarify and asked, "Are you saying that we cannot show, for example, that 692 Mr. Simon's trust loaned the money to JS [sic] Partners that subsequently loaned or distributed monies to Mr. Simon?" Trial Tr. at 149. The court replied:

> Yes, I am, and let me clarify it. I am saying that, and I may well re-evaluate when I understand better. But as I understand it now—and again, I read the briefs. I gave everybody a chance for argument. And I understand it, at this point, how the money got to JS Elektra [sic] wouldn't have anything to do with whether it would be a loan from JS Elektra [sic] to Mr. Simon. Now maybe there's more to it that I haven't understood yet, and I'll be happy to reconsider it as we go along, but we've had two chances to educate me, and, at this point I don't understand what the relevancy would be as to how JS Elektra [sic] got it, and the time for educating me has passed because I've got a jury waiting for opening statements.

Trial Tr. at 149–50.

Trial commenced and the government presented its case-in-chief. Before the defense presented its first witness, counsel for Simon again raised the issue of money loaned to JAS Partners. Counsel informed the court that the defense's first witness would be Don Willis, a man who loaned $445,000 to JAS Partners in 2003 and 2004. Counsel contended that Simon signed for these loans on behalf of the partnership and was personally responsible for the loans as a general partner. Because Simon was personally liable on the loans, counsel contended, money that Simon received from JAS Partners was non-taxable to him:

> These documents—and we're going to have experts that are going to testify to the fact that JAS Partners, when they borrow the money from Mr. Willis—and there's another one, Mr. Scheumann—and Mr. Simon signed on the note as general partner, it's like him borrowing the money himself, and, therefore, he could borrow it back from the partners or he could take the money as a distribution, and there's no tax effect on it, Judge, and that's the key to this whole case. There's no tax effect on his taking money from JAS Partners. It's his.
> And the other thing ... is that JAS Partners was comprised of James and Denise Simon and the Simon Family Trust, which was a 98 percent partner. The Simon Family Trust, which Mr. Simon funded, when it was established, he put in about 2,000,000 plus dollars of his own money, after-tax dollars. When they loaned money to JAS Partners, the same thing, Judge. It's Mr. Simon's money. He could take it out. He's a general partner. So it's all non-taxable, and that's the whole issue in the case.

Trial Tr. at 626–27. The government disagreed with this characterization of the law. Hearing what it perceived to be a new facet of the defense, the court then adjourned trial for the day and allowed the parties to file authority in support of their respective positions. The court then heard another round of arguments the next day.

In the new round of briefing, the government took the position that "the manner in which a partnership receives or categorizes funds bears no relation to the characterization of a payment of those funds from a partnership to its partner." R. 113, at 1. The government therefore sought to exclude all references to the characterization of funds that flowed between Simon's various business entities before those funds reached Simon's personal accounts. The government noted that, under the tax code, when a partner who is not acting in his capacity as a partner engages in business with a partnership, the transaction will be treated as if he were not a partner. 26 U.S.C. § 707(a)(1); 693 26 C.F.R. § 1.707–1. Thus, in deciding whether a partnership's loan to a partner was a true loan, the court would look at the substance of the transaction and determine whether there was an unconditional obligation to repay the loan. See Mangham v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 1980 WL 4125 (Tax Ct. July 29, 1980). See also DeSantis v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 1997 WL 119799 (Tax Ct. Mar. 18, 1997). The factors assessed in determining whether a loan is bona fide include whether there is a sum certain, the likelihood of repayment, a definite date of repayment, and the manner of repayment. Ibid. Thus, the government argued, the manner in which JAS Partners (or any of the other business entities) obtained the money that it loaned to Simon was irrelevant to determining whether the loans to Simon were bona fide and non-taxable.

Simon countered that the court should allow evidence regarding (1) the nature of any third-party loans to JAS Partners; (2) the identity of the creditor; (3) whether the loans were guaranteed by Simon or his wife; and (4) whether they were bona fide liabilities for tax purposes. Simon also contended that partnership distributions to partners are tax-free to the extent that they did not exceed the partner's basis in the partnership. See 26 U.S.C. § 731 ("In the case of a distribution by a partnership to a partner—(1) gain shall not be recognized to such partner, except to the extent that any money distributed exceeds the adjusted basis of such partner's interest in the partnership immediately before the distribution"). Simon noted that a partner's adjusted basis is generally determined by 26 U.S.C. §§ 705. A partner's adjusted basis increases, Simon contended, when the partner's share of partnership liability increases. See 26 U.S.C. § 751 ("Any increase in a partner's share of the liabilities of a partnership, or any increase in a partner's individual liabilities by reason of the assumption by such partner of partnership liabilities, shall be considered as a contribution of money by such partner to the partnership."). Under Simon's theory, when a third party loaned money to JAS Partners, and Simon, as a general partner, became liable to repay that amount, his basis in the partnership increased by that amount. Any distributions to Simon up to the amount of those loans would be non-taxable under Simon's formulation because the distributions would not exceed Simon's basis in the partnership. Simon continued to maintain that the money he received from JAS Partners was in the form of legitimate loans that he intended to repay. But if the jury determined that the JAS Partners loans were not bona fide, then he intended to argue in the alternative that the disbursements could be recast as non-taxable constructive distributions that did not exceed his basis in the partnership. He therefore argued that evidence regarding loans by third parties to the partnership was relevant to his basis in the partnership and thus to the question of whether loans or distributions from JAS Partners to him were taxable. R. 114.

The next day, before resuming testimony, the court ruled on the evidentiary challenge. The court framed the issue as whether there was legal support for Simon's proposition that a loan to a partnership is a loan to a general partner. As the court interpreted Simon's written filing, the nature of outside loans is important for tax purposes because loans can affect the partner's adjusted basis in the partnership. In particular, Simon argued that a partner's guarantee of a partnership loan is the equivalent of a recourse liability under the Treasury regulations. The court quoted Simon's argument that "outside loans to the partnership are directly relevant in determining whether such debt should be 694 included in the general partner's tax bases [sic] and to ultimately determine whether subsequent partnership distributions to them are tax free." Trial Tr. at 638–39. See also Defendant's Memorandum of Law Regarding Evidence of Loans to a Partnership, R. 114, at 3. The court concluded that this argument was a "long way from a loan to a partnership being the same as a loan to the general partner." Trial Tr. at 639. Without additional legal support for the proposition that loans to JAS Partners increased Simon's basis in the partnership, the court was unwilling to allow evidence of those loans. The court was concerned that any minimal value of this evidence would be outweighed by the risk of confusing the jury. Trial Tr. at 640. More importantly, though, the court noted that there was a factual gap in the defendant's theory because Simon had no witness to testify about his basis in the partnership. Trial Tr. at 639. The court was also concerned that Simon's experts intended to testify to general legal principles, and so the court confirmed its earlier ruling on the motion, and extended it to exclude "all testimony, expert or otherwise, regarding the manner in which partnerships function for tax purposes, and the tax treatment of partnerships, as well as any testimony about JAS Partners receiving loans from anyone other than the Simons." Trial Tr. at 640–41 (emphasis added). The court thus did not prevent Simon from presenting factual evidence regarding funds that he personally and directly supplied to the partnership. The court denied the government's motion to exclude evidence about JAS Partners and its purpose under the Economic Substance Doctrine. Finally, the court addressed the government's objection to the proposed testimony of Simon's expert Howard Richshafer. The court concluded that Richshafer, an expert on tax controversy, would not be barred but that he could not "tell a jury about the law." Trial Tr. at 642–43. Instructing the jury on the law was solely within the province of the trial court, and the court therefore precluded Richshafer from testifying to a general overview and operating rules of the tax code, the meaning of certain legal doctrines, an overview of grantor trust rules under the tax code, and a number of other legal matters.

As trial was about to resume, counsel for Simon asked whether he would be allowed to present evidence that the Simon Family Trust sold its interest in a company called Eye Pro, and that the proceeds then were loaned by the Trust to JAS Partners. Trial Tr. at 647–48. Counsel clarified Simon's theory that the sale of Eye Pro and other contributions to JAS Partners with after-tax dollars created a sufficient basis in JAS Partners to allow Simon to remove money from the partnership tax-free. The court then asked counsel to detail every piece of evidence that would be excluded by counsel's understanding of the court's ruling in limine. Counsel responded that he wished to present evidence of a $2 million after-tax contribution to the Simon Family Trust that went into the partnership when the Trust and Partnership were established; the sale of the Eye Pro business by the Simon Family Trust and the subsequent loaning of the proceeds of that sale to JAS Partners; loans to JAS Partners by three individuals; an inheritance to Simon from his mother's estate that went into the Simon Family Trust and was then loaned to JAS Partners; and the sale of a home for $147,000 that went into the Simon Family Trust and was then loaned to JAS Partners.

With regard to the sale of Eye Pro, the court asked, "If the stock to the business belonged to the family trust and the stock or the proceeds from the stock were given to the partnership, why doesn't that create a basis for the trust, rather than for Mr. 695 Simon, if the stock belonged to the trust?" Counsel replied:

> It's a grantor trust, Judge. The taxes have already been paid on that, and Mr. Simon contributed his after-tax dollars to this grantor trust, and so there's no tax consequence. When he puts it into the partnership, it increases his basis. It's like him just putting after-tax dollars that he had right into the partnership. What he did, he added to the trust, but he put the trust assets into the partnership.
> The point is, it's after-tax dollars, so there's no tax consequence that affects Mr. Simon in this way. It's just like putting—the money goes into the partnership, and then he takes it out, and it's the money that he already paid tax on, so it shouldn't be taxed.

Trial Tr. at 658. After hearing still more argument from both Simon and the government, the court concluded that Simon was free to argue to the jury that the money Simon received from JAS Partners was a loan or that it was a distribution but that he had failed to provide legal support for his argument that money transferred from the Simon Family Trust to JAS Partners and loans from outside parties to JAS Partners increased Simon's basis in the partnership. The court therefore reaffirmed its ruling in limine.

On appeal, Simon contends that the court erroneously barred evidence (including expert testimony) related to his defense theory that the distributions he received were not taxable because the court misunderstood the legal issue. Specifically, he maintains that the court did not understand that partnership distributions are tax-free to the extent that they did not exceed the partner's adjusted basis of his interest in the partnership. The adjusted basis, in turn, is determined by the adjusted basis of property contributed to the partnership when it is formed, and further adjusted when the partner's share of partnership liabilities changes, as when there is a loan to the partnership. The specific basis evidence that Simon sought to introduce included loans by third parties to JAS Partners, $2 million in assets from the Simon Family Trust that was transferred to JAS Partners, an inheritance from his mother that was loaned to JAS Partners through the Trust, and the proceeds of the sale of a house that were transferred to JAS Partners through the Trust.

The government does not now disagree with the general proposition that a partner is taxed on distributions removed from a partnership only to the extent that the distributions exceed the partner's adjusted basis in the partnership. 26 U.S.C. § 731(a). In reviewing the written and oral exchanges at trial surrounding this issue, it is apparent that the district court (against all odds, given the manner in which it was argued) also understood this general legal proposition but simply did not agree that the evidence Simon sought to introduce was relevant to demonstrating his adjusted basis in the partnership. That is, the court found that Simon did not demonstrate how distributions among and between third party lenders, the Simon Family Trust and JAS Partners affected Simon's basis in the trust. The court expressly allowed Simon to present evidence regarding his own personal contributions to JAS Partners because it was clear to the court that Simon's own direct contributions would increase his basis in the partnership. But Simon failed to timely provide legal support for his convoluted, ever-evolving argument that third-party loans to JAS Partners and funds channeled through the Simon Family Trust into JAS Partners increased his basis in JAS Partners.

696 [3] [4] We review the court's decision to admit or exclude evidence for abuse of discretion. United States v. Thornton, 642 F.3d 599, 604 (7th Cir.2011); United States v. Boone, 628 F.3d 927, 932 (7th Cir.2010); United States v. Cooper, 591 F.3d 582, 590 (7th Cir.2010); United States v. Wescott, 576 F.3d 347, 355 (7th Cir.2009). We will reverse and order a new trial only if any evidentiary errors are not harmless. Thornton, 642 F.3d at 604; Boone, 628 F.3d at 932; Cooper, 591 F.3d at 590; Fed.R.Crim.P. 52(a). Of course, a decision that rests on an error of law is always an abuse of discretion. United States v. Smith, 454 F.3d 707, 714–15 (7th Cir.2006). Thus, if Simon is correct that the district court misunderstood the legal basis for the admission of the evidence, the decision to preclude Simon from presenting the evidence could constitute an abuse of discretion. However, the court fully understood Simon's theory that the disbursements he received from JAS Partners were either legitimate loans or partnership distributions that did not exceed his basis in the partnership. The court excluded the evidence of loans to JAS Partners by Willis and Scheumann because Simon failed to supply legal support for his claim that loans to the partnership increased his basis as a general partner. Indeed, after arguing that the loans increased his basis because "a partnership liability guaranteed by a partner is classified as a recourse liability under the Treasury regulations," and "recourse liabilities are includible in the tax basis of partnership interests held by general partners," defense counsel conceded that Simon did not guarantee the payment on loans to JAS Partners by Willis and Scheumann. See R. 114, at 3 (arguing that recourse liabilities, including a partnership liability guaranteed by a partner, increase a partner's basis in the partnership); Trial Tr. at 655 ("Mr. Scheumann and Mr. Willis, when they loaned money to the partnership, and Mr. Simon being a general partner in the partnership and, therefore as a general partner—I think I may have misstated, Your Honor, with regard to this, but what I meant to say was that he didn't guarantee the payment. As a general partner, he would be liable for the promissory note that the partnership had with Mr. Willis and Mr. Scheumann.") (emphasis added). Simon also failed in the district court to present any legal support for his claims that money he funneled through the Simon Family Trust to JAS Partners in undefined transactions increased his basis in JAS Partners. His sole support for that claim was an assertion that the Simon Family Trust is a grantor trust, but he cited no statutes, regulations or case law connecting that asserted fact to his personal basis in JAS Partners. See Trial Tr. at 664 (where the court noted, "We're here on Day Four of the trial, and I've seen no law at all. I've heard that there's experts that would testify that that is what the law is, but that's a separate order in limine, no law to support this theory and, accordingly, will leave the order in limine where it is.").

[5] [6] Nor did he supply factual support for his basis in JAS Partners. Nothing in the record put the district court on notice that Simon's experts or fact witnesses would present factual support for his basis in JAS Partners. Simon sought to demonstrate his basis theory primarily through experts, including Herbert Long and Howard Richshafer. Simon's Notice of Proposed Testimony of Herbert Long, however, covered only his theory that the disbursements from JAS Partners were legitimate loans that Simon intended to repay and had the ability to repay. R. 82. A review of Simon's Notice of Proposed Testimony of Howard Richshafer reveals that Simon intended for Richshafer to instruct 697 the jury largely on legal principles. R. 104. For example, Richshafer was to testify to "a general overview and the operating rules of Subchapter K of the Internal Revenue Code" and give "an overview of the grantor trust rules under Subchapter J of the Internal Revenue Code," among other things. R. 104, ¶¶ 5, 8. The court was correct to preclude any witness from generally explaining the law to the jury. United States v. Farinella, 558 F.3d 695, 700 (7th Cir.2009). "District judges, rather than witnesses, must explain to juries the meaning of statutes and regulations." Farinella, 558 F.3d at 700. See also United States v. Caputo, 517 F.3d 935, 942 (7th Cir.2008) (the meaning of the statute and regulations is a subject for the court, not for testimonial experts); United States v. Jungles, 903 F.2d 468, 477 (7th Cir.1990) (trial court properly excluded expert's simple recitation of legal principles surrounding the "independent contractor" relationship). The jury is to apply the law as it is given by the court in its instructions, and may not apply a legal opinion given by a witness, including an expert witness. Farinella, 558 F.3d at 700. Nonetheless, the court did allow Simon to present evidence of his own direct contributions to the partnership.

In the end, Simon simply failed to connect the dots of his complex transactions, and failed to timely supply legal authority that would support his theory that the transactions among and between his various business entities increased his basis in JAS Partners. The district court therefore committed no legal error and did not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow Simon to present this evidence to the jury. To the contrary, the district court took extreme care in deciding whether to allow this evidence, and gave Simon multiple opportunities to provide legal support for his claim that this evidence was relevant to his partnership distribution defense theory.

Moreover, a significant portion of the unreported income was entirely unrelated to JAS Partners. In particular, Simon received more than $663,000 from Elekta and JS Elekta, which were corporations, not partnerships. His main theory of defense for those disbursements was that they were loans that he intended to repay, a theory that he was fully able to present to the jury and that the jury clearly rejected. It is thus difficult to discern how Simon could have been harmed by the court's decision to exclude evidence related to JAS Partners when a significant portion of the income he failed to report (approximately one-third of the total amount) came from unrelated corporations. The partnership distribution defense could not have applied to money Simon received from Elekta and JS Elekta, providing a further reason for affirming Simon's conviction on the false tax return counts. See Thornton, 642 F.3d at 605 (in determining whether an evidentiary error is harmless, we consider whether, in the mind of the average juror, the prosecution's case would have been significantly less persuasive had the improper evidence been excluded); United States v. Klebig, 600 F.3d 700, 722 (7th Cir.2009) (same). Again, though, we find no error in the court's decision to exclude certain evidence. But if the court had committed error in excluding evidence relating to the funding of JAS Partners, it is unlikely that error would have affected the verdict in light of the abundant evidence of unreported income Simon received from Elekta and JS Elekta.

[7] Finally, the government also asserted that Simon's tax returns were false because he did not disclose on Schedule B that he held signature authority over foreign accounts. Part III of Schedule B, labeled "Foreign Accounts and Trusts," 698 specifies that filers "must complete this part if you ... (b) had a foreign account; or (c) received a distribution from, or were a grantor of, or a transferor to, a foreign trust." Filers are asked to check either a "yes" or "no" box in response to the question, "At any time during [the filing year in question] did you have an interest in or a signature or other authority over a financial account in a foreign country, such as a bank account, securities account, or other financial account?" Filers are then directed to further instructions regarding the filing requirements for FBARS. Simon concedes he did not check the "yes" box for any of the years in question even though he had signature authority over a number of foreign accounts during those years. Both Simon and the government treated this issue as coterminous with the FBAR issue. That is, if Simon prevailed on the FBAR issue, he could prevail on the Schedule B issue. On the other hand, if he lost on the FBAR issue, he also lost on his Schedule B defense. Notice 2010–23 specified:

> Provided the taxpayer has no other reportable foreign financial accounts for the year in question, a taxpayer who qualifies for the filing relief provided in this notice should > check the "no" box in response to FBAR-related questions found on federal tax forms for 2009 and earlier years that ask about the existence of a financial interest in, or signature authority over, a foreign financial account.

Notice 2010–23, at ¶ 3. We have already determined that Simon was not a taxpayer "who qualifies for the filing relief provided in this notice" and so he was also not entitled to any relief for his failure to check the proper box on Schedule B. He has presented no separate argument concerning the government's charge that his tax returns were false in part because he failed to check the proper box on Schedule B. We therefore affirm his convictions on the false return counts.

C.

[8] [9] Simon also contends that the court erred when it overruled his objection to a jury instruction regarding materiality. The instruction states, "A line on a tax return is a material matter if the information required to be reported on that line is capable of influencing the correct computation of the amount of tax liability of the individual or the verification of the accuracy of the return." Trial Tr. at 1053, 1080. The instruction came from the Seventh Circuit Pattern instructions, and defines materiality specifically for 26 U.S.C. § 7206, the statute under which Simon was charged. Simon offered the instruction himself prior to the start of trial, but later objected because he had not been "allowed to put in the basis of Mr. Simon's interest in JAS Partners," and thus the jury could not determine the correct computation of his tax liability. Trial Tr. at 1053–54. "We review jury instructions de novo, but we will reverse a conviction only if the instructions as a whole misled the jury as to the applicable law." United States v. Joshua, 648 F.3d 547, 554 (7th Cir.2011). Simon does not contend that the instruction misstated the law. Instead, his objection to the instruction is simply an extension of his argument regarding the court's decision to limit the evidence he could present regarding his basis in JAS Partners. As we have already concluded, the court did not err in limiting this evidence because Simon failed to timely supply legal support for the relevance of the evidence. The court committed no error in giving a pattern jury instruction defining materiality for the jury.

Simon also contends that the court's inclusion of this instruction, in combination with the in limine ruling, deprived Simon 699 of his right to have the jury instructed on his theory of defense. There are a few problems with this contention. First, the court did not preclude Simon in general from making out his defense regarding distributions from the partnership that were not taxable to the extent that they did not exceed his basis in the partnership. The court simply limited certain pieces of evidence by requiring that Simon supply legal support demonstrating that a particular item or category of evidence was relevant to the computation of his basis. The court thus expressly allowed Simon to present evidence of his own direct contributions to JAS Partners because Simon supplied statutory support showing the relevance of this evidence. The court also explicitly allowed Simon to present his defense that money he received from JAS Partners was a non-taxable distribution. See Trial Tr. at 663 ("the Defense is free to shift at any time right through final argument from saying, 'This was a loan,' to, 'This was a distribution.' There's no prohibition against that. The Defendant doesn't have to disclose its defense other than alibi or insanity upfront.").

More importantly, the jury was not instructed on Simon's distribution theory not because of any error by the district court but because Simon did not ask for jury instructions setting forth this theory until the final day of trial, even though he earlier had multiple opportunities to submit proposed jury instructions to the court. R. 87 (Defendant's Proposed Jury Instructions, submitted prior to the start of trial); R. 105 (Defendant's Supplemental Proposed Jury Instructions, submitted on the first day of trial). The court then refused to give the instructions because they were untimely, especially in light of the court's ruling days earlier that experts would not be allowed to explain the law, and that only the court could explain the law to the jury. Trial Tr. at 643 (where the court declined to allow Simon's experts to "tell a jury about the law," noting that "telling the jury about the law is my job, as the trial judge, and not the job of a witness, no matter how much expertise the witness brings to the stand."). R. 122 (Defendant's Supplemental Proposed Jury Instructions, submitted on the last day of trial); Trial Tr. at 1065–66 (where the court concluded, "I don't think I can find, in light of last Tuesday's ruling on the motion in limine, that it was a last minute discovery yesterday or today that witnesses weren't going to be able to testify to what the law is, so I will sustain the objection to those late-filed instructions.”). The court was concerned that the government had no adequate opportunity to respond to the late-filed instructions, and it was within the court's discretion to disallow the instructions under these circumstances. Trial Tr. at 1066. Notably, Simon has not appealed from the court's ruling that his final round of proposed instructions was untimely. But even if the court had found that the additional proposed instructions were timely, they were woefully incomplete in explaining the relevant law to the jury. Only two instructions addressed Simon's tax-free partnership distribution theory. The first stated, “If a loan from a partnership to a partner does not constitute a loan, the transaction can constitute a tax free distribution if it doesn't exceed its partners [sic] adjusted tax basis in the partnership.” R.122, at 4. The second stated, “To determine whether partnership distributions are tax free to a partner, the partners [sic] adjusted basis of his interest in the partnership must be determined.” R. 22, at 11. Even if we take both of these propositions as true (and ignore the inherent contradiction in the first one), neither explains how the jury is to go about calculating Simon's basis, a crucial step in making out his 700 defense. Simon apparently intended to have his tax experts explain the law regarding the calculation of basis to the jury, and the court properly excluded this testimony. That obliged Simon to propose legally-supported jury instructions on his defense, so that the court could instruct the jury. Having failed to submit the instructions, he cannot now complain that the court deprived him of his defense.

D.

We finally turn to Simon's claims that reversal on some counts requires reversal on other counts. In particular, Simon argues that reversal on the FBAR counts alone would require reversal on the false income tax return counts because it would be unclear whether the jury convicted because he failed to report all of his income or because he failed to check the box on Schedule B indicating that he had signature authority over foreign accounts. He also contends that reversal on the false return counts would require a new trial on the fraud counts because those counts were based, in part, on Simon falsely understating his income. See Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298, 311–12, 77 S.Ct. 1064, 1 L.Ed.2d 1356 (1957), overruled on other grounds by Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1, 98 S.Ct. 2141, 57 L.Ed.2d 1 (1978) (a verdict must be set aside in cases where the verdict is supportable on one ground, but not on another, and it is impossible to tell which ground the jury selected). Because we have determined that both the FBAR counts and the false tax return counts will stand, there is no basis to challenge the remaining counts under Yates. The judgment of the district court is therefore

AFFIRMED.

[7] The government notes that the Notices were “no more authoritative than a regulation.” Brief of the Plaintiff–Appellee, at 25. This is an understatement. Official guidance from the Treasury Department and the IRS comes in many forms. Regulations are typically issued first in proposed form in a Notice of Proposed Rulemaking; public comment is invited and is considered in both written form and through possible public hearings. Final regulations are then published in the Federal Register, and we generally defer to an agency's interpretations issued in this form, when the regulations are issued pursuant to a specific directive from Congress. *See Bankers Life & Cas. UNITED STATES of America, Plaintiff,
v.
August BOHANEC and Maria Bohanec, Defendants.

Case No. 2:15–CV–4347 DDP (FFMx)
Signed December 8, 2016

Synopsis
Background: United States brought action against taxpayers to collect a civil penalty assessed for willful failure to report their interest in foreign bank accounts during tax year.

[Holding:] Following bench trial, the District Court, Dean D. Pregerson, J., held that taxpayers were at least recklessly indifferent to their statutory duty to report their interest in foreign bank accounts during tax year, thus warranting enhanced civil monetary penalties.

Ordered accordingly.

*883 FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

DEAN D. PREGERSON, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

Plaintiff, United States of America, seeks to collect a civil penalty assessed to Defendants August Bohanec and Maria Bohanec (collectively, "Defendants" or "the Bohances") for willful failure to report their interest in foreign bank accounts during tax year 2007, as required under 31 U.S.C. § 5314 and its implementing regulations. This matter was tried before the court on November 1, 2016. Having considered the submissions and arguments of the parties, as well as the evidence in the record, the court hereby makes the following findings of facts and conclusions of law.

I. FINDINGS OF FACT [1]

1. August Bohanec was born in 1933 in Slovenia.

2. August Bohanec immigrated to the United States in 1961 and became a naturalized citizen of the United States in the mid-to-late 1960s.

3. Before immigrating to the United States, August Bohanec was trained as a tool-and-die maker.

4. Maria Bohanec was born in 1943 in Mexico.

5. Maria Bohanec immigrated to the United States in the 1960s and became a naturalized citizen of the United States in the 1990s.

6. The highest level of education Maria Bohanec has is the 6th grade in Mexico.

7. August Bohanec and Maria Bohanec have been continuously married since at least 1970.

8. August Bohanec owns two camera-related patents. (Reporter's Transcript ("RT") 32:2–3.)

9. August Bohanec obtained the two patents without any assistance from a lawyer or anyone else. (RT 32:6–19.)

10. In the 1970s, the Bohanecs purchased a camera shop in Pasadena, California, called Alvin's ("the camera shop").

11. The Bohanecs knew that they had to file tax returns for the camera shop business and that if they earned money, they had to pay taxes. (RT 7:11–13, 22–23.)

12. The Bohanecs always had a tax preparer prepare the camera shop's tax returns. (RT 7:17–19, 24–25; 8:1–2.)

13. The Bohanecs initially sold many different brands of cameras at the camera shop.

14. The camera shop lost sales to larger discount stores that sold Japanese cameras. (RT 25:7–11.)

15. The Bohanecs came to an agreement with Leica, a German camera manufacturer, to become an exclusive Leica dealer.

16. The camera shop was the only exclusive Leica dealer in the world. (RT 25:15–17.)

17. The Bohanecs initially obtained their Leica merchandise from Leica's distributor in New Jersey, which was the exclusive distributor of Leica products in the United States.

18. After other retailers complained about the deals the camera shop received from Leica's New Jersey distributor, the distributor began restricting 884 supply to the Bohanecs' camera shop. (RT 25:24–25; 26:1–6.)

19. Leica had a subsidiary in Canada called Leitz Canada.

20. Through the camera shop, the Bohanecs became acquainted with the president of Leitz Canada, Walter Kluck ("Kluck").

21. Sometime in the late 1970s or the early-to-mid 1980s, Kluck offered to sell Leica cameras to the Bohanecs directly from Leitz Canada.

22. By purchasing Leica cameras from Leitz Canada, the camera shop was able to avoid the supply constraints imposed by Leica's exclusive United States distributor. (RT 26:12–20.)

23. The camera shop gained a worldwide reputation for repairing and refurbishing certain Leica camera parts. (RT 27:3–6.)

24. The camera shop shipped to customers around the world, including in the United States, the Philippines, England, South Korea, and Hong Kong. (RT 8:9–21.)

25. During the 1980s, the Bohanecs brokered transactions between Leitz Canada and various camera retailers around the world. Kluck contacted the Bohanecs requesting their assistance in finding international buyers, for which the Bohanecs would earn a commission.

26. Commissions for international sales were deposited into an account at UBS AG in Switzerland in the Bohanecs' name.

27. UBS AG is a Swiss financial-services company.

28. Kluck opened the Swiss account on the Bohanecs' behalf. (RT 11:3–4, 29:1–3.)

29. The Bohanecs did not provide UBS AG with their home address. (RT 29:10–14.)

30. The Bohanecs did not tell anyone in the United States, other than their two children, of the existence of the Swiss account. (RT 33:9–21.)

31. By the time the Bohanecs had the Swiss account, they no longer used a bookkeeper or kept any books. (RT 13:1–8.)

32. The Bohanecs never discussed the Swiss account with an accountant, lawyer, or banker. (RT 13:14–21, 29:20–25, 30:1–8.)

33. In addition to the Leitz Canada commission deposits, the Bohanecs directed their international customers, on at least a few occasions, to deposit money directly into the Swiss UBS account.

34. The Bohanecs did not report the commission income they received from Leitz Canada on their federal income-tax returns.

35. The UBS account was managed by Walter Kluck while he was alive and, thereafter, by UBS.

36. At some point, Kluck told the Bohanecs that the Bohanecs' UBS account had a balance in excess of $700,000.

37. The Bohanecs closed Alvin's Camera sometime in the late 1980s.

38. Beginning in the early 2000s and continuing through at least 2009, the Bohanecs sold Leitz cameras and parts on Ebay.

39. The Bohanecs would occasionally withdraw money from their UBS account.

40. In June 2003, the Bohanecs transferred $10,000 from their UBS account in Switzerland to their daughter, Yolanda Reischer–Bohanec. Exhibit 11 is a copy of the UBS notice regarding this transfer.

41. In July, 2003, the Bohanecs transferred $25,000 from their UBS account 885 in Switzerland to August Bohanec's account at Steiermärkische Bank in Austria. Exhibit 12 is a copy of the UBS notice regarding this transfer.

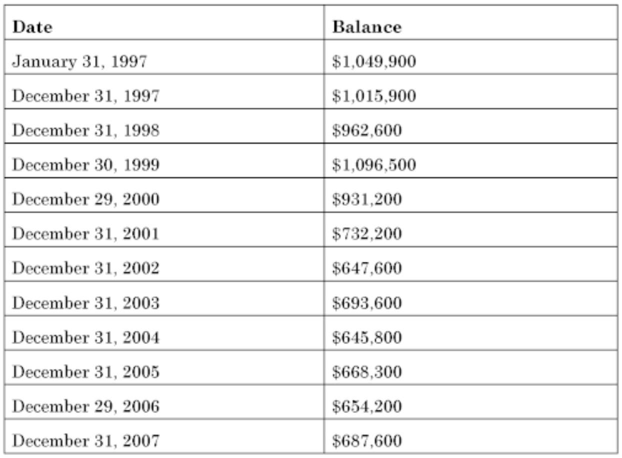
42. In December 2003, the Bohanecs transferred $20,000 from their UBS account in Switzerland to their bank account in Austria. Exhibit 13 is a copy of the UBS notice regarding this transfer.

43. In February 2006, the Bohanecs opened a bank account in Mexico and transferred $25,000 from their UBS account in Switzerland to Mexico for expenses related to a house they were building in Mexico. Exhibit 14 is a copy of the UBS notice regarding this transfer. (RT 18:18–23.)

44. In November 2006, the Bohanecs transferred $7,500 from their UBS account in Switzerland to their Bank of America account in Pasadena, California. Exhibit 15 is a copy of the UBS notice regarding this transfer.

45. In addition, from October 2004 through October 2008, the Bohanecs made several other withdrawals from their UBS account in Switzerland. Exhibits 17 through 22 are copies of statements from UBS with notations reflecting these withdrawals.

46. The UBS account had the following balances on the following dates as reflected in Exhibit 10:



Date	Balance
January 31, 1997	$1,049,900
December 31, 1997	$1,015,900
December 31, 1998	$962,600
December 30, 1999	$1,096,500
December 29, 2000	$931,200
December 31, 2001	$732,200
December 31, 2002	$647,600
December 31, 2003	$693,600
December 31, 2004	$645,800
December 31, 2005	$668,300
December 29, 2006	$654,200
December 31, 2007	$687,600

47. United States citizens who have a financial interest in, or signature authority over, a foreign bank account are required to file a Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts ("FBAR").

48. The deadline for filing the FBAR for 2007 was June 30, 2008.

49. In 2007, in addition to the UBS account in Switzerland, August Bohanec had the bank account in Austria, into which were deposited periodic disability payments he received for an eye 886 injury he sustained before immigrating to the United States.

50. In 2007, in addition to the bank accounts in Austria and Switzerland, the Bohanecs also maintained the bank account in Mexico, into which they would deposit money from their UBS account in Switzerland to build and maintain the house in Mexico.

51. The Bohanecs did not file an FBAR for 2007.

52. As of June 30, 2008, the Bohanecs' UBS account had a balance of $643,662 as reflected on Exhibit 8.

53. Before June 30, 2008, the most recent tax return the Bohanecs filed was for tax year 1998.

54. In their 1998 tax return, the Bohanecs reported an adjusted gross income of $62,237 and a federal income tax of $7,480, which was timely paid. A copy of the IRS transcript for this account is exhibit 38.

55. Part III to Schedule B of the 1998 tax form 1040 concerns foreign accounts and trusts. (Ex. 39.)

56. Question 7a in Part III to the Schedule B asks the following question: "At any time during 1998, did you have an interest in or a signature or other authority over a financial account in a foreign country, such as a bank account, securities account, or other financial account? See page B–2 for exceptions and filing requirements for Form TD F 90–22.1." (Ex. 39.)

57. Page B–2 of the instructions for Schedule B for 1998 states: "See [FBAR] Form TD F 90–22.1 to find out if you are considered to have an interest in or signature or other authority over a financial account in a foreign country (such as a bank account, securities account, or other financial account)." (Ex. 40.)

58. Page B–2 of the instructions for Schedule B for 1998 also states: "If you checked the Yes box on line 7a, file [FBAR] Form TD F 90–22.1 by June 30, 1999, with the Department of the Treasury at the address shown on that form." (Ex. 40.)

59. In May and June of 2009, the Bohanecs transferred a total of $522,796.55 from their UBS account to a new account at Steiermärkische Bank. Exhibit 16 is a letter from Steiermärkische Bank und Sparkassen AG enclosing records for these transfers.

56. On January 29, 2010, the Bohanecs closed the Austrian account at Steiermärkische Bank and transferred the balance of $523,677.40 to their account at Bank of America in Pasadena, California. Exhibit 16 is a letter from Steiermärkische Bank und Sparkassen AG enclosing records for these transfers.

57. Between the filing of their 1998 federal income-tax return and May 19, 2011, the Bohanecs did not file any federal income-tax returns.

58. Between the opening of the UBS account and May 19, 2011, the Bohanecs did not file any FBARs.

59. On January 6, 2010, the Bohanecs executed an application to participate in the IRS's Voluntary Disclosure Program for Offshore Accounts. Exhibit 23 is a copy of this application.

60. The Bohanecs' application, submitted under penalty of perjury, represented that the "original balance and all funds deposited into the [Swiss UBS] account were after-tax earnings from our used camera business." (Ex. 23.)

61. On January 19, 2010, the Bohanecs were preliminarily accepted into the Voluntary Disclosure Program for Offshore Accounts. Exhibit 24 is a copy of this application.

887 62. On May 19, 2011, the Bohanecs executed and filed FBARs for 2003, 2004, 2005, 2006, 2007, and 2008. Exhibits 25 through 30 are copies of these FBARs.

63. On May 19, 2011, the Bohanecs executed and filed federal income-tax returns for 2003, 2004, 2005, 2006, 2007, and 2008. Exhibits 31 through 36 are copies of these tax returns.

64. While the FBARs filed by the Bohanecs in May 2011 for 2003, 2004, 2005, 2006, 2007, and 2008 included the UBS account, they did not include the Austrian account, which was in existence during 2003 through 2008.

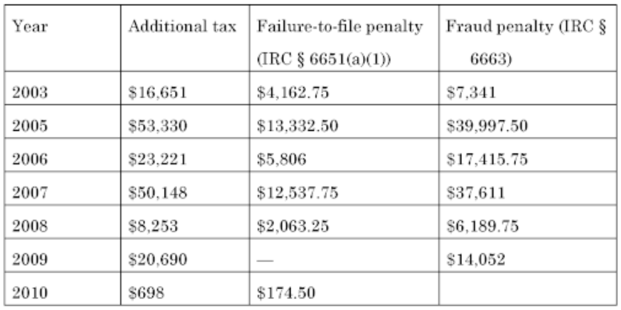
65. The FBARs for 2006, 2007, and 2008 filed by the Bohanecs in May 2011 did not include the Mexican account, which was in existence during 2006 through 2008.

66. The Bohanecs were ultimately rejected by the IRS for the Voluntary Disclosure Program for Offshore Accounts.

67. While the federal income-tax returns for 2003, 2004, 2005, 2006, 2007, and 2008 included the interest earned on the UBS accounts, they did not include the income earned by the Bohanecs from their EBay sales.

68. On October 3, 2013, the IRS issued a notice of deficiency for tax year 2003 through 2010. Exhibit 37 is a copy of this notice of deficiency.

69. As reflected in the October 3, 2013, notice of deficiency, after audit, the IRS determined the additional tax and penalties:



Year	Additional tax	Failure-to-file penalty (IRC § 6651(a)(1))	Fraud penalty (IRC § 6663)
2003	$16,651	$4,162.75	$7,341
2005	$53,330	$13,332.50	$39,997.50
2006	$23,221	$5,806	$17,415.75
2007	$50,148	$12,537.75	$37,611
2008	$8,253	$2,063.25	$6,189.75
2009	$20,690	—	$14,052
2010	$698	$174.50

70. The Bohanecs did not file a suit in Tax Court challenging the tax deficiencies reflected in the October 3, 2013, notice of deficiency.

71. The IRS subsequently assessed the additional tax liabilities and penalties specified the October 3, 2013, notice of deficiency.

72. As of September 19, 2016, the outstanding balance on the Bohanecs' federal income-tax liabilities for 2003, 2005, 2006, 2007, 2008, 2009, and 2010 is as follows:

888

Tax year	Outstanding balance as of September 19, 2016
2003	$25,788.63
2005	$181,082.53
2006	$71,752.07
2007	$147,596.88
2008	$23,252.12
2009	$41,627.03
2010	$1,064.35
Total	$492,163.61

II. CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

73. Each year, U.S. citizens who hold a financial account in a foreign country must report certain details about the account to the Treasury Department. See 31 U.S.C. § 5314; 31 C.F.R. § 103.24 (2009).

74. The report must be made each year by filing an FBAR with the Treasury Department no later than June 30 of the following year. See 31 C.F.R. §§ 103.27(c), (d), (e) (2009).

75. Failure to file an FBAR can result in a fine up to $10,000. 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(B).

76. If a foreign account holder "willfully" failed to report the account on an FBAR, the maximum penalty is increased from $10,000 to the greater of $100,000 or fifty percent of the balance in the account at the time of violation. 31 U.S.C. §§ 5321(a)(5)(C), (D)(ii).

[1] 77. The only dispute in this matter is whether the Bohanecs' failure to timely file an FBAR disclosing their financial interest in their foreign accounts for 2007 was willful.

78. Section 5321(a)(5) of Title 31 does not define willfulness. 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5).

79. The Supreme Court has explained that "willfully is a word of many meanings whose construction is often dependent on the context in which it appears." Safeco Ins. Co. of America v. Burr, 551 U.S. 47, 57, 127 S.Ct. 2201, 167 L.Ed.2d 1045 (2007) (internal quotations and citation omitted).

80. Although Defendants assert that "willfulness" encompasses only intentional violations of known legal duties, and not reckless disregard of statutory duties, no court has adopted that principle in a civil tax matter. The only cases Defendants cite to support their argument that "willful" means that a defendant must have knowledge and specific intent are criminal cases. See Ratzlaf v. United States, 510 U.S. 135, 114 S.Ct. 655, 126 L.Ed.2d 615 (1994) (structuring); United States v. Eisenstein, 731 F.2d 1540 (11th Cir. 1984) (felonious failure to file currency transaction reports).

81. Where willfulness is an element of civil liability, the Supreme Court generally understands the term as covering "not only knowing violations of a standard, but reckless ones as well." Safeco, 551 U.S. at 57, 127 S.Ct. 2201.

889 [2] 82. "Recklessness" is an objective standard that looks to whether conduct entails "an unjustifiably high risk of harm that is either known or so obvious that it should be known." Safeco, 551 U.S. at 68, 127 S.Ct. 2201 (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).

83. Several other courts, citing Safeco, have held that "willfulness" under 31 U.S.C. § 5321 includes reckless disregard of a statutory duty. See United States v Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. 655, 658 (4th Cir. 2012); United States v. Bussell, No. CV 15–02034 SJO(VBKx), 2015 WL 9957826 at *5 (C.D. Cal. Dec. 8, 2015); see also United States v. McBride, 908 F.Supp.2d 1186, 1204, 1209 (D. Utah 2012).

84. Defendants argue that the Chief Counsel of the Internal Revenue Service has opined, prior to Safeco, that the willfulness standard for purposes of 31 U.S.C. § 5321 is the same as the criminal standard. IRS CCA 200603026. Chief Counsel Advice, however, may not be used or cited as precedent. 26 U.S.C. § 6110(k)(3); see also Elbaz v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, T.C. Memo. 2015–49, 2015 WL 1197533 at *3 (T.C. 2015).

[3] 85. The Internal Revenue Manual's interpretation of "willfulness" for purposes of 31 U.S.C. § 5321, cited by Defendants, does not have the force of law, and is not relevant here. See Fargo v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 447 F.3d 706, 713 (9th Cir. 2006); Kimdun Inc. v. United States, No. 16–cv–01500–CAS(RAOx), 202 F.Supp.3d 1136, 1146–47, 2016 WL 4408816 at *8 (C.D. Cal. Aug. 15 2016).

[4] [5] 86. The Supreme Court has held that a heightened, clear and convincing burden of proof applies in civil matters "where particularly important individual interests or rights are at stake." Herman & MacLean v. Huddleston, 459 U.S. 375, 389, 103 S.Ct. 683, 74 L.Ed.2d 548 (1983). Such interests include parental rights, involuntary commitment, and deportation. Id. The lower, more generally applicable preponderance of the evidence standard applies, however, where "even severe civil sanctions that do not implicate such interests" are contemplated. Id. at 390, 103 S.Ct. 683; see also Grogan v. Garner, 498 U.S. 279, 286, 111 S.Ct. 654, 112 L.Ed.2d 755 (1991). The monetary sanctions at issue here do not rise to the level of "particularly important individual interests or rights." Accordingly, the preponderance of the evidence standard applies. See also McBride, 908 F.Supp.2d at 1214.

87. The government has proved by a preponderance of the evidence that Defendants were at least recklessly indifferent to a statutory duty for the following reasons:

a. Defendants were reasonably sophisticated businesspeople. For a time, Defendants' camera shop was the only exclusive Leica dealer in the world. The deals Defendants negotiated with Leica's U.S. distributor were so favorable as to motivate other Leica retailers to protest. Defendants were able to circumvent Leica's supply restrictions by entering into an international agreement with Leitz Canada. Defendants had a worldwide reputation and sold and shipped to customers around the world. Defendants knew that they had to pay taxes if they earned money, and that they had to file tax returns. Defendants always used a tax preparer to prepare the camera shop's tax returns. Defendant August Bohanec was sufficiently sophisticated 890 to obtain two patents without assistance. Defendants also managed the construction of a home along the coast of Mexico, including the hiring of a contractor and the opening of a Mexican bank account.

b. Defendants were at least reckless, if not willfully blind, in their conduct with respect to their Swiss UBS account and their reporting obligations regarding the account.[2] Defendants never provided UBS with their home address, and never told anyone other than their children of the existence of the UBS account, including the tax preparers Defendants hired to help them file tax returns. Defendants never asked a lawyer, accountant, or banker about requirements regarding the UBS account, and never used a bookkeeper or kept any books once the UBS account was opened.

c. Defendants' representations that they were unaware of or did not understand their obligations, and deferred entirely to Kluck, are not credible. Part III of Schedule B of Defendants' 1998 tax return put them on notice that they needed to file an FBAR. Defendants not only deposited commissions from their Leitz Canada deals into the UBS account, but also directed customers to deposit payment into the account and made several transfers and withdrawals from the UBS account to other foreign and domestic accounts. Self-serving testimony that Defendants believed that there were no requirements regarding the account because they were intended to use the funds in the account "for retirement" is sufficiently incredible, particularly in light of Defendants' level of sophistication, to call into question the veracity of the remainder of their testimony. (RT 14:7–23.)

d. Defendants' credibility is further undermined by their conduct with respect to their application to participate in the IRS' Voluntary Disclosure Program for Offshore Accounts. Defendants made several misrepresentations under penalty of perjury. Defendants misrepresented, for example, that all of the funds in the UBS account were after-tax proceeds from Defendants' used camera business, when in fact the account included Leitz Canada commissions that had never been reported on income tax returns. The application also failed to disclose Defendants' Austrian bank account. Furthermore, Defendants then proceeded to file false tax returns for 2003–2008 that did not include any of Defendants' income from internet sales. Defendants' FBARs for 2003–2008 did not disclose the Austrian account and the FBARs for 2006–2008 did not disclose the Mexican account.

III. CONCLUSION

Defendants' failure to timely file an FBAR for 2007 was willful. The maximum penalty is therefore increased to the greater of $100,000 or fifty percent of the balance in the foreign accounts on June 30, 2008.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

Supreme Court of the United States

Waldemar RATZLAF and Loretta Ratzlaf, Petitioners,
v.
UNITED STATES.

No. 92–1196.
Argued Nov. 1, 1993.
Decided Jan. 11, 1994.

Synopsis

Defendant was convicted in the United States District Court for the District of Nevada, Edward C. Reed, Jr., Chief Judge, of structuring financial transactions to avoid currency reporting requirements, and he appealed. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, 976 F.2d 1280,affirmed. Certiorari was granted. The Supreme Court, Justice Ginsburg, held that to establish the defendant "willfully violated" the antistructuring law, government must prove defendant acted with knowledge that his conduct was unlawful.

Reversed and remanded.

Justice Blackmun dissented and filed opinion in which the Chief Justice and Justice O'Connor and Justice Thomas joined.

As here relevant, federal law requires a domestic bank involved in a cash transaction exceeding $10,000 to file a report with the Secretary of the Treasury, 31 U.S.C. § 5313(a), 31 CFR § 103.22(a); makes it illegal to "structure" a transaction—i.e., to break up a single transaction above the reporting threshold into two or more separate transactions—"for the purpose of evading the reporting requiremen[t]," 31 U.S.C. § 5324(3); and sets out criminal penalties for "[a] person willfully violating" the antistructuring provision, § 5322(a). After the judge at petitioner Waldemar Ratzlaf's trial on charges of violating §§ 5322(a) and 5324(3) instructed the jury that the Government had to prove both that the defendant knew of the § 5313(a) reporting obligation and that he attempted to evade that obligation, but did not have to prove that he knew the structuring in which he engaged was unlawful, Ratzlaf was convicted, fined, and sentenced to prison. In affirming, the Court of Appeals upheld the trial court's construction of the legislation.

Held: To give effect to § 5322(a)'s "willfulness" requirement, the Government must prove that the defendant acted with knowledge that the structuring he or she undertook was unlawful, not simply that the defendant's purpose was to circumvent a bank's reporting obligation. Section 5324 itself forbids structuring with a "purpose of evading the [§ 5313(a)] reporting requirements," and the lower courts erred in treating the "willfulness" requirement essentially as words of no consequence. Viewing §§ 5322(a) and 5324(3) in light of the complex of provisions in which they are embedded, it is significant that the omnibus "willfulness" requirement, when applied to other provisions in the same statutory subchapter, consistently has been read by the Courts of Appeals to require both knowledge of the reporting requirement and a specific intent to commit the crime or to disobey the law. The "willfulness" requirement must be construed the same way each time it is called into play. Because currency structuring is not inevitably nefarious, this Court is unpersuaded by the United States' argument that structuring is so obviously "evil" or inherently "bad" that the "willfulness" requirement is satisfied irrespective of the defendant's knowledge of the illegality of structuring. The interpretation adopted in this case does not dishonor the venerable principle that ignorance of the law generally is no 136 defense to a criminal charge, for Congress may decree otherwise in particular contexts, and has done so in the present instance. Pp. 659–663.

Justice GINSBURG delivered the opinion of the Court.

[1] Federal law requires banks and other financial institutions to file reports with the Secretary of the Treasury whenever they are involved in a cash transaction that exceeds $10,000. 31 U.S.C. § 5313; 31 CFR § 103.22(a) (1993). It is illegal to "structure" transactions —i.e., to break up a single transaction above the reporting threshold into two or more separate transactions—for the purpose of evading a financial institution's reporting requirement. 31 U.S.C. § 5324. "A person willfully violating" this antistructuring provision is subject to criminal penalties. § 5322. This case presents a question on which Courts of Appeals have divided: Does a defendant's purpose to circumvent a bank's reporting obligation suffice to sustain a conviction for "willfully violating" the antistructuring provision?[1] We hold that the "willfulness" 137 requirement mandates something more. To establish that a defendant "willfully violat[ed]" the antistructuring law, the Government must prove that the defendant acted with knowledge that his conduct was unlawful.

I

On the evening of October 20, 1988, defendant-petitioner Waldemar Ratzlaf ran up a debt of $160,000 playing blackjack at the High Sierra Casino in Reno, Nevada. The casino gave him one week to pay. On the due date, Ratzlaf returned to the casino with cash of $100,000 in hand. A casino official informed Ratzlaf that all transactions involving more than $10,000 in cash had to be reported to state and federal authorities. The official added that the casino could accept a cashier's check for the full amount due without triggering any reporting requirement. The casino helpfully placed a limousine at Ratzlaf's disposal, and assigned an employee to accompany him to banks in the vicinity. Informed that banks, too, are required to report cash transactions in excess of $10,000, Ratzlaf purchased cashier's checks, each for less than $10,000 and each from a different bank. He delivered these checks to the High Sierra Casino.

Based on this endeavor, Ratzlaf was charged with "structuring transactions" to evade the banks' obligation to report cash transactions exceeding $10,000; this conduct, the indictment alleged, violated 31 U.S.C. §§ 5322(a) and 5324(3). The trial judge instructed the jury that the Government had to prove defendant's knowledge of the banks' reporting obligation and his attempt to evade that obligation, but did not 138 have to prove defendant knew the structuring was unlawful. Ratzlaf was convicted, fined, and sentenced to prison.[2]

Ratzlaf maintained on appeal that he could not be convicted of "willfully violating" the antistructuring law solely on the basis of his knowledge that a financial institution must report currency transactions in excess of $10,000 and his intention to avoid such reporting. To gain a conviction for "willful" conduct, he asserted, the Government must prove he was aware of the illegality of the "structuring" in which he engaged. The Ninth Circuit upheld the trial court's construction *658 of the legislation and affirmed Ratzlaf's conviction. 976 F.2d 1280 (1992). We granted certiorari, 507 U.S. 1050, 113 S.Ct. 1942, 123 L.Ed.2d 648 (1993), and now conclude that, to give effect to the statutory "willfulness" specification, the Government had to prove Ratzlaf knew the structuring he undertook was unlawful. We therefore reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeals.

A

Congress enacted the Currency and Foreign Transactions Reporting Act (Bank Secrecy Act) in 1970, Pub.L. 91–508, Tit. II, 84 Stat. 1118, in response to increasing use of banks and other institutions as financial intermediaries by persons engaged in criminal activity. The Act imposes a variety of reporting requirements on individuals and institutions regarding foreign and domestic financial transactions. See 31 U.S.C. §§ 5311–5325. The reporting requirement relevant here, § 5313(a), applies to domestic financial transactions. Section 5313(a) reads:

> "When a domestic financial institution is involved in a transaction for the payment, receipt, or transfer of 139 United States coins or currency (or other monetary instruments the Secretary of the Treasury prescribes), in an amount, denomination, or > amount and denomination, or under circumstances the Secretary prescribes by regulation, the institution and any other participant in the transaction the Secretary may prescribe shall file a report on the transaction at the time and in the way the Secretary prescribes...." [3]

To deter circumvention of this reporting requirement, Congress enacted an antistructuring provision, 31 U.S.C. § 5324, as part of the Money Laundering Control Act of 1986, Pub.L. 99–570, Tit. I, Subtit. H, § 1354(a), 100 Stat. 3207–22. [4] Section 5324, [5] which Ratzlaf is charged with "willfully violating," reads:

> "No person shall for the purpose of evading the reporting requirements of section 5313(a) with respect to such transaction—

. . . . .

> 140 "(3) structure or assist in structuring, or attempt to structure or assist in structuring, any transaction with one or more domestic financial institutions." [6]

The criminal enforcement provision at issue, 31 U.S.C. § 5322(a), sets out penalties for "[a] person willfully violating," inter alia, the antistructuring provision. Section 5322(a) reads:

> "A person willfully violating this subchapter [31 U.S.C. § 5311 et seq.] or a regulation prescribed under this subchapter (except section 5315 of this title or a *659 regulation prescribed under section 5315) shall be fined not more than $250,000, or [imprisoned] for not more than five years, or both."

[2] Section 5324 forbids structuring transactions with a "purpose of evading the reporting requirements of section 5313(a)." Ratzlaf admits that he structured cash transactions, and that he did so with knowledge of, and a purpose to avoid, the banks' duty to report currency transactions in excess of $10,000. The statutory formulation (§ 5322) under which Ratzlaf was prosecuted, however, calls for proof of "willful[ness]" on the actor's part. The trial judge in Ratzlaf's case, with the Ninth Circuit's approbation, treated § 5322(a)'s "willfulness" requirement essentially as surplusage—as words of no consequence. [7] Judges should hesitate so to treat statutory terms in any setting, and resistance 141 should be heightened when the words describe an element of a criminal offense. See Pennsylvania Dept. of Public Welfare v. Davenport, 495 U.S. 552, 562, 110 S.Ct. 2126, 2133, 109 L.Ed.2d 588 (1990) (expressing "deep reluctance" to interpret statutory provisions "so as to render superfluous other provisions in the same enactment") (citation omitted); cf. Potter v. United States, 155 U.S. 438, 446, 15 S.Ct. 144, 147, 39 L.Ed. 214 (1894) (word "wilful" used to describe certain offenses but not others in same statute "cannot be regarded as mere surplusage; it means something").

[3] "Willful," this Court has recognized, is a "word of many meanings," and "its construction [is] often ... influenced by its context." Spies v. United States, 317 U.S. 492, 497, 63 S.Ct. 364, 367, 87 L.Ed. 418 (1943). Accordingly, we view §§ 5322(a) and 5324(3) mindful of the complex of provisions in which they are embedded. In this light, we count it significant that § 5322(a)'s omnibus "willfulness" requirement, when applied to other provisions in the same subchapter, consistently has been read by the Courts of Appeals to require both "knowledge of the reporting requirement" and a "specific intent to commit the crime," i.e., "a purpose to disobey the law." See United States v. Bank of New England, N.A., 821 F.2d 844, 854–859 (CA1 1987) ("willful violation" of § 5313's reporting requirement for cash transactions over $10,000 requires "voluntary, intentional, and bad purpose to disobey the law"); United States v. Eisenstein, 731 F.2d 1540, 1543 (CA11 1984) ("willful violation" of § 5313's reporting requirement for cash transactions over $10,000 requires " 'proof of the defendant's knowledge of the reporting requirement and his specific intent to commit the crime' ") (quoting United States v. Granda, 565 F.2d 922, 926 (CA5 1978)).

Notable in this regard are 31 U.S.C. § 5314, [8] concerning records and reports on monetary transactions with foreign 142 financial agencies, and § 5316, [9] concerning declaration of the transportation of more than $10,000 into, or out of, the United States. Decisions involving these provisions describe a "willful" actor as one who violates "a known legal duty." See, e.g., United States v.

Sturman, 951 F.2d 1466, 1476–1477 (CA6 1991) ("willful violation" of § 5314's *660 reporting requirement for foreign financial transactions requires proof of " 'voluntary, intentional violation of a known legal duty' ") (quoting Cheek v. United States, 498 U.S. 192, 201, 111 S.Ct. 604, 610, 112 L.Ed.2d 617 (1991)); United States v. Warren, 612 F.2d 887, 890 (CA5 1980) ("willful violation" of § 5316's reporting requirement for transportation of currency across international boundaries requires that defendant "have actually known of the currency reporting requirement and have voluntarily and intentionally violated that known legal duty"); United States v. Dichne, 612 F.2d 632, 636 (CA2 1979) ("willful violation" of § 5316's reporting requirement for transportation of currency across international boundaries requires proof of defendant's " 'knowledge of the reporting requirement and his specific intent to commit the crime' ") (quoting Granda, 565 F.2d, at 926); Granda, 565 F.2d, at 924–926 (overturning conviction for "willful violation" of § 5316 because jury was not given "proper instruction [that] would include some discussion of defendant's ignorance of the law" and rejecting Government's contention that the statutory provisions "do not require that the defendant be aware of the fact that he is breaking the law").[10]

143 [4] A term appearing in several places in a statutory text is generally read the same way each time it appears. See Estate of Cowart v. Nicklos Drilling Co., 505 U.S. 469, 479, 112 S.Ct. 2589, 2596, 120 L.Ed.2d 379 (1992). We have even stronger cause to construe a single formulation, here § 5322(a), the same way each time it is called into play. See United States v. Aversa, 984 F.2d 493, 498 (CA1 1993) (en banc) ("Ascribing various meanings to a single iteration of [§ 5322(a)'s willfulness requirement]—reading the word differently for each code section to which it applies—would open Pandora's jar. If courts can render meaning so malleable, the usefulness of a single penalty provision for a group of related code sections will be eviscerated and ... almost any code section that references a group of other code sections would become susceptible to individuated interpretation.").

[5] The United States urges, however, that § 5324 violators, by their very conduct, exhibit a purpose to do wrong, which suffices to show "willfulness":

> "On occasion, criminal statutes—including some requiring proof of 'willfulness'—have been understood to require proof of an intentional violation of a known legal duty, i.e., specific knowledge by the defendant that his conduct is unlawful. But where that construction has been adopted, it has been invoked only to ensure that the defendant acted with a wrongful purpose. See Liparota v. United States, 471 U.S. 419, 426, 105 S.Ct. 2084, 2088, 85 L.Ed.2d 434 (1985)....

> "The anti-structuring statute, 31 U.S.C. § 5324, satisfies the 'bad purpose' component of willfulness by explicitly defining the wrongful purpose necessary to violate the law: it requires proof that the defendant acted with the purpose to evade the reporting requirement of Section 5313(a)." Brief for United States 23–25.

144 " '[S]tructuring is not the kind of activity that an ordinary person would engage in innocently,' " the United States asserts. Id., at 29, 105 S.Ct. at 2090 (quoting United States v. Hoyland, 914 F.2d 1125, 1129 (CA9 1990)). It is therefore "reasonable," the Government concludes, "to hold a structurer responsible for evading the reporting requirements without the need to prove specific knowledge that such evasion is unlawful." Brief for United States 29.

Undoubtedly there are bad men who attempt to elude official reporting requirements in order to hide from Government inspectors such criminal activity as laundering drug money or tax evasion.[11] But currency *661 structuring is not inevitably nefarious. Consider, for example, the small business operator who knows that reports filed under 31 U.S.C. § 5313(a) are available to the Internal Revenue Service. To reduce the risk of an IRS audit, she brings $9,500 in cash to the bank twice each week, in lieu of transporting over $10,000 once each week. That person, if the United States is right, has committed a criminal offense, because she structured cash transactions "for the specific purpose of depriving the Government of the information that Section 5313(a) is designed to obtain." Brief for United States 28–29. 145 [12] Nor is a person who structures a currency transaction invariably motivated by a desire to keep the Government in the dark. But under the Government's construction an individual would commit a felony against the United States by making cash deposits in small doses, fearful that the bank's reports would increase the likelihood of burglary,[13] or in an endeavor to keep a former spouse unaware of his wealth.[14]

Courts have noted "many occasions" on which persons, without violating any law, may structure transactions "in order to avoid the impact of some regulation or tax." United States v. Aversa, 762 F.Supp. 441, 446 (NH 1991), aff'd in part, 984 F.2d 493 (CA1 1993). This Court, over a century ago, supplied an illustration:

> "The Stamp Act of 1862 imposed a duty of two cents upon a bank-check, when drawn for an amount not less than twenty dollars. A careful individual, having the amount of twenty dollars to pay, pays the same by handing to his creditor two checks of ten dollars each. He thus draws checks in payment of his debt to the amount 146 of twenty dollars, and yet pays no stamp duty.... While his operations deprive the government of the duties it might reasonably expect to receive, it is not perceived that the practice is open to the charge of fraud. He resorts to devices to avoid the payment of duties, but they are not illegal. He has the legal right to split up his evidences of payment, and thus to avoid the tax." United States v. Isham, 84 U.S. (17 Wall.) 496, 506, 21 L.Ed. 728 (1873).

In current days, as an amicus noted, countless taxpayers each year give a gift of $10,000 on December 31 and an identical gift the next day, thereby legitimately avoiding the taxable gifts reporting required by 26 U.S.C. § 2503(b).[15] See Brief for National Association *662 of Criminal Defense Lawyers as Amicus Curiae 16.

In light of these examples, we are unpersuaded by the argument that structuring is so obviously "evil" or inherently "bad" that the "willfulness" requirement is satisfied irrespective of the defendant's knowledge of the illegality of structuring. Had Congress wished to dispense with the requirement, it could have furnished the appropriate instruction.[16]

[6] [7] In § 5322, Congress subjected to criminal penalties only those "willfully violating" § 5324, signaling its intent to require for conviction proof that the defendant knew not only 147 of the bank's duty to report cash transactions in excess of $10,000, but also of his duty not to avoid triggering such a report. There are, we recognize, contrary indications in the statute's legislative history.[17] But we do not resort to legislative 148 history to cloud a statutory text that is clear.[18] *663 Moreover, were we to find § 5322(a)'s "willfulness" requirement ambiguous as applied to § 5324, we would resolve any doubt in favor of the defendant. Hughey v. United States, 495 U.S. 411, 422, 110 S.Ct. 1979, 1985, 109 L.Ed.2d 408 (1990) (lenity principles "demand resolution of ambiguities in criminal statutes in favor of the defendant"); Crandon v. United States, 494 U.S. 152, 160, 110 S.Ct. 997, 1002–1003, 108 L.Ed.2d 132 (1990) ("Because construction of a criminal statute must be guided by the need for fair warning, it is rare that legislative history or statutory policies will support a construction of a statute broader than that clearly warranted by the text."); United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336, 347–350, 92 S.Ct. 515, 522–524, 30 L.Ed.2d 488 (1971) (rule of lenity premised on concepts that " 'fair warning should be given to the world in language that the common world will understand, of what the law intends to do if a certain line is passed' " and that "legislatures and not courts should define 149 criminal activity") (quoting McBoyle v. United States, 283 U.S. 25, 27, 51 S.Ct. 340, 341, 75 L.Ed. 816 (1931) (Holmes, J.)).

We do not dishonor the venerable principle that ignorance of the law generally is no defense to a criminal charge. See Cheek v. United States, 498 U.S. 192, 199, 111 S.Ct. 604, 609, 112 L.Ed.2d 617 (1991); Barlow v. United States, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 404, 410–412, 8 L.Ed. 728 (1833) (Story, J.). In particular contexts, however, Congress may decree otherwise. That, we hold, is what Congress has done with respect to 31 U.S.C. § 5322(a) and the provisions it controls. To convict Ratzlaf of the crime with which he was charged, violation of 31 U.S.C. §§ 5322(a) and 5324(3), the jury had to find he knew the structuring in which he engaged was unlawful.[19] Because the jury was not properly instructed in this regard, we reverse the judgment of the Ninth Circuit and remand this case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

150 Justice BLACKMUN, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE, Justice O'CONNOR, and Justice THOMAS join, dissenting.

On October 27, 1988, petitioner Waldemar Ratzlaf[1] arrived at a Nevada casino with a shopping bag full of cash to pay off a $160,000 gambling debt. He told casino personnel he did not want any written report of the payment to be made. The casino vice president informed Ratzlaf that he could not accept a cash payment of more than $10,000 without filing a report.

Ratzlaf, along with his wife and a casino employee, then proceeded to visit several *664 banks in and around Stateline, Nevada, and South Lake Tahoe, California, purchasing separate cashier's checks, each in the amount of $9,500. At some banks the Ratzlafs attempted to buy two checks—one for each of them—and were told that a report would have to be filed; on those occasions they canceled the transactions. Ratzlaf then returned to the casino and paid off $76,000 of his debt in cashier's checks. A few weeks later, Ratzlaf gave three persons cash to purchase additional cashier's checks in amounts less than $10,000. The Ratzlafs themselves also bought five more such checks in the course of a week.

A jury found beyond a reasonable doubt that Ratzlaf knew of the financial institutions' duty to report cash transactions in excess of $10,000 and that he structured transactions for the specific purpose of evading the reporting requirements.

The Court today, however, concludes that these findings are insufficient for a conviction under 31 U.S.C. §§ 5322(a) and 5324(3),[2] because a defendant also must have known that the structuring in which he engaged was illegal. Because this conclusion lacks support in the text of the statute, conflicts in my view with basic principles governing the interpretationof 151 criminal statutes, and is squarely undermined by the evidence of congressional intent, I dissent.

I

"The general rule that ignorance of the law or a mistake of law is no defense to criminal prosecution is deeply rooted in the American legal system." Cheek v. United States, 498 U.S. 192, 199, 111 S.Ct. 604, 609, 112 L.Ed.2d 617 (1991). The Court has applied this common-law rule "in numerous cases construing criminal statutes." Ibid., citing United States v. International Minerals & Chemical Corp., 402 U.S. 558, 91 S.Ct. 1697, 29 L.Ed.2d 178 (1971); Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87, 119–124, 94 S.Ct. 2887, 2908–2911, 41 L.Ed.2d 590 (1974); and Boyce Motor Lines, Inc. v. United States, 342 U.S. 337, 72 S.Ct. 329, 96 L.Ed. 367 (1952).

Thus, the term "willfully" in criminal law generally "refers to consciousness of the act but not to consciousness that the act is unlawful." Cheek, 498 U.S., at 209, 111 S.Ct., at 614 (SCALIA, J., concurring in judgment); see also Browder v. United States, 312 U.S. 335, 341, 61 S.Ct. 599, 603, 85 L.Ed. 862 (1941); Potter v. United States, 155 U.S. 438, 446, 15 S.Ct. 144, 147, 39 L.Ed. 214 (1894); American Surety Co. of New York v. Sullivan, 7 F.2d 605, 606 (CA2 1925) (L. Hand, J.) ("[T]he word 'willful' ... means no more than that the person charged with the duty knows what he is doing," not that "he must suppose that he is breaking the law"); American Law Institute, Model Penal Code § 2.02(8) (1985) ("A requirement that an offense be committed wilfully is satisfied if a person acts knowingly with respect to the material elements of the offense, unless a purpose to impose further requirements appears").

As the majority explains, 31 U.S.C. § 5322(a), originally enacted in 1970, imposes criminal penalties upon "person[s] willfully violating this subchapter." The subchapter (entitled "Records and Reports on Monetary Instruments Transactions") contains several different reporting requirements, including § 5313, which requires financial institutions to file reports for cash transactions over an amount prescribed by regulation; § 5314, which requires reports for transactions with foreign financial agencies; and § 5316, which requires 152 reports for transportation of more than $10,000 into or out of the United States. In 1986, Congress added § 5324 to the subchapter to deter rampant evasion by customers of financial institutions' duty to report large cash transactions. See infra, at 669, and n. 13. The new section provides: "No person shall for the purpose of evading the reporting requirements of section 5313(a) ... (3) structure ... any transaction with one or more domestic financial institutions."

*665 Unlike other provisions of the subchapter, the antistructuring provision identifies the purpose that is required for a § 5324 violation: "evading the reporting requirements." The offense of structuring, therefore, requires (1) knowledge of a financial institution's reporting requirements, and (2) the structuring of a transaction for the purpose of evading those requirements. These elements define a violation that is "willful" as that term is commonly interpreted. The majority's additional requirement that an actor have actual knowledge that structuring is prohibited strays from the statutory text, as well as from our precedents interpreting criminal statutes generally and "willfulness" in particular.

The Court reasons that the interpretation of the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, and that of nine other Circuits,[3] renders § 5322(a)'s willfulness requirement superfluous. See ante, at 658–659. This argument ignores the generality 153 of § 5322(a), which sets a single standard—willfulness—for the subchapter's various reporting provisions. Some of those provisions do not themselves define willful conduct, so the willfulness element cannot be deemed surplusage. Moreover, the fact that § 5322(a) requires willfulness for criminal liability to be imposed does not mean that each of the underlying offenses to which it applies must involve something less than willfulness. Thus, the fact that § 5324 does describe a "willful" offense, since it already requires "the purpose of evading the reporting requirements," provides no basis for imposing an artificially heightened scienter requirement.

The majority also contends that § 5322(a)'s willfulness element, when applied to the subchapter's other provisions, has been read by the Courts of Appeals to require knowledge of and a purpose to disobey the law. See ante, at 659–660. In fact, the cases to which the majority refers stand for the more subtle proposition that a willful violation requires knowledge of the pertinent reporting requirements and a purpose to avoid compliance with them.[4] Consistent *666 with and in light 154 of that construction, Congress' 1986 enactment prohibited structuring "for the purpose of evading the reporting requirements." The level of knowledge imposed by the term "willfully" as it applies to all the underlying offenses in the subchapter on reporting requirements is "knowledge of the reporting requirements."[5]

The Court next concludes that its interpretation of "willfully" is warranted because structuring is not inherently "nefarious." See ante, at 660–661. It is true that the Court, on occasion, has imposed a knowledge-of-illegality requirement upon criminal statutes to ensure that the defendant acted with a wrongful purpose. See, e.g., Liparota v. United 155 States, 471 U.S. 419, 426, 105 S.Ct. 2084, 2088, 85 L.Ed.2d 434 (1985). I cannot agree, however, that the imposition of such a requirement is necessary here. First, the conduct at issue—splitting up transactions involving tens of thousands of dollars in cash for the specific purpose of circumventing a bank's reporting duty—is hardly the sort of innocuous activity involved in cases such as Liparota, in which the defendant had been convicted of fraud for purchasing food stamps for less than their face value. Further, an individual convicted of structuring is, by definition, aware that cash transactions are regulated, and he cannot seriously argue that he lacked notice of the law's intrusion into the particular sphere of activity. Cf. Lambert v. California, 355 U.S. 225, 229, 78 S.Ct. 240, 243, 2 L.Ed.2d 228 (1957). By requiring knowledge of a bank's reporting requirements as well as a "purpose of evading" those requirements, the antistructuring provision targets those who knowingly act to deprive the Government of information to which it is entitled. In my view, that is not so plainly innocent a purpose as to justify reading into the statute the additional element of knowledge of illegality.[6] In 156 any event, Congress has determined that purposefully *667 structuring transactions is not innocent conduct.[7]

In interpreting federal criminal tax statutes, this Court has defined the term "willfully" as requiring the " 'voluntary, intentional violation of a known legal duty.' " Cheek v. United States, 498 U.S., at 200, 111 S.Ct., at 610, quoting United States v. Bishop, 412 U.S. 346, 360, 93 S.Ct. 2008, 2017, 36 L.Ed.2d 941 (1973); see also United States v. Murdock, 290 U.S. 389, 394–396, 54 S.Ct. 223, 225–226, 78 L.Ed. 381 (1933). Our rule in the tax area, however, is an "exception to the traditional rule," applied "largely due to the complexity of the tax laws." Cheek, 498 U.S., at 200, 111 S.Ct., at 609; see also Browder v. United States, 312 U.S., at 341–342, 61 S.Ct., at 603. The rule is inapplicable here, where, far from being complex, the provisions involved are perhaps among the simplest in the United States Code.[8]

Although I believe the statutory language is clear in light of our precedents, the legislative history confirms that Congress intended to require knowledge of (and a purpose to evade) the reporting requirements but not specific knowledge of the illegality of structuring.[9]

Before 1986, the reporting requirements included no provision explicitly prohibiting the structuring of transactions to evade the reporting requirements. The Government attempted to combat purposeful evasion of the reporting requirements through 18 U.S.C. § 1001, which applies to anyone who "knowingly and willfully falsifies, conceals or covers up by any trick, scheme, or device a material fact" within the jurisdiction of a federal agency, and 18 U.S.C. § 2(b), which applies to anyone who "willfully causes an act to be done which if directly performed by him or another would be an offense" under federal law. Some Courts of Appeals upheld application of those criminal statutes where a report would have been filed but for the defendant's purposeful structuring. See, e.g., United States v. Tobon–Builes, 706 F.2d 1092, 1096–1101 (CA11 1983); United States v. Heyman, 794 F.2d 788, 790–793 (CA2), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 989, 107 S.Ct. 585, 93 L.Ed.2d 587 (1986). As the leading case explained, a defendant's willfulness was established if he "knew about the currency reporting requirements and ... purposely sought to prevent the financial institutions from filing required reports ... by structuring his transactions as multiple smaller transactions under $10,000." Tobon–Builes, 706 F.2d, at 1101.

*668 Other courts rejected imposition of criminal liability for structuring under §§ 1001 and 2(b), concluding either that the 158 law did not impose a duty not to structure or that criminal liability was confined to limited forms of structuring. See, e.g., United States v. Varbel, 780 F.2d 758, 760–763 (CA9 1986); United States v. Denemark, 779 F.2d 1559, 1561–1564 (CA11 1986); United States v. Anzalone, 766 F.2d 676, 679–683 (CA1 1985).

Congress enacted the antistructuring provision in 1986 "to fill a loophole in the Bank Secrecy Act caused by" the latter three decisions, which "refused to apply the sanctions of [the Act] to transactions 'structured' to evade the act's $10,000 cash reporting requirement." S.Rep. No. 99–433, p. 7 (1986). As explained by the Report of the Senate Judiciary Committee:

> "[The antistructuring provision] would codify Tobon–Builes and like cases and would negate the effect of Anzalone, Varbel and Denemark. It would expressly subject to potential liability a person who causes or attempts to cause a financial institution to fail to file a required report or who causes a financial institution to file a required report that contains material omissions or misstatements of fact. In addition, the proposed amendment would create the offense of structuring a transaction to evade the reporting requirements, without regard to whether an individual transaction is, itself, reportable under the Bank Secrecy Act." Id., at 22.

See also H.R.Rep. No. 99–746, pp. 18–19, and n. 1 (1986). Congress' stated purpose to "codify Tobon–Builes " reveals its intent to incorporate Tobon–Builes' standard for a willful violation, which required knowledge of the reporting requirements and a purpose to evade them. Nothing in Tobon–Builes suggests that knowledge of the illegality of one's conduct is required.[10]

159 The Senate Report proceeds to explain the intent required under the antistructuring provision:

> "For example, a person who converts $18,000 in currency to cashier's checks by purchasing two $9,000 cashier's checks at two different banks or on two different days 160 with the specific intent that the participating *669 bank or banks not be required to file Currency Transaction Reports for those transactions, would be subject to potential civil and criminal liability. A person conducting the same transactions for any other reasons or a person splitting up an amount of currency that would not be reportable if the full amount were involved in a single transaction (for example, splitting $2,000 in currency into four transactions of $500 each), would not be subject to liability under the proposed amendment." S.Rep. No. 99–433, at 22 (emphasis added).

The Committee's specification of the requisite intent as only the intent to prevent a bank from filing reports confirms that Congress did not contemplate a departure from the general rule that knowledge of illegality is not an essential element of a criminal offense.

A recent amendment to § 5324 further supports the interpretation of the court below. In 1992, Congress enacted the Annunzio–Wylie Anti–Money Laundering Act, creating a parallel antistructuring provision for the reporting requirements under 31 U.S.C. § 5316, which governs international monetary transportation. See Pub.L. 102–550, Tit. XV, § 1525(a), 106 Stat. 4064.[11] Like the provision at issue here, the new provision prohibits structuring "for the purpose of evading the reporting requirements" (in that case, the requirements of § 5316). At the time Congress amended the statute, every Court of Appeals to consider the issue had held that a willful violation of the antistructuring provision requires knowledge of the bank's reporting requirements and an intent to evade them; none had held that knowledge of the illegality of structuring was required. See n. 3, supra. 161 The House Report accompanying an earlier bill containing the pertinent provision explained:

> "Under the new provision, codified as subsection (b) of section 5324, it would be illegal to structure the importation or exportation of monetary instruments with the intent to evade the ... reporting requirement. As is the case presently for structuring cases involving currency transaction reports, the government would have to prove that the defendant knew of the ... reporting requirement, but would not have to prove that the defendant knew that structuring itself had been made illegal. United States v. Hoyland, 903 F.2d 1288 (9th Cir.1990)." H.R.Rep. No. 102–28, pt. 1, p. 45 (1991) (emphasis added).[12]

The 1992 amendment's replication of the original antistructuring provision's language strongly suggests that Congress intended to preserve the then-uniform interpretation of the scienter requirement of § 5324. See Keene Corp. v. United States, 508 U.S. 200, 212–213, 113 S.Ct. 2035, 2042–2043, 124 L.Ed.2d 118 (1993). At the very least, then, today's decision poses a dilemma for any attempt to reconcile the two parallel antistructuring provisions now codified in § 5324: Courts must either ignore clear evidence of legislative intent as to the newly added antistructuring provision or interpret its identical language differently from the antistructuring provision at issue in this case.

Finally, it cannot be ignored that the majority's interpretation of § 5324 as a practical matter largely nullifies the effect of that provision. In codifying the currency transaction reporting requirements in 1970, "Congress recognized the importance of reports of large and unusual currency transactions in ferreting out criminal activity." California Bankers Assn. v. Shultz, 416 U.S. 21, 38, 94 S.Ct. 1494, 1506, 39 L.Ed.2d 812 (1974). Congress enacted the antistructuring law to close what it perceived as 162 a major loophole in the federal reporting scheme due to easy circumvention.[13] Because requiring proof of actual knowledge of illegality will make prosecution for structuring difficult or impossible *670 in most cases,[14] the Court's decision reopens the loophole that Congress tried to close.

III

The petitioner in this case was informed by casino officials that a transaction involving more than $10,000 in cash must be reported, was informed by the various banks he visited that banks are required to report cash transactions in excess of $10,000, and then purchased $76,000 in cashier's checks, each for less than $10,000 and each from a different bank. Petitioner Ratzlaf, obviously not a person of limited intelligence, was anything but uncomprehending as he traveled from bank to bank converting his bag of cash to cashier's checks in $9,500 bundles. I am convinced that his actions constituted a "willful" violation of the antistructuring provision embodied in 31 U.S.C. § 5324. As a result of today's decision, Waldemar Ratzlaf—to use an old phrase—will be "laughing all the way to the bank."

The majority's interpretation of the antistructuring provision is at odds with the statutory text, the intent of Congress, and the fundamental principle that knowledge of illegality is not required for a criminal act. Now Congress must try again to fill a hole it rightly felt it had filled before. I dissent.

3 By regulation, the Secretary ordered reporting of "transaction [s] in currency of more than $10,000." 31 CFR § 103.22(a) (1993). Although the Secretary could have imposed a report-filing requirement on "any ... participant in the transaction," 31 U.S.C. § 5313(a), the Secretary chose to require reporting by the financial institution but not by the customer. 31 CFR § 103.22(a) (1993).

4 Other portions of this Act make "money laundering" itself a crime. See Pub.L. 99–570, Tit. XIII, § 1352(a), 100 Stat. 3207–18, codified at 18 U.S.C. § 1956(a)(2)(B) (prohibiting various transactions involving the "proceeds of some form of unlawful activity"). The Government does not assert that Ratzlaf obtained the cash used in any of the transactions relevant here in other than a lawful manner.

5 Subsequent to Ratzlaf's conviction, Congress recodified § 5324(1)–(3) as § 5324(a)(1)–(3), without substantive change. In addition, Congress added subsection (b) to replicate the prohibitions of subsection (a) in the context of international currency transactions. See Annunzio–Wylie Anti–Money Laundering Act, Pub.L. 102–550, Tit. XV, § 1525(a), 106 Stat. 4064, 31 U.S.C. § 5324 (1988 ed., Supp. IV). For simplicity, we refer to the codification in effect at the time the Court of Appeals decided this case.

6 Regarding enforcement of § 5324, the Secretary considered, but did not promulgate, a regulation requiring banks to inform currency transaction customers of the section's proscription. See 53 Fed.Reg. 7948 (1988) (proposing "procedures to notify [bank] customers of the provisions to Section 5324" in order to "insure compliance" with those provisions); 54 Fed.Reg. 20398 (1989) (withdrawing proposal).

7 The United States confirmed at oral argument that, in its view, as in the view of the courts below, "the 5324 offense is just what it would be if you never had 5322." Tr. of Oral Arg. 23.

8 Section 5314 provides that "the Secretary of the Treasury shall require a resident or citizen of the United States or a person in, and doing business in, the United States, to keep records, file reports, or keep records and file reports, when the resident, citizen, or person makes a transaction or maintains a relation for any person with a foreign financial agency."

9 Section 5316 requires the filing of reports prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury when "a person or an agent or bailee of the person ... knowingly (1) transports, is about to transport, or has transported, monetary instruments of more than $10,000 at one time" into, or out of, the United States.

10 "[S]pecific intent to commit the crime[s]" described in 31 U.S.C. §§ 5313, 5314, and 5316 might be negated by, e.g., proof that defendant relied in good faith on advice of counsel. See United States v. Eisenstein, 731 F.2d 1540, 1543–1544 (CA11 1984).

11 On brief, the United States attempted to link Ratzlaf to other bad conduct, describing at some length his repeated failure to report gambling income in his income tax returns. Brief for United States 5–7. Ratzlaf was not prosecuted, however, for these alleged misdeeds. Tr. of Oral Arg. 35–36. Nor has the Government ever asserted that Ratzlaf was engaged in other conduct Congress sought principally to check through the legislation in question—not gambling at licensed casinos, but laundering money proceeds from drug sales or other criminal ventures. See S.Rep. No. 99–433, pp. 1–2 (1986) (purpose of Act creating § 5324 is to "provide Federal law enforcement agencies with additional tools to investigate money laundering [and to] curb the spread of money laundering, by which criminals have successfully disguised the nature and source of funds from their illegal enterprises").

12 At oral argument, the United States recognized that, under its reading of the legislation, the entrepreneur in this example, absent special exemption, would be subject to prosecution. Tr. of Oral Arg. 32–34.

13 See United States v. Dollar Bank Money Market Account No. 1591768456, 980 F.2d 233, 241 (CA3 1992) (forfeiture action under 18 U.S.C. § 981(a)(1)(A) involving a cash gift deposited by the donee in several steps to avoid bank's reporting requirement; court overturned grant of summary judgment in Government's favor, noting that jury could believe donee's "legitimate explanations for organizing his deposits in amounts under $10,000," including respect for donor's privacy and fear that information regarding the donor—an "eccentric old woman [who] hid hundreds of thousands of dollars in her house"—might lead to burglary attempts).

14 See Aversa, 984 F.2d, at 495 (real estate partners feared that "paper trail" from currency transaction reports would obviate efforts to hide existence of cash from spouse of one of the partners).

15 The statute provides that "[i]n the case of gifts ... made to any person by [a] donor during [a] calendar year, the first $10,000 of such gifts to such person shall not ... be included in the total amount of gifts made during such year." 26 U.S.C. § 2503(b).

16 Congress did provide for civil forfeiture without any "willfulness" requirement in the Money Laundering Control Act of 1986. See 18 U.S.C. § 981(a) (subjecting to forfeiture "[a]ny property, real or personal, involved in a transaction ... in violation of section 5313(a) or 5324(a) of title 31 ..."); see also 31 U.S.C. § 5317(a) (subjecting to forfeiture any "monetary instrument ... being transported [when] a report on the instrument under section 5316 of this title has not been filed or contains a material omission or misstatement").

17 The United States points to one of the Senate Reports accompanying the Money Laundering Control Act of 1986, which stated that "a person who converts $18,000 in currency to cashier's checks by purchasing two $9,000 cashier's checks at two different banks or on two different days with the specific intent that the participating bank or banks not be required to file Currency Transaction Reports for those transactions, would be subject to potential civil and criminal liability." S.Rep. No. 99–433, p. 22 (1986), cited in Brief for United States 35. The same Report also indicated that § 5324 "would codify [United States v.] Tobon–Builes [, 706 F.2d 1092 (CA11 1983),] and like cases [by] expressly subject [ing] to potential liability a person who causes or attempts to cause a financial institution to fail to file a required report or who causes a financial institution to file a required report that contains material omissions or misstatements of fact." S.Rep. No. 99–433, at 22, cited in Brief for United States 33.

But the legislative history cited by the United States is hardly crystalline. The reference to United States v. Tobon–Builes, 706 F.2d 1092 (CA11 1983), is illustrative. In that case, the defendant was charged under 18 U.S.C. § 1001, the False Statements Act, with "conceal [ing] ... the existence, source, and transfer of approximately $185,200 in cash by purchasing approximately twenty-one cashier's checks in amounts less than $10,000 [and] using a variety of names, including false names...." 706 F.2d, at 1094. The defendant's "main contention," rejected by the Eleventh Circuit, was that he "could not have violated the concealment prohibition of § 1001 because he was under no legal duty to report any of his cash transactions." Id., at 1096. No "ignorance of the law" defense was asserted. Congress may indeed have "codified" that decision in § 5324 by "expressly subject[ing] to potential liability a person who causes or attempts to cause a financial institution to fail to file a required report or who causes a financial institution to file a required report that contains material omissions or misstatements of fact," S.Rep. No. 99–433, at 22, but it appears that Congress did so in the first and second subsections of § 5324, which track the Senate Report language almost verbatim. See 31 U.S.C. § 5324(1) (no person shall "cause or attempt to cause a domestic financial institution to fail to file a report required under section 5313(a)"); 31 U.S.C. § 5324(2) (no person shall "cause or attempt to cause a domestic financial institution to file a report required under section 5313(a) that contains a material omission or misstatement of fact"). Indeed, the Senate Report stated that "[i]n addition " to codifying Tobon–Builes, § 5324 would also "create the offense of structuring a transaction to evade the reporting requirements." S.Rep. No. 99–433, at 22. The relevance of Tobon–Builes to the proper construction of § 5324(3), the subsection under which Ratzlaf was convicted, is not evident.

18 See Barnhill v. Johnson, 503 U.S. 393, 401, 112 S.Ct. 1386, 1391, 118 L.Ed.2d 39 (1992) (appeals to legislative history are well taken only to resolve statutory ambiguity). See also United States v. Aversa, 984 F.2d, at 499, n. 8 (commenting that legislative history of provisions here at issue " 'is more conflicting than the [statutory] text is ambiguous' ") (quoting Wong Yang Sung v. McGrath, 339 U.S. 33, 49, 70 S.Ct. 445, 454, 94 L.Ed. 616 (1950)). As the First Circuit noted, no House, Senate, or Conference Report accompanied the final version of the Anti–Drug Abuse Act of 1986; instead, over 20 separate reports accompanied various proposed bills, portions of which were incorporated into that Act. See 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5393 (listing reports).

The dissent, see post, at 669, features a House Report issued in 1991 in connection with an unenacted version of the Annunzio–Wylie Anti–Money Laundering Act. We do not find that Report, commenting on a bill that did not pass, a secure indicator of congressional intent at any time, and it surely affords no reliable guide to Congress' intent in 1986. See Oscar Mayer & Co. v. Evans, 441 U.S. 750, 758, 99 S.Ct. 2066, 2072, 60 L.Ed.2d 609 (1979) (cautioning against giving weight to "history" written years after the passage of a statute).

19 The dissent asserts that our holding "largely nullifies the effect" of § 5324 by "mak[ing] prosecution for structuring difficult or impossible in most cases." See post, at 669–670. Even under the dissent's reading of the statute, proof that the defendant knew of the bank's duty to report is required for conviction; we fail to see why proof that the defendant knew of his duty to refrain from structuring is so qualitatively different that it renders prosecution "impossible." A jury may, of course, find the requisite knowledge on defendant's part by drawing reasonable inferences from the evidence of defendant's conduct, see Spies v. United States, 317 U.S. 492, 499–500, 63 S.Ct. 364, 368–369, 87 L.Ed. 418 (1943) (illustrating conduct that can support permissible inference of an "affirmative willful attempt" to evade a tax); United States v. Bank of New England, N.A., 821 F.2d 844, 854 (CA1 1987) (willfulness "is usually established by drawing reasonable inferences from the available facts"), and the Government has not found it "impossible" to persuade a jury to make such inferences in prosecutions for willful violations of §§ 5313, 5314, or 5316. See, e.g., United States v. Dichne, 612 F.2d 632, 636–

638 (CA2 1979) (evidence that Government took "affirmative steps" to bring the reporting requirement to the defendant's attention by means of visual notices supports inference that defendant "willfully violated" § 5316).

[1] For convenience, I follow the majority, see ante, at 657, n. 2, and refer only to Waldemar Ratzlaf in this opinion.

[2] As does the majority, I refer to the codification in effect at the time the Court of Appeals decided this case. See ante, at 658, n. 5.

[3] See United States v. Scanio, 900 F.2d 485, 489–492 (CA2 1990); United States v. Shirk, 981 F.2d 1382, 1389–1392 (CA3 1993); United States v. Rogers, 962 F.2d 342, 343–345 (CA4 1992); United States v. Beaumont, 972 F.2d 91, 93–95 (CA5 1992); United States v. Baydoun, 984 F.2d 175, 180 (CA6 1993); United States v. Jackson, 983 F.2d 757, 767 (CA7 1993); United States v. Gibbons, 968 F.2d 639, 643–645 (CA8 1992); United States v. Dashney, 937 F.2d 532, 537–540 (CA10), cert. denied, 502 U.S. 951, 112 S.Ct. 402, 116 L.Ed.2d 351 (1991); United States v. Brown, 954 F.2d 1563, 1567–1569 (CA11), cert. denied, 506 U.S. 900, 113 S.Ct. 284, 121 L.Ed.2d 210 (1992).

The only Court of Appeals to adopt a contrary interpretation is the First Circuit, and even that court allows "reckless disregard" of one's legal duty to support a conviction for structuring. See United States v. Aversa, 984 F.2d 493, 502 (1993) (en banc).

[4] The dominant formulation of the standard for a willful violation of the related provisions demands "proof of the defendant's knowledge of the reporting requirement and his specific intent to commit the crime." United States v. Granda, 565 F.2d 922, 926 (CA5 1978); see also United States v. Bank of New England, N.A., 821 F.2d 844, 854 (CA1) ("willful" violation of § 5313 requires " 'knowledge of the reporting requirements and [defendant's] specific intent to commit the crime' "), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 943, 108 S.Ct. 328, 98 L.Ed.2d 356 (1987); United States v. Eisenstein, 731 F.2d 1540, 1543 (CA11 1984) (same); United States v. Dichne, 612 F.2d 632, 636 (CA2 1979) (same standard under predecessor to § 5316), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 928, 100 S.Ct. 1314, 63 L.Ed.2d 760 (1980); United States v. Schnaiderman, 568 F.2d 1208, 1211 (CA5 1978) (same). The term "specific intent" does not, as the majority appears to assume, import the notion of knowledge of illegality. Rather, that term generally corresponds to the concept of "purpose," see United States v. Bailey, 444 U.S. 394, 405, 100 S.Ct. 624, 632, 62 L.Ed.2d 575 (1980), and it does not add to the requisite knowledge, which is specified in the first prong of the standard. The majority correctly notes that courts in a few instances have referred to a willful violation of the reporting provisions as involving violation of a "known legal duty." Those courts, however, either applied the standard from Cheek v. United States, 498 U.S. 192, 200, 111 S.Ct. 604, 609, 112 L.Ed.2d 617 (1991), despite this Court's restriction of that standard's application to the tax context, see United States v. Sturman, 951 F.2d 1466, 1476 (CA6 1991), or were referring simply to the reporting requirements as the "law" that one must know and actually applied the dominant standard from Granda, see Bank of New England, 821 F.2d, at 854; United States v. Warren, 612 F.2d 887, 890 (CA5 1980). This understanding is supported by Granda's statement that "the proper instruction would include some discussion of the defendant's ignorance of the law since the defendant's alleged ignorance of the reporting requirements goes to the heart of his or her denial of the specific intent necessary to commit the crime." 565 F.2d, at 926 (emphasis added).

[5] "Knowledge of the reporting requirements" is easily confused with "knowledge of illegality" because, in the context of the other reporting provisions—§§ 5313, 5314, and 5316—the entity that can "willfully violate" each provision is also the entity charged with the reporting duty; as a result, a violation with "knowledge of the reporting requirements" necessarily entails the entity's knowledge of the illegality of its conduct (that is, its failure to file a required report). In contrast, § 5324 prohibits a customer from purposefully evading a bank's reporting requirements, so knowledge of the reporting requirements does not collapse into actual knowledge that the customer's own conduct is prohibited. Under the cases interpreting the statute as well as fundamental principles of criminal law, it is one's knowledge of the reporting requirements, not "knowledge of the illegality of one's conduct," that makes a violation "willful." Moreover, as explained below, Congress in 1992 rejected the majority's construction when it enacted a parallel antistructuring provision for attempts to evade § 5316's reporting requirements. See infra, at 669–670.

[6] The question is not whether structuring is "so obviously 'evil' or inherently 'bad' that the 'willfulness' requirement is satisfied irrespective of the defendant's knowledge of the illegality of structuring." Ante, at 662. The general rule is that "willfulness" does not require knowledge of illegality; the inquiry under exceptional cases such as Liparota v. United States, 471 U.S. 419, 105 S.Ct. 2084, 85 L.Ed.2d 434 (1985), is whether the statute criminalizes "a broad range of apparently innocent conduct," id., at 426, 105 S.Ct., at 2088, such that it requires no element of wrongfulness.

The majority expresses concern about the potential application of the antistructuring law to a business operator who deposits cash twice each week to reduce the risk of an IRS audit. See ante, at 660–661. First, it is not at all clear that the statute would apply in this situation. If a person has legitimate business reasons for conducting frequent cash transactions, or if the transactions genuinely can be characterized as separate, rather than artificially structured, then the person is not engaged in "structuring" for the purpose of "evasion." See United States v. Brown, 954 F.2d, at 1571; S.Rep. No. 99–433, p. 22 (1986). Even if application of § 5324 were theoretically possible in this extreme situation, the example would not establish prohibition of a "broad range of apparently innocent conduct" as in Liparota, 471 U.S., at 426, 105 S.Ct., at 2088, and it would not justify reading into the statute a knowledge-of-illegality requirement.

7 "[The antistructuring provision] requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt that the purpose of the 'structured' aspect of a currency exchange was to evade the reporting requirements of the Bank Secrecy Act. It is this requirement which shields innocent conduct from prosecution." Hearing on S. 571 and S. 2306 before the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, 99th Cong., 2d Sess., 136–137 (1986) (response of Deputy Asst. Atty. Gen. Knapp and Asst. U.S. Atty. Sun to written question of Sen. D'Amato).

8 The majority offers examples of tax "avoidance" as further evidence of the apparent "innocence" of structuring transactions to evade the reporting requirements. See ante, at 661–662. These examples are inapposite because Congress specifically has prohibited the structuring of transactions to evade the reporting requirements. Indeed, its use of the word "evading" in § 5324 reveals that Congress deemed the intent to circumvent those requirements a "bad purpose." Moreover, the analogy to the tax field is flawed. Tax law involves a unique scheme consisting of myriad categories and thresholds, applied in yearly segments, designed to generate appropriate levels of taxation while also influencing behavior in various ways. Innocent "avoidance" is an established part of this scheme, and it does not operate to undermine the purposes of the tax law. In sharp contrast, evasion of the currency transaction reporting requirements completely deprives the Government of the information that those requirements are designed to obtain, and thus wholly undermines the purpose of the statute.

9 Because the statutory language unambiguously imposes no requirement of knowledge of the illegality of structuring, I would not apply the rule of lenity. Moreover, I am not persuaded that that rule should be applied to defeat a congressional purpose that is as clear as that evidenced here. See Liparota, 471 U.S., at 427, 105 S.Ct., at 2089; United States v. Bramblett, 348 U.S. 503, 509–510, 75 S.Ct. 504, 508, 99 L.Ed. 594 (1955).

10 Contrary to the majority's suggestion, ante, at 662, n. 17, Congress did sanction Tobon–Builes' scienter standard. In that case, which Congress intended to "codify," the Eleventh Circuit clearly addressed the level of knowledge required for a willful violation. See United States v. Tobon–Builes, 706 F.2d 1092, 1101 (CA11 1983). Moreover, Congress was aware of the standard that the court had adopted, explicitly characterizing Tobon–Builes as imposing criminal liability upon individuals who structure transactions "to evade the reporting requirements." S.Rep. No. 99–433, at 21.

The majority misreads the Senate Report as stating that § 5324 creates the structuring offense " '[i]n addition' to codifying Tobon–Builes." Ante, at 662, n. 17. The phrase "in addition" plainly refers to the previous sentence in the Report, which states that § 5324 "would expressly subject to potential liability a person who causes or attempts to cause a financial institution to fail to file a required report or who causes a financial institution to file a required report that contains material omissions or misstatements of fact." S.Rep. No. 99–433, at 22. The "codification" of Tobon–Builes encompasses both sentences, and thus all three subsections of the original § 5324. In any event, there is no doubt that the Report's reference to "codifying Tobon–Builes " is a reference to the creation of the antistructuring offense, particularly given that Tobon–Builes expressly imposed criminal liability for "structuring" transactions. 706 F.2d, at 1101. Even more direct evidence of Congress' intent to incorporate the Tobon–Builes scienter standard is found in the response to a question from Senator D'Amato, the Senate sponsor of the antistructuring provision. He asked Deputy Assistant Attorney General Knapp and Assistant United States Attorney Sun: "Assuming that [the antistructuring] provision had been on the books, could you have demonstrated a willful violation in the Anzalone, Varbel and Denemark cases?" The written response stated: "Assuming that the terms of [the antistructuring provision] were in effect at the time of the conduct described in Anzalone, Varbel, and Denemark, the result would, or should have been markedly different. Statements from defendants in those cases indicated that the structuring conduct was purposely undertaken to evade the reporting requirements of Title 31. As this is expressly what is prohibited under [the antistructuring provision], a willful violation ... would have been demonstrated." Hearing on S. 571 and S. 2306 before the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, 99th Cong., 2d Sess., at 141–142.

11 The new law moved the antistructuring provision at issue here into a new subsection (a) of § 5324 and created subsection (b) for the new antistructuring provision.

12 The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit relied on Hoyland in affirming the conviction in this case.

United States of America, Plaintiff,
v.
John C. Hom, Defendant.

No. C 13–03721 WHA

Signed June 04, 2014

Synopsis
Background: Federal government sought to hold United States taxpayer liable for failing to file Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts Reports (FBARs) as allegedly required by the Bank Secrecy Act. Government moved for summary judgment.

Holdings: The District Court, William Alsup, J., held that:

[1] online accounts through which a United States citizen carried on his gambling activities, and which allowed him to carry balances and to withdraw and transfer funds to other entities, qualified as "bank or other financial accounts";

[2] online financial accounts through which a United States citizen carried on his gambling activity were located in foreign countries in which financial institutions that created and managed these accounts were located; and

[3] Internal Revenue Manual did not have force of law and did not confer any right on taxpayer with regard to penalties assessed for his failure to file FBARs.

Motion granted.

ORDER GRANTING SUMMARY JUDGMENT

WILLIAM ALSUP, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

INTRODUCTION

In this action involving the Bank Secrecy Act, the government moves for summary judgment. The motion is GRANTED.

STATEMENT

The following facts are uncontested. During 2006, pro se defendant John Hom gambled online through internet accounts with PokerStars.com and PartyPoker.com (Hendon Decl., Exh. 5 at 1–2). In 2007, defendant continued to gamble online through his PokerStars account (Hendon Decl., Exh. 5 at 2). Both poker websites allowed defendant to deposit money or make withdrawals.

Defendant used his account at FirePay.com, an online financial organization that receives, holds, and pays funds on behalf of its customers, to fund his online PokerStars and PartyPoker accounts. He deposited money into his FirePay account via his domestic Wells Fargo bank account or other online financial institutions, such as Western Union. In 2006, FirePay ceased allowing United States customers to transfer funds from their FirePay accounts to offshore internet gambling sites, so defendant used Western Union and other online financial institutions to transfer money from his Wells Fargo bank account to his online poker accounts (Hom Dep. at 38, 40, 45–46, 75, 110, 116, 121–24). Defendant admits that at some points in both 2006 and 2007, the aggregate amount of funds in his FirePay, PokerStars, and PartyPoker accounts exceeded $10,000 in United States currency (Hendon Decl., Exh. 5 at 4).

After the Internal Revenue Service detected discrepancies in defendant's federal income tax returns for 2006 and 2007, it opened a Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts Report ("FBAR") examination (Hendon Decl., Exh. 15). Individuals must file an FBAR with respect to foreign financial accounts exceeding $10,000 maintained during the previous year by June 30. 31 C.F.R. 103.27(c). Defendant did not file his 2006 or 2007 FBARs until June 26, 2010 (Hendon Decl., Exh. 5, at 4). Moreover, his submitted FBAR for 2006 did not include his FirePay account (Hom Dep. at 138).

On September 20, 2011, the IRS assessed defendant with civil penalties under 31 U.S.C. 5321(a)(5) for his non-willful failure to submit FBARs, as required by 31 U.S.C. 5314, regarding his interest in his FirePay, PokerStars, and PartyPoker accounts. The IRS assessed a $30,000 penalty for 2006, which included a $10,000 penalty for each of the three accounts, and a $10,000 penalty for 2007 based solely on defendant's PokerStars account (Hendon Decl., Exh. 5, at 5). Interest and penalties continue to accrue until paid in full pursuant to 31 U.S.C. 3717. This order follows full briefing and oral argument. The Court has tried to appoint a free lawyer for defendant—but no one would take the case.

The Bank Secrecy Act of 1970 was enacted "to require certain reports or records where they have a high degree of usefulness in criminal, tax, or regulatory investigations or proceedings." United States v. Clines, 958 F.2d 578, 581 (4th Cir.1992) (citations omitted), cert. denied, 505 U.S. 1205, 112 S.Ct. 2994, 120 L.Ed.2d 871 (1992). To accomplish this end, the Act established reporting requirements for transactions involving foreign financial agencies. 31 U.S.C. 5314. The provisions of the Act relating to foreign financial transactions resulted from the concern of Congress that foreign financial institutions located in jurisdictions having laws of secrecy with respect to bank activity were being used extensively to violate or evade domestic criminal, tax, and regulatory requirements. California Bankers Ass'n v. Shultz, 416 U.S. 21, 27, 94 S.Ct. 1494, 39 L.Ed.2d 812 (1974). The Act explicitly empowers the Secretary of the Treasury to determine the method in which covered persons should disclose their relationships or accounts with a foreign financial agency. 31 U.S.C. 5314.

According to the pertinent regulations, each person who is subject to the jurisdiction of the United States and has a "financial interest in, or signature authority over, a bank, securities, or other financial account in a foreign country" is required to report such relationship to the Commissioner for each year in which such relationship exists and provide this information in a reporting form prescribed by the Secretary to be filed by such persons. 31 C.F.R. 103.24. "Reports required to be filed by [Section] 103.24 shall be filed with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue on or before June 30 of each calendar year with respect to foreign financial accounts exceeding $10,000 maintained during the previous calendar year." 31 C.F.R. 103.27(c). If a person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States fails to submit an FBAR to the IRS when required to do so under 31 U.S.C. 5314, the Secretary of the Treasury may impose civil penalties. 31 U.S.C. 5321. In 2011, 31 C.F.R. 103.24 was amended and renumbered 31 C.F.R 1010.350. Section 103.24 was the version of the regulation in effect in 2006 and 2007, and the 2011 amendments did not fundamentally alter any of the reporting obligations.

For non-willful violations occurring after October 22, 2004, the amount of the civil penalty shall not exceed $10,000. 31 U.S.C. 5321(a)(5)(B). No penalty shall be imposed, however, if the violation was due to reasonable cause and the amount of the transaction or the balance in the account at the time of the transaction was properly reported. Ibid.

[1] In sum, an individual must file an FBAR for a reporting year if: (1) he or she is a United States person; (2) he or she has a financial interest in, or signature or other authority over, a bank, securities, or other financial account; (3) the bank, securities, or other financial account is in a foreign country; and (4) the aggregate amount in the accounts exceeds $10,000 in U.S. currency at any time during the year.

1. UNITED STATES PERSON.

The first element is whether the individual is a "United States person." As both sides agree that defendant is a United States citizen "subject to the jurisdiction of the United States," this element is met (Opp. at 1). 31 C.F.R. 103.24.

2. INTEREST IN "A BANK, SECURITIES, OR OTHER FINANCIAL ACCOUNT."

[2] The second element is whether defendant had a financial interest in, or authority over, a bank, securities, or other financial account in 2006 or 2007. Defendant 1179 does not contest in his opposition that he had a financial interest in his online FirePay, PokerStars, and PartyPoker accounts in 2006 and his online PokerStars account in 2007. Rather, defendant argues that those accounts are not a "bank or other financial accounts" for purposes of the applicable statute and regulations.

While our court of appeals has not yet answered what constitutes "other financial account[s]" under 31 C.F.R. 103.24, the Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit found that an account with a financial agency is a financial account under Section 5314. Clines, 958 F.2d at 582. Under Section 5312(a)(1), a "person acting for a person" as a "financial institution" or a person who is "acting in a similar way related to money" is considered a "financial agency." Section 5312(a)(2) lists 26 different types of entities that may qualify as a "financial institution." Based on the breadth of the definition, our court of appeals has held that "the term 'financial institution' is to be given a broad definition." United States v. Dela Espriella, 781 F.2d 1432, 1436 (9th Cir.1986). The government claims that FirePay, PokerStars, and PartyPoker are all financial institutions because they function as "commercial bank[s]." Section 5312(a)(2)(B). The Fourth Circuit in Clines found that "[b]y holding funds for third parties and disbursing them at their direction, [the organization at issue] functioned as a bank [under Section 5314]." Clines, 958 F.2d at 582 (emphasis added).

So too here. Defendant admits that he opened up all three accounts in his name, controlled access to the accounts, deposited money into the accounts, withdrew or transferred money from the accounts to other entities at will, and could carry a balance on the accounts (Hom Dep. at 38, 40, 45–46, 110, 116). As FirePay, PokerStars, and PartyPoker functioned as banks, defendant's online accounts with them are reportable.

Defendant alternatively argues that his online accounts are not "other accounts" according to the current regulations. The current regulations define a reportable account as including "bank account[s] ... [which means] a savings deposit, demand deposit, checking, or any other account maintained with a person engaged in the business of banking." 31 C.F.R. 1010.350. As explained above, FirePay, PokerStars, and PartyPoker function as institutions engaged in the business of banking. Accordingly, defendant's accounts are reportable even under the current regulations.

3. THE FINANCIAL ACCOUNT IS IN A FOREIGN COUNTRY.

[3] The third element is whether defendant's three financial accounts are located in foreign countries. The government argues that "located in" refers to where the financial institution that created and managed the account is located, whereas defendant argues that "located in" refers to the geographic location of the funds. As defendant has provided some evidence to suggest that PokerStars has several dozen bank accounts located in the United States, he asserts that "there is a real possibility that Defendant's funds are in an American bank" (Opp. at 2–3).

This order agrees with the government. It is irrelevant where PokerStars, FirePay, or PartyPoker opened their bank accounts. Those accounts belong to them, not defendant. Rather, his accounts are digital constructs that these financial institutions, all located outside of the United States, created and maintained on his behalf. FirePay is located in and regulated by the United Kingdom (Hendon Supp. Decl., Exh 19). PokerStars and its parent company, Rational Entertainment Enterprises Ltd., are licensed and regulated by 1180 the government of the Isle of Man (Hendon Supp. Decl., Exh. 20). PartyPoker and its parent company, PartyGaming, are licenced, regulated, and headquartered in Gibraltar (Hendon Supp. Decl., Exh. 26). These are the locations of his digital accounts, regardless of where the three companies place their own funds.

The Financial Crimes Enforcement Network of the Department of the Treasury has recently provided more guidance in its response to comments on its notice of proposed 2011 amendments to the Bank Secrecy Act, stating, "an account is not a foreign account under the FBAR if it is maintained with a financial institution located in the United States." Final Regulations, 76 Fed.Reg. 10,235 (Feb. 24, 2011) (to be codified at 31 C.F.R. pt. 1010) (emphasis added); see also Michael I. Saltzman & Leslie Book, IRS Prac. & Proc. S7A–19 (Thompson Reuters ed., rev.2d ed. Supp.2014). The Department of Treasury's determination merits Chevron deference. Although the above statement is less than formal, Congress clearly delegated to the Department of the Treasury broad regulatory authority under 31 U.S.C. 5314 and its interpretation was issued with a "lawmaking pretense" via its notice of rulemaking. Marmolejo–Campos v. Holder, 558 F.3d 903, 908–10 (9th Cir.2009). Here, Congress did not directly address the precise question at issue on the face of the statute and the Department of Treasury reasonably interpreted the statute in finding that an account's location is determined by the location of its host institution, not where the physical money might be stored after it is sent to financial institution. Chevron v. NRDC, 467 U.S. 837, 843, 865, 104 S.Ct. 2778, 81 L.Ed.2d 694 (1984).

In support of his position, defendant cites to the general instructions from the 2010 FBAR form he tardily filed, which stated, "[t]he geographic location of the account, not the nationality of the financial institution in which the account is found determines whether it is an account in a foreign country." (Hendon Decl., Exh. 17 at HOM000404). That argument is unconvincing. The instructions contained within the FBAR form, as interpreted by defendant, have no legal weight because " interpretation by taxpayers of the language used in government pamphlets [cannot] act as an estoppel on the government, nor change the meaning of taxing statutes." Adler v. Commissioner, 330 F.2d 91, 93 (9th Cir.1964). And even if the instructions had legal weight—even if they were determinative—there is no suggestion here that FirePay, PokerStars, and PartyPoker opened and maintained the defendant's accounts in the United States.

As defendant concedes, PokerStars, FirePay, and PartyPoker are all licensed and operated in foreign countries (Br. at 2, Dkt. No. 41). These foreign countries are where the companies created and maintained defendant's online accounts. Accordingly, this order finds that defendant's accounts are all located in foreign countries.

4. $10,000 REQUIREMENT.

The fourth element is that the aggregate amount in the accounts exceeds $10,000 in U.S. currency at any time during the reporting year. Here, defendant admits that there was, in aggregate, at least $10,000 at some time during both 2006 and 2007 in his online PokerStars, FirePay, or PartyPoker accounts (Hendon Decl., Exh. 5 at 4). Accordingly, this element is met.

5. AFFIRMATIVE DEFENSES.

[4] Defendant argues that even if he is liable, the amount of penalty assessed was too high because it might contravene the "Internal Revenue Manual" (Opp. at 3). 1181 Our court of appeals, however, has foreclosed that argument by holding that "[t]he Internal Revenue Manual does not have the force of law and does not confer rights on taxpayers." Fargo v. Comm'r of Internal Revenue, 447 F.3d 706, 713 (9th Cir.2006). Thus, defendant's argument fails.

[5] Defendant also requests that ruling on the government's summary judgment motion be delayed to allow further discovery. Yet, defendant has not identified any additional discovery or facts that might preclude summary judgment. Panatronic USA v. AT & T Corp., 287 F.3d 840, 846 (9th Cir.2002). Accordingly, defendant's request is DENIED.

6. JUDICIAL NOTICE.

[6] The government seeks judicial notice of factual documents found on the internet. Defendant opposes. While our court of appeals has not yet ruled on whether information found on the internet may be judicially noticed, other circuit courts have judicially noticed reliable internet sources, such as government websites. O'Toole v. Northrop Grumman Corp., 499 F.3d 1218, 1225 (10th Cir.2007); Coleman v. Dretke, 409 F.3d 665, 667 (5th Cir.2005) (per curiam); Denius v. Dunlap, 330 F.3d 919, 926–27 (7th Cir.2003). While parties are certainly not entitled to judicial notice of all internet sources, several judges in this district have judicially noticed information found on official government webpages or other reliable internet sources. See, e.g., Paralyzed Veterans of Am. v. McPherson, 2008 WL 4183981, at *5–6, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 69542, at *17–18 (N.D.Cal. Sept. 8, 2008) (Judge Saundra Brown Armstrong); Sears v. County of Monterey, 2013 WL 4510672, at *4–5, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 120401, at *12–13 (N.D.Cal. Aug. 22, 2013) (Judge Lucy Koh); Gaudin v. Saxon Mortg. Servs., 297 F.R.D. 417, 419–421 (N.D.Cal.2013) (Judge Jon Tigar). Accordingly, the government's request for judicial notice that FirePay, PokerStars, and PartyPoker are all foreign entities is GRANTED.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, the government's motion for summary judgment is GRANTED.

The government shall file a brief by June 10, 2014, no longer than five pages, detailing the amount of money owned by defendant up to June 10. Final judgment will be entered afterwards.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

Synopsis

Background: Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the District of Arizona, James A. Teilborg, of willfully making and subscribing false tax returns, and one of defendants was also convicted of willfully failing to file foreign bank account reports (FBARs).

Holdings: The Court of Appeals held that:

[1] evidence supported defendants' convictions;

[2] District Court did not violate defendants' right to confrontation;

[3] District Court properly allowed evidence of defendants' business activities and allowed government to argue those activities were fraudulent; and

[4] District Court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence defendant filed FBARs in later years.

MEMORANDUM [*]

Michael Quiel and Stephen Kerr appeal their convictions for willfully making and subscribing false tax returns, in violation of 26 U.S.C. § 7206(1). Kerr also appeals his conviction for willfully failing to file foreign bank account reports ("FBARs"), in violation of 31 U.S.C. §§ 5314, 5322(a) and 31 C.F.R. §§ 1010.350, 1010.306(c)-(d). We affirm.

[1] 1. "We review de novo claims of insufficient evidence." United States v. Chhun, 744 F.3d 1110, 1117 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, ––– U.S. ––––, 135 S.Ct. 131, 190 L.Ed.2d 100 (2014). We will uphold a conviction if, "viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the prosecution, any rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt." Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307, 319, 99 S.Ct. 2781, 61 L.Ed.2d 560 (1979). The question of whether Defendants willfully failed to report income and file FBARs is one of fact for the jury. See Rykoff v. United States, 40 F.3d 305, 307–08 (9th Cir.1994). The jury could have concluded that Kerr and Quiel knew they had a duty to report the income from their foreign accounts, because Christopher Rusch, their attorney and business partner, testified that the accounts were set up using nominees under Kerr's and Quiel's control in order to evade reporting requirements. Even without Rusch's testimony, the jury could have inferred control because (a) the accounts were traded in Kerr's and Quiel's stock for their benefit; (b) the foreign firms never served their stated purpose of finding investors; and (c) these firms were not actual, functioning businesses. Additionally, even without Rusch's testimony, the jury could infer motive from Kerr's having recently paid high tax rates and Quiel's recent payment of a large tax penalty before either engaged in these transactions. With regard to Kerr's conviction for willful failure to file FBARs, the evidence was sufficient to convict him given the jury instructions, to which Kerr did not object.

[2] 2. The district court did not err by admitting Rusch's testimony. "The district court's conclusion concerning whether statements are protected by an individual attorney-client privilege is a mixed question of law and fact which this court reviews independently and without deference to the district court." United States v. Richey, 632 F.3d 559, 563 (9th Cir.2011) (internal quotation marks omitted). Defendants waived the protection of the privilege by relying on an advice-of-counsel defense. Rock River Commc'ns, Inc. v. Universal Music Grp., Inc., 745 F.3d 343, 353 (9th Cir.2014) ("A party who affirmatively places its attorney-client communications at issue in a litigation implicitly waives the privilege.").

[3] 3. The district court did not violate Kerr's and Quiel's constitutional right to confront Rusch by imposing a blanket ban on recross examination. We review 695 "[w]hether limitations on the scope of questioning at trial constitute a violation of the confrontation clause ... de novo." United States v. Jones, 982 F.2d 380, 383 (9th Cir.1992). "Allowing recross is within the sound discretion of the trial court except where new matter is elicited on redirect examination, in which case denial of recross as to that new matter violates the Confrontation Clause." United States v. Baker, 10 F.3d 1374, 1404 (9th Cir.1993), overruled on other grounds by United States v. Nordby, 225 F.3d 1053 (9th Cir.2000). Although the district court may have imposed a blanket ban on recross examination, this ban did not violate Kerr's and Quiel's constitutional right to recross Rusch regarding three new exhibits admitted on redirect, because the exhibits were not "new matter." The exhibits merely bolstered Rusch's prior testimony. See United States v. Croft, 124 F.3d 1109, 1121 (9th Cir.1997). In any event, at Defendants' request, Rusch remained subject to the Government's subpoena after his testimony and the Defendants declined to recall him. See United States v. Ross, 33 F.3d 1507, 1518 (11th Cir.1994).

We reject the Defendants' separate Confrontation Clause argument that the exhibits constituted testimonial hearsay from a declarant not subject to cross-examination. Defendants failed to object to the exhibits on the basis of the Confrontation Clause, and we find that the district court did not plainly err. See United States v. Olano, 507 U.S. 725, 731–32, 113 S.Ct. 1770, 123 L.Ed.2d 508 (1993). The exhibits did not contain testimonial statements. See Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 51–53, 124 S.Ct. 1354, 158 L.Ed.2d 177 (2004).

[4] 4. We review the district court's decision to allow extensive evidence of Defendants' business activities and to allow the Government to argue that Defendants' activities were fraudulent for plain error, because, although Kerr and Quiel contend that admission of this evidence violated Fed.R.Evid. 403 and 404(b), they failed to make contemporaneous objections to this evidence. United States v. Archdale, 229 F.3d 861, 864–65 (9th Cir.2000). The district court did not plainly err, because the evidence was (a) intrinsic to the charged offenses; (b) more cumulative than prejudicial; and (c) addressed by a limiting instruction. Additionally, we conclude that the district court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to order a mistrial. See United States v. Guerrero, 756 F.2d 1342, 1347–48 (9th Cir.1984).

[5] 5. To the extent Defendants challenge the Government's characterization of their business activities as fraud during closing, they have not shown that the prosecutor's statements "so infected the trial with unfairness as to make the resulting conviction a denial of due process." Towery v. Schriro, 641 F.3d 300, 310 (9th Cir.2010) (internal quotation marks omitted).

[6] 6. On de novo review, we find that the district court did not err by refusing to order the Government to turn over a special agent's report or to disclose Quiel's individual tax master file. See United States v. Si, 343 F.3d 1116, 1122 (9th Cir.2003). To warrant disclosure (1) "the evidence at issue must be favorable to the accused"; (2) "the evidence must have been suppressed by the State, either willfully or inadvertently"; and (3) "prejudice must result from the failure to disclose the evidence." Benn v. Lambert, 283 F.3d 1040, 1052–53 (9th Cir.2002).

Defendants failed to show that the evidence was clearly exculpatory and did not make the plausible showing of that fact required to warrant in camera inspection. See Pennsylvania v. Ritchie, 480 U.S. 39, 58 n. 15, 107 S.Ct. 989, 94 L.Ed.2d 40 (1987).

696 [7] 7. The district court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence that Kerr filed FBARs in later years. Kerr stipulated to the admission of the FBARs and does not now claim that his stipulation was involuntary. See United States v. Molina, 596 F.3d 1166, 1169 (9th Cir.2010). Further, the FBARs were not remedial measures under Fed.R.Evid. 407.

[8] 8. The district court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to order a new trial after Defendants were acquitted of conspiracy, see United States v. King, 660 F.3d 1071, 1076 (9th Cir.2011), because Defendants cannot identify evidence that was admitted against them solely because of the conspiracy charge.

AFFIRMED.

MEMORANDUM RE: MOTION IN LIMINE

Baylson, District Judge

1 Presently before the Court in this tax penalty action is Defendant the United States' motion in limine to preclude evidence concerning the "procedures, actions, analyses, or viewpoints of the Internal Revenue Service and its personnel at the administrative level regarding willfulness." (ECF 43, Gov't Mot. at 1.) Plaintiff Arthur Bedrosian opposes the motion on the grounds that the IRS administrative findings and related testimony are relevant to the Court's determination of whether his failure to file an accurate Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts ("FBAR") in 2007 was willful. (ECF 46, Bedrosian Opp'n.) For the reasons discussed below, Defendant's motion is granted.

I. Legal Framework

Although the Third Circuit has not ruled on what standard of review applies to a determination of the validity of an IRS penalty under 31 U.S.C. § 5321, those courts that have considered the question have found the correct standard to be de novo. See United States v. Williams, No. 09-437, 2010 WL 3473311, at *1 (E.D. Va. Sept. 1, 2010), rev'd on other grounds, United States v. Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. 655 (4th Cir. 2012) (looking to enforcement actions brought by the government in other contexts which require a de novo review, as well as the fact that Section 5321 provides for no adjudicatory hearing before an FBAR penalty is assessed, to conclude that de novo review is appropriate); United States v. McBride, 908 F. Supp. 2d 1186, 1201 (D. Utah 2012) (applying de novo standard to whether underlying penalty was valid).

The government bears the burden of proving each element of its claim for a civil FBAR penalty by a preponderance of the evidence, including the key question here of whether an individual's failure to report was "willful." Williams, 2010 WL 3473311, at *1; McBride, 908 F. Supp. 2d at 1201-02 (explaining that "[a]s with [g]overnment penalty enforcement and collection cases generally, absent a statute that prescribes the burden of proof, imposition of a higher burden of proof is warranted only where 'particularly important individual interests or rights,' are at stake") (quoting Herman & MacLean v. Huddleston, 459 U.S. 375, 389 (1983)); United States v. Bohanec, No. 15-4347, ––– F. Supp. 3d. ––––, 2016 WL 7167860, at *6 (C.D. Cal. Dec. 8, 2016) (holding that because "[t]he monetary sanctions at issue [in an FBAR civil penalty action] do not rise to the level of 'particularly important individual interest or rights,' ... the preponderance of the evidence standard applies").

II. Analysis

The government cites significant case law supporting its position that "[e]vidence regarding the thoughts, analysis, application of facts to law, and determinations at the administrative level with respect to willfulness have no place in the Court's de novo review of whether Bedrosian willfully failed to comply with the FBAR requirements." (Gov't Mot. at 6.) One especially compelling case is United States v. Farley, 11 F.3d 1385 (7th Cir. 1993), in which the court reviewed the district court's dismissal of a government action against an individual for violation of one of the Clayton Act's reporting requirements. The government had refused to produce certain internal Federal Trade Commission ("FTC") documents from the underlying administrative investigation in contravention to the district court's order, citing work product and deliberative process privileges. Id. at 1387. The district court dismissed the case with prejudice due to the government's failure to abide the court's order.

2 The Seventh Circuit first found that the documents were within the scope of both privileges and that the district court had therefore erred in ordering the documents' disclosure without assessing the defendant's need for them. Id. at 1389-90. Second, and pertinent to this case, the court declined to remand for such a balancing analysis because the documents were legally irrelevant to the issue presented by the government's complaint. Specifically, the court held that the FTC documents were not relevant to the defendant's claim that his stock purchase fell within a given exemption to the federal reporting requirement because "[t]his defense requires only that the district court interpret the statutory exemption and determine whether [the defendant's] purchases were within the scope of that exemption." Id. at 1390.

Similarly, here Bedrosian cannot show that documents relating to the underlying IRS investigation and penalty assessment are relevant to the only question that remains in this case—whether he acted willfully when he failed to report one of his foreign accounts on his 2007 FBAR. As in Farley, that determination solely requires our consideration of Section 5321 and evidence pertaining to Bedrosian's state of mind in failing to accurately file his 2007 FBAR.

We further find instructive cases in which courts conduct de novo reviews of tax assessments. In Katz v. United States, No. 91-5623, 1992 WL 103006 (E.D. Pa. May 6, 1992), the court granted the government's motion to preclude the defendant from introducing evidence at trial pertaining to the IRS's investigation because "[i]t is not for [the] court to look behind an assessment to evaluate the procedure and evidence used in making the assessment." Id. at *1 (explaining that the de novo standard of review meant that there was no need for "any ancillary determination as to the procedures employed by the government in levying their assessment"); see also Rupert v. United States, 225 F.R.D. 154, 157 (M.D. Pa. 2004) (stating that where the court must determine the propriety of a tax refund, it "must independently evaluate the [p]laintiffs' claim, [rendering] the recommendations of the [IRS] Appeals Officer ... not relevant to [the] review").

Bedrosian, on the other hand, fails to proffer any case law that compels a contrary conclusion. He first cites S.H. v. State-Operated School District of City of Newark, 336 F.3d 260 (3d Cir. 2003) and Wilkins v. District of Columbia., 571 F. Supp. 2d 163 (D.D.C. 2008) for the proposition that we must give "due weight" to the underlying administrative proceedings. (Bedrosian Opp'n at 8.) But those cases deal with the particular circumstance of judicial review over cases arising under the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act ("IDEA"), which standard of review has developed in a line of cases specific to that statute. See Bd. of Educ. of Hendrick Hudson Ctrl. Sch. Dist., Westchester Cty. v. Rowley, 458 U.S. 176, 206 (1982) ("The fact that § 1415(e) requires that the reviewing court 'receive the records of the [state] administrative proceedings' carries with it the implied requirement that due weight shall be given to these proceedings."); Shore Reg'l High Sch. Bd. of Educ. v. P.S., 381 F.3d 194, 199 (3d Cir. 2004). Indeed, Bedrosian points us to no precedent for the application of such a standard outside of the IDEA context. Because neither the Supreme Court nor any other court discovered by the undersigned has limited the district court's de novo review of the imposition of an FBAR civil penalty in such a way, these cases are inapposite to the instant inquiry.

Bedrosian additionally argues that the fact that Section 5321 did not afford him an adjudicatory hearing sways in favor of admitting evidence relating to the IRS's administrative findings because he did not have "an adequate opportunity to be heard at the administrative level before the willful FBAR penalty was imposed." (Bedrosian Opp'n at 9.) We disagree. Bedrosian has the chance before this Court to put forth any relevant, admissible evidence of the only issue left to be adjudicated—his state of mind in not filing an accurate 2007 FBAR. The IRS's analysis of Bedrosian's case, its preliminary conclusions regarding his FBAR violation, and the viewpoints of its personnel plainly do not go to Bedrosian's willfulness in failing to list one of his foreign accounts on his 2007 FBAR.

3 For the aforementioned reasons, we find that the government is correct in its contention that evidence concerning the "procedures, actions, analyses, or viewpoints of the Internal Revenue Service and its personnel at the administrative level regarding willfulness" is not relevant under FRE 401. (Gov't Mot. at 1.) Because evidence must be admissible in order to be relevant under FRE 402, the inquiry ends here and Bedrosian will not be permitted to introduce such evidence at trial.

JOINTLY ADMINISTERED
Signed May 10, 2016

Synopsis

Background: Chapter 11 debtors moved to determine federal tax liability and objected to proofs of claim filed by the Internal Revenue Service (IRS). United States filed motion to exclude expert report.

Holdings: The Bankruptcy Court, Barbara J. Houser, J., held that:

[1] testimony of debtors' expert regarding fact that there was uncertainty as to the law among the relevant bars concerning, inter alia, the establishment and administration of foreign trusts during certain period was relevant and admissible;

[2] failure by the IRS to supply a fully itemized statement of interest, fees, expenses, or other charges as required by Bankruptcy Rules was harmless, and did not affect the proofs of claim's prima facie validity;

[3] debtor acted with fraudulent intent in underpaying his income taxes, and thus was liable for fraudulent underpayment penalties;

[4] debtor was not willfully blind to high probability of deceased husband's understated income or underpaid taxes, as would warrant imposition of fraud penalty;

[5] debtor was entitled to innocent spouse relief from fraudulent underpayment penalties, although deceased husband had been charged with concealing income and assets with his brother through complex offshore system of trusts and corporations;

[6] debtor did not reasonably rely in good faith on the advice he received from various lawyers as to the income tax treatment of his offshore system of trusts and corporations and the transactions undertaken through that system, and therefore failed to establish "reasonable cause and good faith" defense to imposition of fraud penalties; and

[7] offshore funds used by debtor for purchase, maintenance, improvement, and upkeep of certain properties was not a gift to his children.

Ordered accordingly.

V. CONCLUSION... 639

Before the Court are the Motion Pursuant to Bankruptcy Code § 505 to Determine Tax Liability, If Any [ECF No. 4] and the Amended Motion Under Bankruptcy Code Section 505 to Determine Tax Liability, If Any [ECF No. 516] (together, the "Motions") filed by Samuel Evans Wyly ("Sam") and Carolyn Dee Wyly ("Dee," and together with Sam, the "Debtors"), respectively, in which the Debtors seek to have this Court determine the allowed claim of the Internal Revenue Service ("IRS") against them. The Debtors have also objected to the proofs of claim [1] filed by the IRS against them (together, the "Claim Objections"). [2] By agreement of the parties, the Motions and the Claim Objections were heard concurrently, as each seeks to have the Court determine the IRS' allowed claims against the Debtors' respective estates. Pursuant to a Scheduling Order agreed to by the parties and entered by the Court [ECF No. 564], trial commenced on January 6, 2016 and concluded on January 21, 2016. Closing arguments were heard on January 27 and 28, 2016. At the Court's direction, the Debtors and the IRS filed post-trial briefs on certain issues on February 5, 2016 and reply briefs to each other's post-trial brief on February 10, 2016. The Motions and Claim Objections are now ripe for ruling.

After carefully considering the arguments of the parties (as advanced orally and in writing both pre and post-trial), the evidence admitted at trial, and its own research of the legal issues raised, this Memorandum Opinion contains the Court's findings of fact and conclusions of law pursuant to Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure 7052 and 9014. [3]

I. JURISDICTION, AUTHORITY, AND VENUE

The district court of the Northern District of Texas has subject matter jurisdiction 356 over the Debtors' bankruptcy cases (the "Cases") pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1334, and this Court has authority to determine the amount or legality of tax and the allowance or disallowance of claims against the bankruptcy estates pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 157(a), (b)(1), (b)(2)(B), and (b)(2)(O), 11 U.S.C. § 505(a), [4] and the Order of Reference of Bankruptcy Cases and Proceedings Nunc Pro Tunc adopted in the Northern District of Texas on August 3, 1984. As explained by the Fifth Circuit, § 505(a)(1) is a "broad grant of jurisdiction" authorizing the bankruptcy court to determine certain tax issues, subject to statutory exceptions that are not applicable to the Cases. [5] Venue is proper in this district pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1408.

II. PRELIMINARY MATTERS

A. Factual and Computation Stipulations of the Parties

At the Court's urging, the parties stipulated to a large number of undisputed facts, which are contained in the Joint Stipulations of Fact [ECF No. 1040] (the "Joint Stipulations") filed December 30, 2015. While the Court will not repeat those factual stipulations verbatim in this Memorandum Opinion, it adopts them as if they were set forth herein.

In addition, the parties were able to stipulate to the facts that will be necessary for them to compute the amount of tax, interest, and penalties that may result from this Court's determination of the factual and legal issues in dispute among them, which are included in the parties' Computation Stipulations [ECF No. 1106] (the "Computation Stipulations") filed January 26, 2016. The Computation Stipulations, like everything else in the Cases, is complicated and detailed, so suffice it to say that the Court is not going to repeat those stipulations here, but it adopts them as if they were set forth herein. [6]

B. Facts Found Due to this Court's Application of Collateral Estoppel

On May 29, 2015 the IRS filed its Motion for Partial Summary Judgment on the Application of Collateral Estoppel to Facts and Conclusions Established in the Securities and Exchange Commission v. Sam Wyly et al. Litigation [ECF No. 611] (the "Motion for Partial Summary Judgment"), seeking this Court's determination that certain findings of fact and conclusions of law made in connection with a civil action pending in federal district court in the Southern District of New York (the "SDNY Court") were binding on the Debtors in connection with this Court's resolution 357 of the Motions and the Claim Objections. In summary, the Securities and Exchange Commission (the "SEC") sued Sam and his brother, Charles Wyly ("Charles"), [7] among others, for securities fraud in connection with certain securities transactions undertaken by various offshore trusts and other offshore corporations that Sam and Charles were associated with in a case styled SEC v. Wyly et al., Case No. 10–5760–SAS (S.D.N.Y.) (the "SEC Action"). Following a jury trial on the liability phase and a bench trial on the remedies phase of the SEC Action, the SDNY Court entered judgment against Sam and the probate estate of Charles, who died in 2011, for $123,836,958.75 and $63,881,743.97, respectively, plus prejudgment interest. [8] The SDNY Court's decision contained numerous findings of fact that either the jury or it had made, along with its conclusions of law, which the IRS sought to have this Court give collateral estoppel effect to here, as these same offshore trusts and other offshore corporations and the transactions that they engaged in for a number of years are at the heart of the IRS' tax claims against the Debtors here.

For the reasons stated in its Memorandum Opinion and Order [ECF No. 789] entered on August 24, 2015, this Court granted the IRS' Motion for Partial Summary Judgment, thereby giving collateral estoppel effect to sixty-four (64) specific facts and/or legal conclusions established in the SEC Action. [9] While the Court will not repeat them here, it adopts them and will quote them and/or discuss them when relevant to this Court's specific determinations here. [10]

As will be explained more fully below, of particular significance here is the SDNY Court's determination that certain of the offshore trusts at issue in the SEC Action and here are foreign grantor trusts of Sam and Charles. Because of this determination by the SDNY Court, and because this Court has given collateral estoppel effect to the SDNY Court's determination, the Debtors and the IRS agree that there were substantial underpayments of income 358 taxes by the Debtors, [11] including (i) for Sam tax years 1992 through 2003, 2005 through 2006, and 2010, and (ii) for Dee tax years 1992, 1994 through 2003, 2006, 2008, 2011, and 2013. [12]

The reference above is the first time that the Court has used the phrase "foreign grantor trust" in this opinion and it will use it and other related terms throughout this opinion. Of course, it is important to understand what the Court is referring to when using these terms. A foreign trust is defined in 26 U.S.C. § 7701 as "any trust other than a trust described in subparagraph (E) of paragraph (30)." [13] Subparagraph (E) of paragraph (30) in turn defines when a trust can be considered a "United States person," which is if "(i) a court within the United States is able to exercise primary supervision over the administration of the trust, and (ii) one or more United States persons have the authority to control all substantial decisions of the trust." [14] In other words, if the trust is not subject to primary supervision by a court within the U.S. and control over the trust is exercised by a non-U.S. person, it is a foreign trust. The difference between grantor and non-grantor trusts is explained as follows:

> Although trusts are usually separate taxable entities, the grantor trust rules may require that a portion or all of a trust be ignored for income tax purposes. When this occurs, the grantor (or in some cases a beneficiary or trust powerholder) is deemed to own the trust assets. When the assets of a trust are deemed owned by its grantor under Sections 671 through 677 or Section 679 of the Internal Revenue Code

> (the Code), the trust is called a "grantor trust."[15]

The "grantor trust rules" referred to above are contained in 26 U.S.C. §§ 671 through 679.[16] By implication, a trust that is not a "grantor trust" is a "non-grantor trust," and is treated as its own taxable entity under the Internal Revenue Code.

C. United States' Motion to Exclude the Expert Report, Opinions, and Testimony of Joshua S. Rubenstein

The IRS filed a Motion to Exclude the Expert Opinions of Joshua S. Rubenstein [ECF No. 923] (the "Rubenstein Motion") prior to trial. Because the Rubenstein Motion was heard the day before trial was scheduled to commence, and because the Court did not have sufficient time to rule on the Rubenstein Motion before the Debtors called Mr. Rubenstein ("Rubenstein") to testify at trial, the Court allowed Rubenstein to testify, subject 359 to his testimony being stricken if the Court decided to grant the Rubenstein Motion. For the reasons explained below, the Rubenstein Motion is granted in part and denied in part. Those portions of Rubenstein's testimony that are excluded are stricken from the record.

Rubenstein is a lawyer and partner at the firm of Katten Muchin Rosenman, LLP. The Debtors offered Rubenstein as an expert in "trust and estate law and taxation of trusts, with specific experience and knowledge regarding these areas during the 1990s, and also as an expert regarding practices concerning the establishment and administration of foreign trusts during the 1990s."[17] Rubenstein was to provide "an opinion as to how practitioners advised clients with respect to the application of the grantor trust rules to foreign trusts during the 1990's (the 'relevant time period') and how foreign trusts, as opposed to domestic trusts were drafted and administered at the time."[18] The purported purpose of Rubenstein's opinion is to assist the Court in the evaluation of the Debtors' reasonable cause defense to their failure to file Forms 3520, 3520–A, and 5471, as well as to assist the Court in its evaluation of the Debtors' alleged fraudulent intent for purposes of the IRS' recovery of fraud penalties under 26 U.S.C. § 6663.[19]

In the Rubenstein Motion, the IRS objected to Rubenstein's proposed testimony on multiple grounds. First, the IRS contended that Rubenstein's opinions would consist of statements of the law and legal analysis that would usurp this Court's role as both fact finder and the "one spokesman of the law."[20] Second, the IRS argued that Rubenstein's failure to apply his expert knowledge to the specific facts of these Cases made his opinions both irrelevant and unreliable under Daubert and Federal Rule of Evidence 702.[21] Finally, the IRS argued that Rubenstein's lack of experience with private annuity transactions in a foreign trust context rendered him unqualified under Federal Rule of Evidence 702 to give any opinion related to the private annuity transactions at issue here.[22]

[1] [2] We turn first to the IRS' argument that Rubenstein's opinion consisted of impermissible recitations of the law and legal conclusions. It is all but axiomatic that the judge should be the sole source of the applicable legal standard in any case, and that expert testimony that attempts to tell the fact finder what law to apply is improper.[23] Likewise, expert testimony that states a legal opinion that tells the fact finder what result to reach is improper.[24]

Much of Rubenstein's expert opinion consisted of explanations of what Internal Revenue Code provisions and IRS regulations did or do not allow during the relevant 360 time period or today. For example, at one point Rubenstein testified that, until 2010, it was permissible under the law for a beneficiary of a foreign non-grantor trust to engage in uncompensated use of trust property without paying tax on the fair rental value of that use.[25] Testimony such as this—which explained black letter law as it stands today or as it stood in years past—consisted of legal conclusions and was therefore inadmissible. This Court is capable of determining the law applicable to the Cases on its own, without Rubenstein's assistance. All of Rubenstein's testimony that simply told the Court what the law was or is will be stricken.

However, not all of Rubenstein's testimony consisted of statements that were simply impermissible legal analysis, opinions, and conclusions. In addition to giving general statements of both past and present law, Rubenstein also made statements that the law that governed offshore trusts and the tax treatment of such trusts during the relevant time period was, in the eyes of many practitioners, including him, uncertain.[26] The purported purpose of this testimony was, again, to assist the Court in assessing the Debtors' reasonable cause defense and the presence or absence of fraudulent intent [27] —i.e., according to the Debtors, given the fact of uncertainty among experienced tax professionals, how could the Debtors possibly have acted with fraudulent intent here? More specifically, the Debtors argue that if lawyers practicing in the area of cross-border trust and estate taxation felt that the law governing the taxation of offshore trusts like the ones at issue here was uncertain, then this in turn would tend to corroborate that the Debtors were uncertain about the state of the law, and any missteps that the Debtors made in following that law would be more reasonable and less likely to be fraudulent.

[3] The admissibility of this testimony regarding the fact of alleged uncertainty among members of the cross border trust and estate and tax bars as to how to interpret and apply the law during the relevant time period was a close call. As the Fifth Circuit has noted, "the task of separating impermissible questions which call for overbroad or legal responses from permissible questions is not a facile one." [28] In general, a fact finder is "qualified to determine intelligently and to the best degree possible both the reasonableness of a client relying upon the advice of an attorney ... retained to render such advice and whether the client did so in good faith after making full disclosure" on its own, and that "expert testimony as to the legal basis underlying the advice" does not assist the fact finder. [29] However, in U.S. v. Burton, [30] the Fifth Circuit also stated that:

> Evidence of legal uncertainty, except as it relates to defendant's effort to show 361 the source of his state of mind, need not be received, at least where, as here, the claimed uncertainty does not approach vagueness and is neither widely recognized nor related to a novel or unusual application of the law.

The Debtors have not introduced any evidence that the purported uncertainty in the law at issue here approached vagueness, a phrase that harkens back to the Fifth Circuit's decision in U.S. v. Garber, [31] which in turn seems to have been limited to its "unique, indeed near bizarre, facts." [32] However, even if they did, the Court concludes that Rubenstein's testimony regarding the fact of uncertainty as to the law among the relevant bars during the relevant time period need only be admitted if the Debtors knew of this legal uncertainty, as this is the only way this legal uncertainty could have affected their states of mind.

[4] As explained below, knowledge that there was uncertainty regarding the proper legal characterization of the various offshore trusts at issue here can be imputed to Sam and Charles back to 1993. [33] Moreover, the evidence shows that by 2003 at the latest, Sam and Charles had actual knowledge of this uncertainty. [34] Thus knowledge of this legal uncertainty may have had some influence on Sam's and Charles' states of mind. On this basis, Rubenstein's testimony regarding the fact that there was uncertainty as to the law among the bar is relevant and admissible, and is not an impermissible legal conclusion. However, for the reasons more fully explained below, the Court gives this testimony little weight.

As the IRS pointed out in its cross-examination of Rubenstein, Rubenstein offered no opinion as to (and was unaware of) whether Sam, Charles, or any Wyly advisor felt that there was any uncertainty in the applicable law during the relevant time period. [35] Rubenstein's failure to connect his testimony to the specific facts of the Cases makes his testimony of less use in evaluating Sam's and Charles' actions or intent, [36] and thus the Court gives this testimony little weight.

In closing out the analysis of the IRS' first argument—that Rubenstein's testimony consisted of impermissible legal conclusions—the Court will identify other testimony that Rubenstein gave that did not consist of impermissible legal conclusions. Although Rubenstein is a lawyer, this does not automatically mean that all of his testimony must therefore consist of statements of the law or legal conclusions. Rubenstein is permitted to "testify as to legal matters when those matters involve questions of fact." [37] Here, Rubenstein offered 362 testimony as to whether certain practices—such as the settlement of trusts with nominal amounts of money, the use of protectors [38] with expansive powers, or the use of "accommodation grantors" [39] —were viewed as normal or proper by the cross-border trust and estate and tax bars during the relevant time period. The question of what members of the bar thought, as opposed to what the actual state of the law was, is a factual one. Although counsel for the Debtors or the IRS can explain what the true state of the law during the relevant time period was or is today via briefing or oral argument, proving what the cross-border trust and estate and tax bars thought the law was or how they viewed the law is a factual inquiry that requires resort to expert testimony as opposed to argument. Rubenstein's testimony regarding the views of the bar during the relevant time period—like his testimony regarding the fact of uncertainty in the law during the relevant time period—is admissible. However, the Court must still analyze the relevance and reliability of such testimony under Daubert.

[5] Thus, we turn to the IRS' second argument, that Rubenstein's testimony is inadmissible because it is irrelevant and unreliable under Daubert and Federal Rule of Evidence 702. Two Supreme Court cases guide our analysis of the admissibility of expert opinion evidence on the basis of whether it is both relevant and reliable: Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharm., Inc. [40] and Kumho Tire Co., Ltd. v. Carmichael. [41] At the outset, we note that this is a bench trial and that "[m]ost of the safeguards provided for in Daubert are not as essential in a case ... where ... a ... judge sits as the trier of fact in place of a jury." [42] This makes perfect sense, as this Court's "chief role when determining the admissibility of expert testimony under Daubert is that of a 'gate-keeper,' " [43] and there is little need for the Court to serve as a gate-keeper for itself.

[6] Nevertheless, the basic holding of Daubert, as expanded upon by Kumho Tire Co., Ltd., is very simple—in order to be admissible, expert testimony must be both (i) relevant, and (ii) reliable. [44] Daubert defined the standards for admissibility of expert opinion evidence under Federal Rule of Evidence 702, and was decided within the specific context of a scientific expert. [45] In Kumho Tire Co., Ltd. [46] the 363 Supreme Court explained how to apply Daubert's holding and its specific indicia of reliability to non-scientific testimony:

> We conclude that Daubert's general holding—setting forth the trial judge's general "gatekeeping" obligation—applies not only to testimony based on "scientific" knowledge, but also to testimony based on "technical" and "other specialized" knowledge. See Fed. Rule Evid. 702. We also conclude that a trial court may consider one or more of the more specific factors that Daubert mentioned when doing so will help determine that testimony's reliability. But, as the Court stated in Daubert, the test of reliability is "flexible," and Daubert's list of specific factors neither necessarily nor exclusively applies to all experts or in every case. Rather, the law grants a district court the same broad latitude when it decides how to determine reliability as it enjoys in respect to its ultimate reliability determination. See General Electric Co. v. Joiner, 522 U.S. 136, 143, 118 S.Ct. 512, 139 L.Ed.2d 508 (1997) (courts of appeals are to apply "abuse of discretion" standard when reviewing district court's reliability determination).

[7] [8] [9] As indicated by the Supreme Court in Kumho Tire Co., Ltd., [47] the relevance and reliability inquiry under Daubert is necessarily very fact specific. [48] Furthermore, a trial court's decision whether to admit expert testimony, and how to determine the reliability of such testimony, is subject to an abuse of discretion review. [49] According to the Fifth Circuit, "[d]istrict courts enjoy wide latitude in determining the admissibility of expert testimony, and the discretion of the trial judge and his or her decision will not be disturbed on appeal unless manifestly erroneous." [50]

The IRS' main argument as to why Rubenstein's testimony does not pass muster under Daubert is that Rubenstein did not opine on anything the Wylys did or any facts specific to the Cases. Instead, Rubenstein gave a general assessment of what the bar thought was normal or proper practice regarding offshore trusts during the relevant time period and opined as to areas where the bar thought that the law was uncertain. At the outset, the Court notes that the language of Federal Rule of Evidence 702(d) requiring an expert to apply their principles and methods "to the facts of the case" does not per se exclude expert testimony that does not refer to the facts of the particular case before the fact finder. [51] However, despite the permissibility of "general principles" expert testimony, such expert testimony is not automatically relevant.

364 As the IRS pointed out during its cross-examination of Rubenstein, Rubenstein does not apply his concept of normal or proper practice to the facts of the Cases or to anything that the Wylys did. [52] Nor does he know whether the Wylys or their advisors viewed the law governing their offshore transactions as uncertain. [53] Thus, this Court has no way of knowing whether the scope of normal or proper practice that Rubenstein describes encompasses anything that the Wylys did. Nor is this Court able to say for certain whether the legal uncertainties that Rubenstein described influenced the Wylys or their advisors. The lack of connection between Rubenstein's testimony and the Wylys' actions raises relevance concerns.

Despite these concerns, Rubenstein's testimony that, during the relevant time periods: (i) the use of protectors in the context of foreign trusts was permissible and even common, (ii) de facto control of trustees by grantors was not out of the ordinary, and (iii) the use of "accommodation grantors" was thought to be legitimate is admittedly of some relevance here. It is helpful for the Court to understand that these practices—in and of themselves—were not considered to be inappropriate by the cross-border trust and estate and tax bars during the relevant time period. [54] However, without any opinion as to whether the manner in which the Wylys themselves implemented their offshore system falls within the scope of the "usual" practices that Rubenstein describes, the Court can draw few useful conclusions from Rubenstein's testimony. While the Court can conclude that, in at least some situations, the use of protectors, accommodation grantors, and other devices that Rubenstein described was seen by the trust and estate and tax bars during the relevant time period as appropriate, the Court has no way of knowing how these same bars would have viewed the Wylys' particular uses of these same devices. Though there is admittedly some relevance to Rubenstein's testimony, it is limited.

Despite its limited relevance, Rubenstein's opinions are reliable for what they are as shown by his curriculum vitae (CV), testimony at the Daubert hearing, and testimony at trial—his recollections based on his experience as an admittedly prominent and accomplished cross-border trust and estate and tax lawyer who practiced during the relevant time period, coupled with some confirmatory research. [55] Rubenstein's opinions were testable both by exploring the research that was cited in his expert report and by probing the accuracy of his own recollections. Indeed, the IRS did this at trial by pointing out that Rubenstein did not speak to any practitioners specifically to confirm his recollection of the cross-border trust and estate and tax bars' views during the relevant time period. Nevertheless, Rubenstein did engage in substantial research and pointed out 365 that he spoke to practitioners "every day of every week" in the course of his work. [56]

[10] As the Supreme Court counseled in Daubert, [57] "[v]igorous cross-examination, presentation of contrary evidence, and careful instruction on the burden of proof are the traditional and appropriate means of attacking shaky but admissible evidence." Despite the various issues with Rubenstein's testimony, this Court finds that Rubenstein's opinions that are not impermissible legal conclusions are somewhat relevant and reliable, and therefore admissible under the principles of Daubert. [58] As this is a bench trial, the Court need not be concerned with any possible undue prejudice outweighing the probative value of Rubenstein's testimony under Federal Rule of Evidence 403. [59] The Court is capable of giving Rubenstein's testimony its proper weight, which it views as limited in light of the concerns outlined above.

[11] Finally, we address the IRS' third argument—that Rubenstein was not qualified to give an opinion on the private annuity transactions at issue here. The IRS argued that Rubenstein's lack of experience with private annuity transactions in a foreign trust context rendered him unqualified under Federal Rule of Evidence 702 to give any opinion related to the private annuity transactions at issue here. [60] According to the Fifth Circuit, qualification of experts should not become a battle of labels, where the expert's expertise is labeled broadly and the needed expertise is labeled narrowly in an attempt to disqualify experts. [61] Furthermore, the Fifth Circuit has stated that "it is well established that an expert's qualifications depend upon his knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education, and the trial court is afforded the widest possible discretion in deciding whether a witness qualifies as an expert" [62] and that those challenging a trial court's determination that an expert is qualified or not face a "heavy burden." [63]

Rubenstein is an experienced cross-border trust and estate and tax lawyer, as his CV amply demonstrates. [64] Furthermore, Rubenstein's uncontradicted testimony was that utilizing a foreign trust, as opposed to a domestic trust, does not change the character of the private annuity transaction itself. [65] Thus, Rubenstein's experience advising taxpayers as to annuities issued by domestic trusts makes him qualified to testify here. For these reasons, the Court rejects the IRS' argument and will permit Rubenstein's testimony to the extent set forth above.

*366 D. Dee's Motion for Partial Summary Judgment

Dee filed a Motion for Partial Summary Judgment [ECF No. 879] on November 16, 2015, seeking to have this Court determine that there was no evidence in the record to support the IRS' claim for fraud penalties under 26 U.S.C. § 6663. The IRS opposed Dee's motion, which motion was heard on December 21, 2015, shortly before trial was scheduled to commence. Given (i) other more pressing matters in preparing for trial, and (ii) the timing of when the parties filed briefs on Dee's innocent spouse defense, which the Court wanted to read and understand before ruling on her motion for partial summary judgment, the Court simply ran out of time to rule on her motion before trial. The motion is now moot, as the issues were fully tried by the parties.

III. FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

While the parties stipulated to many facts as noted previously, the Court will briefly summarize certain facts in order to put its legal analysis into context. This summary is, by definition, incomplete, and more facts will be found and analyzed throughout this Memorandum Opinion.

As noted previously, Sam and Charles are brothers who grew up in modest circumstances in northeast Louisiana. Charles was about a year older than Sam and they were close friends and business associates throughout their adult lives. As relevant here, Sam founded his first company, University Computing Company in 1963. [66] At this point he brought in Charles—who had been working in Houston for IBM—and grew University Computing Company to a successful public company. [67] Then, Sam and Charles bought the Bonanza Steakhouses company when it was insolvent and grew it from 15 or 20 stores to about 600 stores; [68] bought Gulf Insurance whose business included annuities; [69] founded Earth Resources; [70] bought Computer Technology company; [71] and founded Datran, an innovative firm that attempted a digital data transmission business in competition with AT & T. [72] Sam then co-founded Sterling Software, Inc. ("Sterling Software") with Charles and served as its Chairman of the Board from 1981 through its acquisition by Computer Associates in 2000. [73] The common stock of Sterling Software was publicly traded on the New York Stock Exchange. [74]

Sam was the Chairman of the Executive Committee and a Director of Sterling Commerce, Inc. ("Sterling Commerce") from December 1995 through its acquisition by SBC Communications in 2000. [75] The common stock of Sterling Commerce was publicly traded on the New York Stock Exchange. [76] Sterling Commerce was a wholly owned subsidiary of Sterling Software until March 1996 when Sterling Commerce completed an initial public offering in which it sold approximately 18.4% 367 of its outstanding common stock. [77] In September 1996, Sterling Software declared a special dividend and distributed all the Sterling Commerce shares it owned to all the Sterling Software shareholders. [78]

Sam was the Chairman of the Board of Michaels Stores, Inc. ("Michaels Stores") from 1984 through July 2001 and Vice–Chairman of the Board from July 2001 through its acquisition by a consortium of private equity firms in 2006. [79] The common stock of Michaels Stores was publicly traded on the New York Stock Exchange. [80]

Charles was a co-founder of Sterling Software and served as its Vice–Chairman of the Board from 1984 through its acquisition by Computer Associates in 2000. [81] Charles was a member of the Executive Committee and a Director of Sterling Commerce from December 1995 through its acquisition by SBC Communications in 2000. [82] Charles was the Vice–Chairman of the Board of Michaels Stores from 1984 through July 2001 and the Chairman of the Board from July 2001 through its acquisition by a consortium of private equity firms in 2006. [83] Charles was killed in an automobile accident in Colorado on August 7, 2011. [84]

Given the wide variety of business ventures Sam and Charles were involved in, they needed administrative help. Sharyl Robertson ("Robertson") started working for the Wylys as a bookkeeper in the late 1970s and eventually became chief financial officer of Highland Stargate, Ltd., a Texas Limited Partnership, which is the Wyly family office located in Dallas ("Highland Stargate" or "Wyly family office"). [85] In late 1998, she left that position and became employed full time by Maverick Capital, Ltd. ("Maverick"), an investment management company that was established and initially run by Sam and his eldest son, Evan. [86]

Keeley Hennington ("Hennington") began working for Highland Stargate in January 1999 as tax director. [87] She became chief financial officer of Highland Stargate in June 2000 and still remains there in that position today. [88]

Given the wide variety of business ventures the Wylys were involved in, they also needed legal help. Michael French ("French") is an attorney licensed to practice law in Texas. [89] He was an equity partner in the law firm of Jackson Walker from 1976 through 1992 and a non-equity partner in that firm from 1992 through 1995. [90] Jackson Walker was the Wylys' law firm and French was their primary lawyer, controlling the Wyly business within the firm.

French testified that he left Jackson Walker to become a consultant to two Wyly-related entities—Sterling Software and Michaels Stores. [91] French also testified 368 that after leaving Jackson Walker he worked with the Wylys to help set up Maverick, which was an investment management business. [92] When asked why he left Jackson Walker, French had a one-word explanation —"money." [93] He then elaborated, "I made more money as a consultant to Sterling Software and Michaels Stores and the other activities, Maverick activities." [94]

When Jeannette Meier, the general counsel of Sterling Software, expressed a preference for Jones Day as an outside law firm, French also became a "consultant" to Jones Day from 1995 through 2000, after which Jones Day started doing work for Sterling Software and Michaels Stores. [95] French was paid a consulting fee by Jones Day for bringing Wyly business to the firm. [96]

Starting in 1995, French officed with the Wylys at the Wyly family office. From 1993 to 2000, the Wylys decided the amount of French's total compensation paid by entities controlled by or affiliated with them. [97] In 1996, Sam and Evan promised French that his income would be at least $1.5 million per year or the Wylys would personally pay him the difference between what he made from the Wyly related entities and $1.5 million. [98] French also served as a director of Michaels Stores from July 1992 through March 2000, and as a director of Sterling Software from September 1992 through August 2000. [99]

Dee is Charles' widow, having met and married him during college at Louisiana Tech. [100] Dee did not finish college after Charles and she were married. [101] Charles and she had five children and she was their primary caregiver. [102] During her 50 plus year marriage to Charles, Dee was a homemaker. [103] She was not involved in Charles' business ventures and did not talk business with him. [104] Charles provided for the family financially and Dee took care of their home. [105]

By 1990, Sam and Charles had accumulated enormous wealth. As the SDNY Court found, and was independently established here, "in early to mid–1991, Sam Wyly asked Robertson to attend a seminar held by lawyer and trust promoter David Tedder ["Tedder"] on the use of foreign trusts as a method of asset protection and tax deferral." [106] Robertson circulated a 369 memo about Tedder's proposed system of "Asset Protection and Tax Deferral" (the "Tedder Seminar Memo") to Sam, Charles, Evan, French, and an in-house CPA, Ethel Ketter. [107] In the Tedder Seminar Memo, Robertson identified six goals, four of which implicated the IRS: [108]

> 1. Never pay probate unless there is a tax advantage in your state (not in Texas).
> 2. Whenever possible eliminate inheritance tax—Tedder says everyone can reduce it to zero.
>
> 3. Wherever possible reduce income tax—both domestically and foreign.
> 4. Never let a creditor get your asset, no matter how bad your mistake. (In 18 years of practice, Tedder's firm has never had a creditor successfully pierce the asset protection setup).[109]
>
> 5. Be able to change your asset protection/tax savings system.
> 6. Feel comfortable with the setup you've got. If your [sic] not comfortable with a foreign setup don't do it.

The Tedder Seminar Memo further identified "[t]he three major sources of creditor problems—unknown creditor, IRS-inheritance, IRS-income tax."[110]

The Tedder Seminar Memo also warned to "[a]lways show your chart to the creditor, rely on law not secrecy."[111] The Tedder Seminar Memo also laid out an aggressive tax transaction in which assets are exchanged to a foreign system for an annuity, warning that due to the aggressive nature of the transaction that the taxpayer should "file every tax form available and any support schedule that seems pertinent."[112] Tedder later provided the Wylys with written information about his firm's view of asset protection, including a document entitled "An Overview of Asset Protection Estate and Income Tax Reduction Using Domestic and International Structures."[113] The goal, as stated in the overview, "is to ensure that a creditor will never be able to touch or get control of your assets, and allow you to maintain complete control of all your assets."[114]

Sam was interested in the programs outlined in the Tedder Seminar Memo and related documents. Thus, as found by the SDNY Court, and independently established here, "[s]hortly thereafter, the Wylys, Robertson, and French attended another Tedder seminar in New Orleans."[115] There, Tedder gave a presentation about 370 the tax advantages of foreign trusts.[116] The SDNY Court also found, as do we, "Tedder, French, and the Wylys then had a private meeting at Sam Wyly's house in Malibu, California. At that meeting, Tedder 'talked about establishing trusts that would provide tax deferral, and how the Wylys could transfer assets to those trusts and get tax deferral on the growth of those assets.' "[117]

Specifically, in Malibu, Tedder told the Wylys that they could establish offshore trusts in the Isle of Man ("IOM") and transfer their stock options in Michaels Stores and Sterling Software to those trusts in exchange for annuities.[118] Tedder further stated that capital gains earned on securities held in the Isle of Man Trusts would not be taxed by U.S. tax authorities. As the SDNY Court found, as do we, "Tedder recommended transferring the Wylys' stock options in Sterling Software and Michaels Stores to a foreign trust in exchange for a private annuity 'in a tax-free kind of transaction.' Under Tedder's plan, it was 'expressly intended that [the Wylys] ... irrevocably surrender the enjoyment, control, ownership, and all economic benefits attributable to the ownership of the [options] which are sold in exchange for the private annuity.' "[119]

In part because of the complexity of the record keeping required to support the Wyly offshore system, and in part because of their desire for secrecy and to make access to the records of the offshore system more difficult for their creditors, including the IRS, to obtain if there was ever a challenge to the offshore system, Sam and Charles implemented an offshore version of their Dallas family office in the mid–1990s called Irish Trust Company ("Irish Trust"), an entity domiciled in the Cayman Islands and indirectly owned by two of the Wyly IOM trusts.[120]

Michelle Boucher ("Boucher") became a trusted Wyly advisor in approximately 1995 and then became a protector of the Wyly IOM trusts in 2001.[121] Boucher is a 371 Canadian citizen who resides in the Cayman Islands.[122] The Wylys first met Boucher when she was working for MeesPierson in the Cayman Islands, where one of her clients was Maverick.[123] Acting on behalf of Sam and Charles, Robertson approached Boucher around 1995 and offered her a position as chief financial officer of Irish Trust.[124] Boucher accepted and continued in this position until 2010, when her role changed to consultant to Irish Trust.[125] Boucher remains at Irish Trust today.

At Irish Trust, Boucher reported to Robertson, French, and later Donnie Miller (Dee's son-in-law and executor of Charles' probate estate), and Evan (Sam's eldest son).[126]

Prior to becoming a trust protector herself, Boucher served as a conduit, the person who communicated the Wylys' recommendations between the protectors (Robertson and French) and the various IOM trustees.[127] Francis Webb, an employee of IFG, one of the trust management companies who served as trustee for certain of the Wyly IOM trusts,[128] summarized a meeting with French and Robertson concerning the hiring of Boucher and the movement of all records concerning the Wyly IOM trusts to the Cayman Islands in a memorandum dated September 29, 1995.[129] Webb's memorandum states that French and Robertson were concerned about the trail of communications to the trustees and records maintained in the United States:[130]

> We were already aware of the roles played by Michael French and Sharyl Robertson, representing Maverick Capital and the Wyly Family, and firstly the role of Michelle Boucher was explained.... We will therefore have prime contact with Michelle in most situations as she is to act as the focus of communications and maintain records etc. which should not be seen in the USA....Michael and Sharyl are anxious that any trail of communications between themselves, Michelle and MeesPierson does not give rise to any potential claim that control is being exercised in the USA. Consequently we may anticipate that there will be telephone communications only from Dallas; suggestions possibly put forward via Michelle Boucher but it was agreed that there should be formal recommendations made by the Trustees to the Protectors Committee wherever appropriate to maintain a required direction of control.

After a chance meeting in the Cayman Islands in mid–2003 between Charles Lubar ("Lubar"), a prominent international tax attorney, and Boucher, Boucher learned that Lubar (i) had previously concluded that there was a "significant risk" that the 1992 IOM trusts settled by Sam and Charles would be treated as grantor trusts to them under the Internal Revenue Code, and (ii) had informed French of his firm's conclusions a decade earlier.[131] 372 Boucher informed Hennington, which led to a flurry of activity.[132]

First, Hennington and Boucher met with Lubar at his London office where Lubar's concerns with the offshore system dating back to 1993 were discussed in detail. Hennington and Boucher informed Sam and Charles, among others, of Lubar's legal conclusions.[133] Of note, while numerous witnesses at trial expressed surprise over this news because it was contrary to other advice that had been allegedly received,[134] Sam was not one of the witnesses expressing surprise.[135]

Second, acting as agents for Sam and Charles, Hennington and Boucher hired Lubar to reanalyze all of the issues surrounding the Wyly offshore system, which he did and which confirmed his original conclusions. Lubar ultimately recommended an anonymous meeting with the IRS on the Wylys' behalf to see if a global resolution of the tax issues surrounding the Wyly offshore system could be achieved, which recommendation the Wylys 373 accepted and authorized.[136] Thus, in August 2003, Lubar and other Wyly attorneys had a meeting with the IRS, on an anonymous basis, to discuss the Wyly IOM offshore system and activities undertaken offshore in an attempt to secure a global resolution of the Wyly's looming tax issues.[137] Although the parties have different perspectives on this meeting, it is sufficient for our purposes to simply state that nothing ultimately came from this meeting.

Third, because the extended due date of Sam's 2002 tax return was quickly approaching (October 15, 2003), and given that Meadows Owens had been advising the Wylys for years and had apparently given advice to them previously about the offshore system,[138] the Wylys, acting through Hennington, requested additional advice from Meadows Owens.[139] By this time, the primary lawyer at Meadows Owens that the Wylys used, Rodney Owens ("Owens"), had passed away.[140] However, other

Meadows Owens attorneys that had worked with Owens on Wyly matters—primarily Charles Pulman ("Pulman") and Trey Cousins ("Cousins")—met with Hennington and quickly made recommendations on available alternatives, one of which was that the Wylys make formal disclosures of the tax positions identified by Lubar on their tax returns. Specifically, Meadows Owens recommended that Sam file a Form 8275 disclosure with his about-to-be filed 2002 tax return, which is a from that can be filed with the IRS when the position being taken on a tax return has only a reasonable basis of being sustained, in order to attempt to avoid accuracy related penalties from being imposed by the IRS. [141] Because Dee and Charles had already filed their 2002 joint tax return, Meadows Owens recommended that Dee and Charles file a Form 8275 disclosure with their 2003 joint tax return (filed in October 2004), which they did. [142]

Early in 2004, the IRS commenced an audit of the Wylys' returns for the 2000 tax year. From the beginning of the audit it was clear that the IRS was examining the offshore trusts and the annuity transaction undertaken offshore. [143]

The Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the United States Senate undertook an investigation of tax haven abuses. The Wylys offshore system was one of the offshore systems investigated. That investigation became public knowledge 374 sometime in 2005. [144] Hennington testified that attorneys hired by the Wylys reviewed all of the files maintained in the Wyly family office and over 700 boxes of documents in off-site storage in response to document requests made in relation to the investigation. [145]

By April of 2005, Bickel & Brewer and Donald Lan [146] of Kroney Mincey PC were hired as counsel for the Wylys to handle the government's on-going tax and securities investigations. Prior to the filing of the Wylys' 2005 federal income tax returns in October 2006, Bickel & Brewer learned that certain IOM trusts settled in 1994 and 1995 had not been funded with the amount of funds required by the trust deeds of settlement, [147] which raises additional concerns about the validity of the IOM offshore system as will be discussed infra at pp. 415–23.

On July 30, 2010, the SEC sued Sam, Charles, and French, among others, in the SEC Action, asserting ten counts of securities fraud. French settled with the SEC. [148] As noted previously, following a jury trial on the liability phase and a bench trial on the remedies phase of the SEC Action, the SDNY Court entered judgment against Sam and the probate estate of Charles, for $123,836,958.75 and $63,881,743.97, respectively, plus prejudgment interest, [149] finding that Sam and Charles had committed securities fraud. This decision is currently on appeal to the Second Circuit Court of Appeals.

On October 19, 2014, shortly before judgment was entered against him in the SEC Action, Sam filed his Case here. Shortly thereafter, Dee filed her Case here. The Cases are being jointly administered. On the day each Case was filed, the Debtor's respective Motion was filed. The IRS timely filed the Proofs of Claim against each of the Debtors and the Debtors filed the Claim Objections, which brings us to the present dispute before the Court.

IV. LEGAL ANALYSIS

A. Burden of Proof

Like most aspects of the Cases, the burden of proof analysis is complicated. The fact that the IRS is asserting federal tax liability in the context of the Proofs of Claim implicates not only the burden-shifting analysis applicable to proofs of claim in bankruptcy generally, but also multiple additional burden shifting doctrines and statutory allocations of burdens of proof that apply specifically to tax matters. None of these burden of proof analyses are exactly alike, so the Court will proceed in the only way it can—by analyzing each burden of proof framework before coming to its ultimate conclusions.

1. Bankruptcy Law Burden of Proof—In General

[12] [13] In bankruptcy, a proof of claim filed in accordance with Bankruptcy Rule 375 3001 [150] is "prima facie evidence of the validity and amount of the claim." [151] However, this prima facie validity may be rebutted [152] by the objecting party producing evidence "of a probative force equal to that of the creditor's proof of claim." [153] In 2000, the Supreme Court held, in a bankruptcy case involving a proof of claim asserting tax liability, "bankruptcy does not alter the burden imposed by the substantive law."[154] Thus, once an objecting party produces evidence rebutting a proof of claim, the burden then lies with whichever party it would normally according to the relevant substantive law.[155] Here, that relevant substantive law is federal tax law, which often, but not always, puts the initial burden of proof on the taxpayer.

The Debtors' arguments here regarding burden of proof implicate every step of the bankruptcy burden of proof analysis, to which we now turn.

a) Prima Facie Validity under Bankruptcy Rule 3001(f)

The Debtors initially argue that the burden of proof lies with the IRS because the Proofs of Claim were not filed in accordance with Bankruptcy Rule 3001, and thus do not constitute prima facie evidence of the validity or amount of the IRS' claims.[156] In particular, the Debtors argue that the Proofs of Claim fail to comply with Bankruptcy Rule 3001 for three reasons: (i) they do not contain an itemized statement of the interest, fees, expenses, or charges required in individual bankruptcies under Bankruptcy Rule 3001(c)(2)(A),[157] (ii) they were not executed in accordance with Official Form 10 as required by Bankruptcy Rule 3001(b) because the IRS bankruptcy specialist who signed the Proofs of Claim "signed and filed the IRS Claims without any factual basis whatsoever, instead relying on IRS staff professionals to investigate and prepare the forms for his signature,"[158] and (iii) they lack sufficient information for the Debtors to evaluate the bases of them.[159] The Debtors also argue that the IRS' supposed missteps in failing to comply with Bankruptcy Rule 3001 are exacerbated by the fact that the Proofs of Claim contained numerous errors.[160]

Although much of the "fuss" surrounding the burden of proof issues revolved around the now-stipulated income tax liability amounts reflected in the Computation Stipulations, the Court undertakes the 376 burden of proof analysis because of its potential relevance to other areas of dispute in the Cases.[161] For the reasons explained below, the Court rejects the Debtors' arguments and will accord prima facie validity to the Proofs of Claim.

Regarding the failure of the IRS to attach an itemized statement of the interest, fees, expenses, or charges to the Proofs of Claim, it must first be noted that such failure was not complete. In the Proofs of Claim filed by the IRS in these Cases, the IRS did break out the amount of income tax due and interest on income tax due on a year-by-year basis, as well as the amount of gift tax due and interest on gift tax due on a year-by-year basis.[162] However, the IRS did not similarly break out the amounts of penalties due on a year-by-year basis.[163] For the reasons explained below, the Court concludes that this failure was harmless under the highly unique facts of these Cases.

Bankruptcy Rule 3001(c)(2)(D) provides the appropriate remedies that a court may invoke for a creditor's failure to attach the itemized statement required by Bankruptcy Rule 3001(c)(2)(A). These remedies include precluding the IRS from presenting the omitted information (unless the Court determines that the IRS' failure to include this information "was substantially justified or is harmless"[164]) or awarding other appropriate relief.

In light of the highly unique facts of these Cases, the Court does not choose to exercise either of these (or any other) remedies. These Cases involved a great deal of back-and-forth between the parties, as is to be expected when billions of dollars of potential tax liability hang in the balance.[165] The IRS met with the Debtors shortly after filing the Proofs of Claim, at which meeting it made a presentation explaining how it had calculated its claims 377 against them.[166] This presentation—along with the open lines of communication that existed between the parties' respective counsel throughout the pre-trial and trial phases of the Motions and Claim Objections—eventually allowed the parties to come to the Computation Stipulations resolving the vast majority of the calculations relevant to the Debtors' ultimate tax liability, once the Court determines certain factual and legal issues that remain in dispute between them. The presentation and these open lines of communication caused the essential purpose of the itemized statement required by Bankruptcy Rule 3001(c)(2) to be satisfied.

The Advisory Committee Notes that accompany Bankruptcy Rule 3001 state that subsection (c)(2) was added:

> to require additional information to accompany proofs of claim filed in cases in which the debtor is an individual. When the holder of a claim seeks to recover-in addition to the principal amount of a debt-interest, fees, expenses, or other charges, the proof of claim must be accompanied by a statement itemizing these additional amounts with sufficient specificity to make clear the basis for the claimed amount. [167]

Even though the IRS did not attach a completely itemized statement as required by Bankruptcy Rule 3001(c)(2)(A), it did "make clear the basis for the claimed amount" to the Debtors through the itemized statement that was attached to its Proofs of Claim, its presentation to the Debtors, and through regular communication with Debtors' counsel. The IRS did not act as a recalcitrant creditor who refused to provide information to the Debtors. On the contrary, the evidence shows that the IRS was very forthcoming with information about how it calculated its claims, and because of this, at least in part, the parties were able to come to the Computation Stipulations.

[14] In light of the fact that the Debtors were supplied with a great deal of information regarding the amounts of interest and penalties asserted in the Proofs of Claim, the IRS' failure to supply a fully itemized statement of interest, fees, expenses, or other charges as required by Bankruptcy Rule 3001(c)(2)(A) was harmless, and did not affect the Proofs of Claim's prima facie validity.

[15] [16] The Debtors also argue that the Proofs of Claim are not prima facie valid because the IRS insolvency specialist who signed them relied on other IRS staff to prepare them and simply accepted their calculations as true and accurate without checking them. [168] The Court is less troubled by this than the Debtors, as "IRS employees possess the properly delegated authority to file a proof of claim and participate in bankruptcy proceedings on behalf of the United States." [169] The IRS insolvency specialist who signed the Proofs of Claim testified that this authority was delegated to him pursuant to IRS Delegation Order 25–3. [170] Moreover, "Rule 3001 378 is not inflexible." [171] The Debtors failed to cite a single case where a court denied an IRS proof of claim prima facie validity because the signatory did not personally perform the claim calculations. This Court was likewise unable to locate such a case. That is likely because the fact that the signing insolvency specialist did not personally prepare the underlying calculations does not affect the claims' prima facie validity. As a practical matter here, given the variety of different components of the IRS' claims against the Debtors and the complexities of the claim calculations, it is unlikely that a single person could have actually calculated the amounts and then signed the claim. So, unless multiple people then have to sign a single claim on behalf of the IRS, the Debtors' argument is untenable. For all of these reasons, the Court rejects the Debtors' argument.

[17] Finally, the Debtors argue that the Proofs of Claim are deficient because "[t]he IRS Claims lack any explanation as to the basic facts on which the IRS relies to determine the alleged liabilities; instead the IRS Claims contain only bare-bones legal conclusions without reference to any facts whatsoever." [172] The Court rejects this argument as it overlooks the fact that the Proofs of Claim are based on a statute, not on a writing, and therefore it is not necessary for the IRS to attach any supporting documentation to the Proofs of Claim in order to comply with Bankruptcy Rule 3001. [173] Where, as here, the IRS chose to attach support to the Proofs of Claim when it was not required to do so and then made a specific presentation to the Debtors to explain the bases of its claims against them, [174] the Debtors' contention that the Proofs of Claim did not provide sufficient notice cannot be taken seriously.

When all is said and done, the Proofs of Claim fulfilled their "essential purpose of providing objecting parties with sufficient information to evaluate the nature of the claims." [175] The Proofs of Claim substantially comply with Bankruptcy Rule 3001, and are thus prima facie evidence of the validity and the amount of the IRS' claims against the Debtors under Bankruptcy Rule 3001(f).

b) Have the Debtors Raised Evidence of a Probative Force Equal to that of the Proofs of Claim?

The Debtors next argue that even if the Proofs of Claim are afforded prima facie validity, they have raised evidence of a probative force equal to that of the Proofs of Claim.[176] If this is true, then the burden of proof lies with whichever party it normally would under federal tax law.[177]

The Debtors imply that they could raise evidence of equal probative force to the Proofs of Claim merely by stating that the IRS' claimed amounts are "too high."[178] Their reliance on 379 In re 804 Congress, L.L.C.,[179] however, is misplaced. In re 804 Congress, L.L.C. involved creditors asserting claims for contractual attorney fees who did not attach any supporting documentation to the proof of claim.[180] In that case, the bankruptcy court held that in a situation where no documents are provided to support a claim based on a writing—in clear contravention of Bankruptcy Rule 3001(c)(1)—a mere questioning of the claim's reasonableness could be construed as evidence of equal probative force to the proof of claim itself. Here, however, the Proofs of Claim are based on a statute, and no documents were required to be attached to them in the first instance. Thus, In re 804 Congress, L.L.C. is clearly distinguishable.

[18] Accordingly, we must further examine what sort of evidence could meet the standard of "equal in probative force" and whether the Debtors raised such evidence here. As this Court recently held, once the prima facie validity of a proof of claim under Bankruptcy Rule 3001(f) is established:

> The burden of going forward with the evidence then shifts to the objecting party to produce evidence at least equal in probative force to that offered by the proof of claim and which, if believed, would refute at least one of the allegations that is essential to the claim's legal sufficiency. This can be done by the objecting party producing specific and detailed allegations that place the claim into dispute, by the presentation of legal arguments based upon the contents of the claim and its supporting documents, or by the presentation of pretrial pleadings, such as a motion for summary judgment, in which evidence is presented to bring the validity of the claim into question.[181]

Here, the Proofs of Claim seek amounts from the Debtors that fall into four basic categories: (i) income taxes, (ii) gift taxes, (iii) fraud penalties, and (iv) failure to file penalties.[182] As noted previously, shortly before trial commenced, the parties reached agreement on the Computation Stipulations, which will enable the parties to calculate the amounts owed to the IRS depending on this Court's analysis of certain legal and factual issues that remain in dispute among them, rendering the pre-trial dispute over the burden of proof on the amount of the Debtors' income tax underpayments and gift tax underpayments moot.

However, a dispute remains regarding whether any gifts were actually made by the Debtors, for which the IRS is asserting gift taxes (and associated penalties). The Debtors have raised legal arguments that create doubts as to whether gifts were made. The Debtors also introduced evidence suggesting that the transactions that remain at issue were not gifts.[183] These arguments and evidence together 380 form evidence that is of a probative force equal to that raised by the Proofs of Claim regarding the alleged gift tax issues. Thus, the ultimate burden of proof will be where federal tax law places it, as discussed further below.

The parties likewise agree—as does this Court—that the IRS bears the burden of proving its claim for fraud penalties (for both income and gift tax underpayments) by clear and convincing evidence.[184] But, even without their agreement, the Debtors presented evidence of a probative force equal to the Proofs of Claim regarding the fraud penalties being sought by the IRS.[185] Thus, the ultimate burden of proof on the issue of fraud penalties lies where the substantive federal tax law places it, as discussed further below.

Regarding the IRS' claims for international failure to file penalties, the Debtors also raised legal arguments that cast into doubt at least some of the IRS' assertions that the Debtors failed to file certain required forms.[186] Thus, the burden of proof on the issue of whether the Debtors are liable for international failure to file penalties also lies where federal tax law places it, as discussed further below.

2. Tax Law Burden of Proof—In General

As noted previously, in 2000, the Supreme Court held that "bankruptcy does not alter the burden imposed by the substantive law."[187] Because the Debtors have rebutted the Proofs of Claim as to the Debtors' alleged liability for gift taxes, fraud penalties, and international failure to file penalties, we must now determine where federal tax law places the burden of proof on these issues.

a) Gift Tax Deficiencies and the Presumption of Correctness[188]

[19] [20] [21] The burden of proof analyses—there are two relevant here—regarding gift tax deficiencies are by far the most complicated of the tax law burden of proof analyses that this Court must address. However, before reaching those analyses we must discuss one of the general rules regarding burden of proof in tax matters—i.e., the presumption of correctness. In tax court proceedings, after the IRS has made a determination that a certain amount of tax is due, the burden of proof is usually on the taxpayer to show that the IRS' determination is incorrect. As the Supreme Court has stated, "[u]nquestionably the burden of proof is on the taxpayer to show that the Commissioner's determination is invalid."[189] Not surprisingly, the Fifth Circuit agrees: "it is well settled that the courts afford IRS determinations of deficiency a presumption of correctness."[190] Of course, in order to be afforded a presumption of correctness, the IRS' deficiency determination must be "supported by a minimal factual foundation."[191] If for some reason the presumption of correctness does not apply to the IRS' 381 determination of tax liability, then the IRS has the burden of proving that the taxpayer owes tax.

Fifth Circuit precedent supports the view that a proof of claim filed by the IRS should be afforded the presumption of correctness. In Portillo v. C.I.R.,[192] the court noted that there is really no prescribed form for the statutory deficiency notice that normally contains the IRS' determination which receives the presumption of correctness, and that this notice simply must, at a minimum: (i) advise the taxpayer that the IRS has determined that a deficiency exists for a particular year, and (ii) specify the amount of the deficiency or provide the information necessary to compute the deficiency. In Data Industries Corp. of Texas v. I.R.S.,[193] the Fifth Circuit stated:

> Data Industries makes two contentions in its effort to overturn the District Court's order. First, Data contends that, notwithstanding the prima facie correctness of a claim filed in bankruptcy proceedings, the presumptive correctness arising from the underlying tax assessment cannot be invoked unless the Government produces additional evidence such as a copy of the assessment certificate. This contention simply has no merit, particularly since all pertinent information relating to the IRS assessment was contained in the proofs of claim filed by the Government in the bankruptcy proceedings.

Under this precedent, the Proofs of Claim are entitled to the presumption of correctness,[194] unless the Debtors' two arguments as to why the presumption of correctness does not apply here have merit.

(1) Is the IRS' Determination "Arbitrary and Erroneous?"

The Debtors first argue that the presumption of correctness should not apply because the IRS' determinations of gift tax deficiencies are arbitrary and erroneous.[195] If the presumption of correctness does not apply, then the IRS has the burden of proving up its claim that gift tax is owed by one or both Debtors. In In re Olshan,[196] the Ninth Circuit described how a taxpayer is able to shift the burden of proof to the IRS by arguing that the IRS' deficiency determination was arbitrary and erroneous:

> A bankruptcy court adjudicating a tax claim by the IRS must apply > the burden-of-proof rubric normally applied under tax law. In an action to collect taxes, the government bears the initial burden of proof. That burden is satisfied by the IRS' deficiency determinations and assessments for unpaid taxes, which are presumed correct so long as they are supported by a minimal factual foundation. However, a showing by the taxpayer that a determination is arbitrary, excessive or without foundation shifts the burden of proof back to the IRS. Thus, once the debtor rebuts the presumption, the burden reverts to the IRS to show that its determination was correct.

Although Olshan states that the burden will be shifted to the IRS when its determinations 382 are "arbitrary, excessive, or without foundation," the standard in the Fifth Circuit uses different words—i.e., that the IRS' determinations must be "arbitrary and erroneous."[197] Moreover, as the Olshan court notes "where an assessment is based on more than one item, the presumption of correctness attaches to each item. Proof that an item is in error destroys the presumption for that single item; the remaining items retain their presumption of correctness."[198] However, "a pattern of arbitrariness or carelessness" may destroy the presumption for the entire assessment.[199] In the Fifth Circuit, the idea behind the "arbitrary and erroneous" analysis is that the IRS must have "some factual foundation" for its claims that unreported income is owed.[200]

Portillo v. C.I.R.[201] is a leading Fifth Circuit case applying an arbitrary and erroneous analysis. In Portillo, a taxpayer who worked as a contractor reported receiving $10,800 in income from a client, and that client subsequently issued a Form 1099 reporting that the taxpayer had received more than three times this amount.[202] The IRS then sought to collect additional tax from the taxpayer.[203] According to the client who issued the 1099 to the taxpayer, the vast majority of the difference between the $10,800 reported by the taxpayer and the much higher amount reported by the client was based on cash payments for which no records existed.[204] The IRS did little investigation to determine whether the taxpayer had actually received the extra income reported by his client.[205] Since the IRS insisted that its determination that additional tax was owed be afforded the presumption of correctness, the taxpayer was placed in the unenviable position of needing to prove a negative —that he had not received these cash payments.[206] The Fifth Circuit held that the IRS' determination was arbitrary and erroneous because faced with a 1040 from Portillo that was inconsistent with a 1099 on file, the IRS simply assumed that Portillo was the dishonest one without engaging in any further investigation or substantiation.[207] Thus, the IRS' determination that additional tax was due had no factual foundation.

[22] These Cases do not present a situation where the IRS' claim for gift taxes is arbitrary and erroneous by virtue of having absolutely no evidentiary foundation.[208] The IRS reviewed a voluminous record of information gathered from the Wylys and third parties before filing the Proofs of Claim. Nor are they cases where the IRS failed to consider the Wylys' tax returns and other information relevant to the alleged 383 gifts.[209] In fact, the Debtors' objections to the IRS gift tax claims are largely legal, not factual. Obviously, allocation of burden of proof and shifts thereof is relevant only to factual issues, not legal ones.[210]

For these reasons, the Court finds that the Proofs of Claim were not arbitrary and erroneous.

(2) Burden Shifting under 26 U.S.C. § 7491

The Internal Revenue Code provides one more opportunity for the Debtors to shift the burden to prove gift tax deficiencies to the IRS—i.e., 26 U.S.C. § 7491. An analysis under § 7491 focuses on the taxpayer's actions and asks if the taxpayer has submitted credible evidence and demonstrated "good behavior" by comporting with certain statutory requirements. Specifically, 26 U.S.C. § 7491 provides as follows:

> (a) Burden shifts where taxpayer produces credible evidence.—
> (1) General rule.—If, in any court proceeding, a taxpayer introduces credible evidence with respect to > any factual issue relevant to ascertaining the liability of the taxpayer for any tax imposed by subtitle A or B, the Secretary shall have the burden of proof with respect to such issue.

> (2) Limitations.—Paragraph (1) shall apply with respect to an issue only if—
>
>> (A) the taxpayer has complied with the requirements under this title to substantiate any item;
>> (B) the taxpayer has maintained all records required under this title and has cooperated with reasonable requests by the Secretary for witnesses, information, documents, meetings, and interviews; and
>
> * * *
> (3) Coordination.—Paragraph (1) shall not apply to any issue if any other provision of this title provides for a specific burden of proof with respect to such issue.
>
> (c) Penalties.—Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, the Secretary shall have the burden of production in any court proceeding with respect to the liability of any individual for any penalty, addition to tax, or additional amount imposed by this title.
>
> As explained by the district court in Southgate Master Fund, LLC,[211]
> The legislative history of Section 7491 defines "credible evidence" as "the quality of evidence which, after critical analysis, the court would find sufficient upon which to base a decision on the issue if no contrary evidence were submitted 384 (without regard to the judicial presumption of IRS correctness)." S.Rep. No. 105–174, 1998 WL 197371, at *45. Additionally, "[a] taxpayer has not produced credible evidence for these purposes if the taxpayer merely makes implausible factual assertions, frivolous claims, or tax protestor-type arguments. The introduction of evidence will not meet this standard if the court is not convinced that it is worthy of belief." Id. at *45–46.

This is not a case where either side has raised implausible factual assertions, frivolous claims, or tax protestor-type arguments. Rather, the Court finds, based on the evidence discussed more thoroughly in other sections of this opinion,[212] that the Debtors have introduced credible evidence questioning whether gifts were made and thus their liability for gift taxes. Thus, the Court must next consider whether the Debtors' behavior here satisfied the other statutory requirements.

As this is not a case involving deductions, losses, or credits, the substantiation requirement of § 7491(a)(2)(A) seems to meld into the record keeping requirement of § 7491(a)(2)(B). The legislative history of § 7491 confirms this:[213]

> Nothing in the provision shall be construed to override any requirement under the Code or regulations to substantiate any item. Accordingly, taxpayers must meet applicable substantiation requirements, whether generally imposed or imposed with respect to specific items, such as charitable contributions or meals, entertainment, travel, and certain other expenses. Substantiation requirements include any requirement of the Code or regulations that the taxpayer establish an item to the satisfaction of the Secretary. Taxpayers who fail to substantiate any item in accordance with the legal requirement of substantiation will not have satisfied the legal conditions that are prerequisite to claiming the item on the taxpayer's tax return and will accordingly be unable to avail themselves of this provision regarding the burden of proof. Thus, if a taxpayer required to substantiate an item fails to do so in the manner required (or destroys the substantiation), this burden of proof provision is inapplicable.

The legislative history of § 7491 in turn cites to 26 U.S.C. §§ 6001, 6038, and 6038A as examples of "generally imposed" substantiation requirements. Section 6001 states, in part, that "[e]very person liable for any tax imposed by this title, or for the collection thereof, shall keep such records, render such statements, make such returns, and comply with such rules and regulations as the Secretary may from time to time prescribe." Likewise, §§ 6038 and 6038A require taxpayers to file information regarding certain foreign-owned corporations and partnerships. Thus, the very examples that Congress gives of "substantiation" requirements are in actuality requirements to keep records. With this in mind, these substantiation requirements will be analyzed under the framework of § 7491(a)(2)(B)'s record keeping requirement.[214]

[23] Under § 7491(a)(2)(B), the taxpayer must maintain all required records to qualify for a shift in the burden of proof to the IRS. The Motions and Claim Objections 385 involve a multitude of documents, and the IRS' case-in-chief was proven largely by documentary evidence. Although there is evidence in the record that French asked that certain documents received by IOM trustees be destroyed, these documents were not destroyed and indeed were submitted as evidence at trial.[215] These are not cases where there was evidence of relevant records not being kept. Indeed, the evidence shows that the Wylys and their family offices kept voluminous records and retained them for long periods of time as opposed to improperly destroying them.[216] As the Court notes later in its opinion, there is no evidence that the Wylys kept inadequate books or records or kept a double set of books.[217] Thus, the Court finds that the Debtors maintained all records required under the Internal Revenue Code.

Under § 7491(a)(2)(B) taxpayers must also cooperate with reasonable requests by the Secretary for witnesses, information, documents, meetings, and interviews in order to qualify for a shift in the burden of proof. The legislative history of § 7491 explains the cooperation requirement in this way:[218] > the taxpayer must cooperate with reasonable requests by the Secretary for meetings, interviews, witnesses, information, and documents (including providing, within a reasonable period of time, access to and inspection of witnesses, information, and documents within the control of the taxpayer, as reasonably requested by the Secretary). Cooperation also includes providing reasonable assistance to the Secretary in obtaining access to and inspection of witnesses, information, or documents not within the control of the taxpayer (including any witnesses, information, or documents located in foreign countries).

Although it is true that the Wylys exercised their rights during the audit process, they did not refuse to meet with IRS agents and worked diligently to respond to information document requests ("IDRs") submitted to them by the IRS.[219] In addition, the Wylys provided access to searchable databases containing literally millions of documents in response to approximately two hundred IDRs issued over the course of the IRS' examination.[220] These were certainly not cases where efforts at compliance were at best half-hearted and belated. Thus, the Court finds that the Debtors cooperated with reasonable requests by the Secretary for witnesses, information, documents, meetings, and interviews.

For these reasons, the Court is satisfied that the Debtors have met their burden under 26 U.S.C. § 7491. Thus, at the end of a long journey through multiple burden of proof analyses, the burden lies with the IRS to prove the Debtors' liability for gift 386 taxes by a preponderance of the evidence.[221]

b) Fraud Penalties for Income Tax and Gift Tax Underpayments

The burden of proof analysis regarding fraud is much more straightforward than the gift tax analyses. The statutes and procedural rules governing practice before the tax court make it clear that the IRS bears the burden of proving fraud by clear and convincing evidence.[222] The Fifth Circuit has also held that it is the IRS who bears the burden of proof on the issue of whether a taxpayer has committed civil tax fraud, and that the IRS must establish this civil fraud by clear and convincing evidence.[223]

That the IRS bears the burden of establishing a taxpayer's fraud by clear and convincing evidence seems to be universally understood, and statements to this effect are found in both tax court cases and Circuit level cases outside of the Fifth Circuit.[224] Just as it must prove fraudulent underpayment under § 6663 by clear and convincing evidence, so too must the IRS prove fraudulent failure to file gift tax returns under § 6651 by clear and convincing evidence.[225]

[24] Moreover, courts agree that the IRS must carry its burden of establishing fraud by clear and convincing evidence separately for each tax year at issue.[226] In addition, at least one tax court judge has 387 ruled that fraudulent intent must be proven at the time of filing the return for each year in question.[227]

26 U.S.C. § 6663—the statute mandating penalties for fraudulent underpayment of taxes—itself also contains instructions to follow regarding burdens of proof, and states in subsection (b) that "[i]f the Secretary establishes that any portion of an underpayment is attributable to fraud, the entire underpayment shall be treated as attributable to fraud, except with respect to any portion of the underpayment which the taxpayer establishes (by a preponderance of the evidence) is not attributable to fraud."[228] In turn, § 6663(c) states that "[i]n the case of a joint return, this section shall not apply with respect to a spouse unless some part of the underpayment is due to the fraud of such spouse."[229]

As relevant here then, the burden of proof regarding its claims for fraud penalties pursuant to 26 U.S.C. §§ 6663 and 6651 is on the IRS, who must carry that burden by clear and convincing evidence. Of course, and as the parties agree, if the IRS carries its burden of proof, the statute of limitations under 26 U.S.C. § 6501(c)(1) remains open for each year in which the IRS proves the return was fraudulent.[230]

c) International Failure to File Penalties

Again, the burden of proof analysis regarding international failure to file penalties is straightforward. 26 U.S.C. § 7491(c) provides that:

> Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, the Secretary shall have the burden of production in any court proceeding with respect to the liability of any individual for any penalty, addition to tax, or additional amount imposed by this title.

388 Thus, the IRS has the burden of production and must come forward with "sufficient evidence" that it is appropriate to impose international failure to file penalties on the Debtors.[231]

3. The Debtors' Defenses

The Debtors assert various defenses to their liability to the IRS. Each is discussed below.

a) Reasonable Cause Defenses

The Debtors assert multiple reasonable cause defenses under multiple sections of the Internal Revenue Code. These reasonable cause defenses, if proven by the Debtors, will allow them to avoid liability for various penalties asserted by the IRS in the Proofs of Claim. First, the Debtors assert a reasonable cause defense to the IRS' assertion of fraud penalties under 26 U.S.C. § 6664(c).[232] Second, they assert a reasonable cause defense to the IRS' assertions of international failure to file penalties under 26 U.S.C. § 6677(d).[233] Third, they assert a different reasonable cause defense to a different set of international failure to file penalties under § 6038(c)(4)(B).[234]

[25] All of these reasonable cause defenses would negate a taxpayer's liability upon similar showings of a combination of "reasonable cause," "good faith," and a "lack of willful neglect." Absent contrary guidance from Congress (and there is no such contrary guidance here), it makes sense to assume that these phrases have the same meaning throughout the Internal Revenue Code.[235] According to Fifth Circuit precedent, "the [taxpayer] bears the burden of proof on a reasonable cause defense."[236] And, the evidentiary standard is by a preponderance of the evidence.[237]

*389 b) Dee's Innocent Spouse Defense

Dee's "innocent spouse defense" is codified at 26 U.S.C. § 6015. It provides an exception to the general rule of federal income taxation that a husband and wife filing a joint return are jointly and severally liable for the taxes due on that return.[238] According to the Fifth Circuit and the plain language of the statute, "[s]ection 6015 provides three distinct types of relief for taxpayers who file joint returns."[239] Under § 6015(b), all joint filers have the opportunity to qualify for relief if they meet the five requirements established under § 6015(b)(1)(A)–(E).[240] Under § 6015(c), taxpayers who are no longer married may limit their income tax liability to their separate liability amount.[241] Finally, § 6015(f) provides a kind of wildcard provision for spouses who do not qualify for relief under §§ 6015(b) or (c).

Dee claims that she is eligible for innocent spouse relief under §§ 6015(b) and (c), but not § 6015(f). As relevant here, Dee bears the burden of proof on the innocent spouse defense:

> Except for the knowledge requirement of § 6015(c)(3)(C) (the provision disallowing election of separate liability to a spouse with actual knowledge of the item giving rise to the deficiency), the taxpayer bears the burden of proving that she has met all the prerequisites for innocent spouse relief. See Reser v. Comm'r, 112 F.3d 1258, 1262–63 (5th Cir.1997). Section 6015(c)(3)(C) explicitly places the burden of proof on the Secretary.[242]

Dee must satisfy her burden here by a preponderance of the evidence.[243] For § 6015(c)(3)(C), the IRS must meet its burden by a preponderance of the evidence.[244]

Armed with this understanding of the applicable burdens of proof, we turn to the substantive issues we must address.

B. Was the Debtors' Underpayment of Income Taxes Due to Fraudulent Intent?

[26] [27] As noted previously, to prevail here on its claim for fraud penalties under 26 U.S.C. § 6663, the IRS must prove, by clear and convincing evidence for each tax year in question, that: (i) the Debtors underpaid their respective income tax that year,[245] and (ii) the underpayment for that 390 year was due to fraud. Fraud for this purpose is defined as intentional wrongdoing, with the specific purpose of avoiding a tax known or believed to be owed.[246] As was obvious from the outset of the Cases, which were filed in large part to bring these tax issues to conclusion, the parties have a vastly different perspective on what transpired here.

From Sam's perspective, he is the embodiment of the American dream—small town boy of modest background makes good through, among other things, a close family, hard work, intelligence, business savvy, some good ideas, and a willingness to take entrepreneurial risks, which combine to transform him into one of the wealthiest individuals in the world. This spin on the tale at trial started with a lengthy tracing of Sam's and Charles' childhood in small towns in northeastern Louisiana, through their teenage years as Boy Scouts (including a recitation of the Boy Scout oath) and student athletes (according to Sam, he was the better student and Charles was the better athlete), to college at Louisiana Tech where Charles met and ultimately married Dee, his wife of 56 years before his death in 2011, to Sam's graduate school at the University of Michigan on scholarship, to Sam's first job at IBM where he met his friend Ross Perot, who was just starting out in the business world like he was, to the start of Charles and his first business venture, and so on. The upshot of Sam's story is that he is a loyal American, who loves his family[247] and country, and who has never complained about his obligation as an American citizen to pay taxes, which he has done each and every year of his life as advised by his professionals[248] and as required by applicable law.

Conversely, while the IRS does not dispute the impressive rags to riches story of Sam and Charles, or the impressive nature of their overall business successes, it spins its own tale of two brothers, who are extraordinarily wealthy by the early 1990s and who decide to evade taxes in order to 391 preserve as much wealth as possible for themselves and their families by taking much of their wealth offshore in known tax havens, where they continued (and Sam continues to this day) to exercise control over the offshore assets through trustees who follow their every "wish." [249] The upshot of the IRS' story is that Sam and Charles, along with their army of lawyers and other professionals, set up one of the most complicated offshore structures ever seen, and then manipulated that structure in such a way as to evade their legitimate tax obligations. And then, when the highly secretive offshore system was about to be fully exposed, Sam asked certain of his most trusted advisors if he could avoid his looming potential tax problems by renouncing his American citizenship. [250]

This Court's job is to take the parties' respective stories, of which there is certainly evidence of support in the record, and decide which version of the facts or, in all likelihood, combination of versions of the facts, is most credible and reflects what happened here (by clear and convincing evidence if the IRS is to prevail on their fraud penalty claims). To say this has been a difficult process of weighing the conflicting evidence and arguments is a great understatement. The Court's analysis of the fraud penalties issue—as it relates to the Debtors' income tax underpayments—follows.

[28] [29] As virtually every case addressing fraud penalties pursuant to 26 U.S.C. § 6663 acknowledges, a taxpayer rarely confesses his or her fraud in what the parties here have called a Perry Mason moment. [251] And, not surprisingly given the parties' respective stories, there was no Perry Mason moment here. [252] However, when direct proof of fraudulent intent is not available, fraud may be established by circumstantial evidence and reasonable inferences drawn from the record. [253] Courts have developed a nonexclusive list of badges of fraud useful in determining whether there is circumstantial evidence of fraudulent intent. Among the badges of fraud that can be gathered from the case law are the following: (i) understatement of income, (ii) inadequate maintenance of records, (iii) failure to file tax returns or make estimated tax payments, (iv) offering implausible or inconsistent explanations of behavior, (v) concealment of income or assets, (vi) failure to cooperate with tax authorities, (vii) engaging in illegal activities, (viii) dealing in cash, (ix) offering false or incredible testimony, and (x) filing false 392 documents. [254] The taxpayer's background, level of education, and relative business sophistication is also a relevant consideration, as it informs the court about the taxpayers ability to understand the transactions at issue. [255] Although no single factor may necessarily be sufficient to establish fraud, the existence of several indicia may be persuasive circumstantial evidence of fraud. [256]

1. Relevant Statutes and Badges of Fraud

With this general statement of the law in mind, the Court begins by analyzing the relevant statutes and the badges of fraud it believes applicable here. 26 U.S.C. § 6663 provides:

> (a) Imposition of penalty.—If any part of any underpayment of tax required to be shown on a return is due to fraud, there shall be added to the tax an amount equal to 75 percent of the portion of the underpayment which is attributable to fraud.
> (b) Determination of portion attributable to fraud.—If the Secretary establishes that any portion of an underpayment is attributable to fraud, the entire underpayment shall be treated as attributable to fraud, except with respect to any portion of the underpayment which the taxpayer establishes (by a preponderance of the evidence) is not attributable to fraud.
> (c) Special rule for joint returns.—In the case of a joint return, this section shall not apply with respect to a spouse unless some part of the underpayment is due to the fraud of such spouse.

In turn, 26 U.S.C. § 6664 provides, in relevant part, that:

> (b) Penalties applicable only where return filed.—The penalties provided in this part shall apply only in cases where a return of tax is filed (other than a return prepared by the Secretary under the authority of section 6020(b)).
> (c) Reasonable cause exception for underpayments.—
>
> 393 (1) In general.—No penalty shall be imposed under section 6662 or 6663 with respect to any portion of an underpayment if it is shown that there was a reasonable cause for such portion and that the taxpayer acted in good faith with respect to such portion.
> (2) Exception.—Paragraph (1) shall not apply to any portion of an underpayment which is attributable to > one or more transactions described in section 6662(b)(6).[257]

And, while the Debtors assert a reasonable cause and good faith defense to the imposition of fraud penalties for their income tax underpayments (and which will be discussed infra at pp. 475–513), their initial argument is a bit more nuanced. In short, the Debtors argue that we do not need to get to their reasonable cause and good faith defense as to their income tax underpayments, as the IRS has failed to prove fraudulent intent by clear and convincing evidence, as it is required by law to do. And, the nuance comes by virtue of the Debtors' argument that their reliance on the advice of their various professionals in preparing and filing their tax returns in each of the relevant years negates any possible fraudulent intent. In other words, according to the Debtors, we received all this advice from all these professionals who said what we are doing was appropriate, so how could we have possibly avoided payment of a tax we believed we owed?[258] So, before analyzing the Debtor's reasonable cause defense, the Court determines whether the IRS carried its burden of proof to establish fraudulent intent by clear and convincing evidence for each of the relevant years for each taxpayer, starting with Sam.[259]

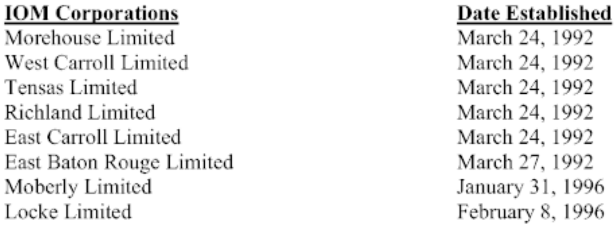
[30] It bears repeating that the lists of badges of fraud relied upon by courts is described as a non-exclusive list, clearly indicating that the courts have flexibility to analyze the particular facts and circumstances of their cases and to supplement the "typical" or "usual" badges of fraud with ones that may be unique to the facts of any specific case.[260] As is presumably apparent from the parties' 122 pages of stipulated facts and the additional facts that are set forth herein for context, the 394 facts and procedural history of the Cases are truly unique. In short, the complexity of the offshore system of trusts and corporations implemented by Sam and Charles (and unknowingly acquiesced in by Dee) is nothing short of mind-numbing (as any reader of this Memorandum Opinion will soon see), with identically named domestic and foreign corporations, and layers upon layers of foreign entities, the business purpose of many of which remains unclear in the record following the conclusion of three weeks of evidence. So, from this Court's perspective, while certain of the "usual" or "typical" badges of fraud are applicable here, they do not fully address what this Court must grapple with. Thus, the Court will analyze those of the "usual" badges of fraud that could support a finding of fraudulent intent here, along with other badges of fraud that are more tailored to our unique facts and circumstances.

[31] The more "usual" badges of fraud that the Court will analyze include:[261] (i) understatement of income, (ii) concealment of income or assets, (iii) offering implausible or inconsistent explanations of behavior, (iv) offering false or incredible testimony, (v) filing false documents, and (vi) failure to cooperate with tax authorities. In addition, the Court will consider: (i) the complexity of the offshore system and whether there was any legitimate business purpose to that complexity, (ii) the Wylys' willingness to commit securities fraud to preserve their secret offshore system and to maintain its tax advantages, (iii) the Wylys' failure to take action to resolve the conflicting advice they received regarding the 1992 IOM trusts, (iv) the creation of false documents to support the settling of the IOM trusts in 1994 and 1995 to attempt to obtain favorable tax benefits for the Wylys, (v) the treatment of the offshore system as the Wyly family piggy bank, directing purchases of art, jewelry, home furnishings, and real estate for the benefit of individual Wyly family members, while legal title to those assets remains offshore purportedly out of the reach of creditors, including the IRS, and (vi) the planned insolvency of various of the IOM corporations that were supposed to be what made the purpose of the offshore system one of legitimate tax avoidance (not tax evasion). Our analysis starts with the specifically tailored badges of fraud.

a) The Complexity of the Offshore System

The offshore system of trusts and corporations set up by Sam and Charles starting in 1992 is enormously complex. In summary, Sam and/or Charles established 16 offshore trusts and 38 offshore corporations, each of which was owned by one of the 16 offshore trusts. The offshore trusts were all settled in the IOM, which is an 395 autonomous and self-governing island nation in the middle of the Irish Sea between Great Britain and Ireland. While the IOM is a dependency of Great Britain, it is not part of the United Kingdom.[262] The foreign corporations were established in either the IOM (32 of the corporations) or the Cayman Islands (6 of the corporations). In addition to these 54 offshore trusts and corporations, there were 10 domestic corporations established in Nevada, each of which (i) shared an identical name with an IOM corporation, and (ii) was involved in a complicated annuity transaction that will be discussed further below. Finally, Sam and Charles caused a number of other domestic entities to be created that then facilitated complicated real estate transactions that will be discussed in detail in connection with the Court's gift tax analysis. [263]

With this general background of the offshore system in mind, we turn to the specifics of each brother's offshore system. On March 11, 1992, Sam settled the Bulldog Non–Grantor Trust ("Bulldog IOM Trust") in the IOM. [264] The Bulldog IOM Trust was intended to be a non-grantor trust to him under 26 U.S.C. §§ 671–679. [265] Sam contributed corpus of $100.00. [266] The beneficiaries of the Bulldog IOM Trust included (i) the British Red Cross and the Community Chest of Hong Kong and their respective successors, and (ii) Sam's children and issue, specifically including, but not limited to, Evan A. Wyly ("Evan"), Laurie W. Matthews ("Laurie"), Lisa L. Wyly ("Lisa"), Kelly Wyly ("Kelly"), Andrew Wyly ("Andrew"), and Christiana P. Wyly ("Christiana"), but contingently, that is, only after the expiration of the second anniversary following Sam's death. [267] The following IOM Corporations are wholly owned by Bulldog IOM Trust: [268]

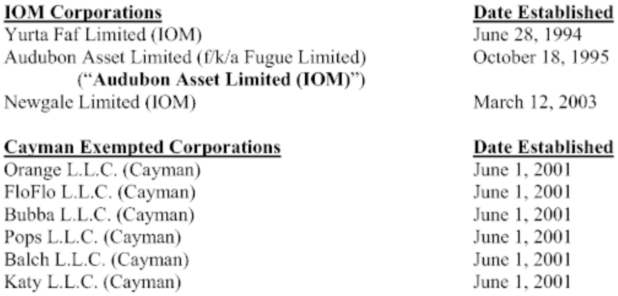


IOM Corporations	Date Established
Morehouse Limited	March 24, 1992
West Carroll Limited	March 24, 1992
Tensas Limited	March 24, 1992
Richland Limited	March 24, 1992
East Carroll Limited	March 24, 1992
East Baton Rouge Limited	March 27, 1992
Moberly Limited	January 31, 1996
Locke Limited	February 8, 1996

On December 4, 1992, Sam settled the Lake Providence International Trust ("Lake Providence IOM Trust") in the IOM. [269] The Lake Providence IOM Trust was intended to be a non-grantor trust to 396 him under 26 U.S.C. §§ 671–679. [270] Sam contributed corpus of $100.00. [271] The beneficiaries of the Lake Providence IOM Trust included (i) the British Red Cross and the Community Chest of Hong Kong and their respective successors, and (ii) Sam's children and issue, specifically including, but not limited to, Evan, Laurie, Lisa, Kelly, Andrew, and Christiana, but contingently, that is, only after the expiration of the second anniversary following Sam's death. [272] Sarnia Investments Limited, an IOM corporation ("Sarnia Investments Limited (IOM)"), established on January 8, 1991, was ultimately wholly owned by Lake Providence IOM Trust. [273]

On December 14, 1992, Sam settled the Delhi International Trust ("Delhi IOM Trust") in the IOM. [274] The Delhi IOM Trust was intended to be a non-grantor trust to him under 26 U.S.C. §§ 671–679. [275] Sam contributed corpus of $100.00. [276] The beneficiaries of the Delhi IOM Trust included (i) the British Red Cross and the Community Chest of Hong Kong and their respective successors, and (ii) Sam's children and issue, specifically including, but not limited to, Evan, Laurie, Lisa, Kelly, Andrew, and Christiana, but contingently, that is, only after the expiration of the second anniversary following Sam's death. [277] Greenbriar Limited, an IOM corporation ("Greenbriar Limited (IOM)"), established on November 10, 1992, was wholly owned by Delhi IOM Trust. [278]

On February 2, 1994, Keith King ("King"), a resident of the IOM, settled the Bessie Trust ("Bessie IOM Trust") in the IOM. [279] The Bessie IOM Trust was intended to be a grantor trust to King under 26 U.S.C. §§ 671–679. [280] The beneficiaries of the Bessie IOM Trust at various points in time were (i) King, Sam, Sam's wife, Sam's issue, (ii) The University of Michigan, any Church of Christ Scientist, the Community Foundations of Texas, (iii) Camp Leelanau and Camp Kohahna, (iv) The Episcopal School of Dallas, (v) the wife or widow of Evan and all the children and more remote issue of Evan, and (vi) such persons or classes of persons appointed as beneficiaries by the Trustees with the prior written consent of the Trust Protectors. [281] The following IOM Corporations 397 and Cayman Island Exempted Corporations were wholly owned by Bessie IOM Trust, along with other IOM corporations not listed but separately discussed below: [282]



IOM Corporations	Date Established
Yurta Faf Limited (IOM)	June 28, 1994
Audubon Asset Limited (f/k/a Fugue Limited) ("Audubon Asset Limited (IOM)")	October 18, 1995
Newgale Limited (IOM)	March 12, 2003

Cayman Exempted Corporations	Date Established
Orange L.L.C. (Cayman)	June 1, 2001
FloFlo L.L.C. (Cayman)	June 1, 2001
Bubba L.L.C. (Cayman)	June 1, 2001
Pops L.L.C. (Cayman)	June 1, 2001
Balch L.L.C. (Cayman)	June 1, 2001
Katy L.L.C. (Cayman)	June 1, 2001

The Cayman Exempted Corporations listed above were liquidated in 2006 and ownership of their assets reverted 100% to the Bessie IOM Trust (to the extent there remained any assets after the payment of liabilities).[283] The IOM Corporations listed above remain in existence today, as do those discussed immediately below.

Mi Casa Limited, an IOM corporation ("Mi Casa Limited (IOM)"), established on March 28, 2001, was initially wholly owned by the Bessie IOM Trust. Mi Casa Limited (IOM) was later owned by FloFlo L.L.C. (Cayman) and the Bessie IOM Trust.[284] After the liquidation of FloFlo L.L.C. (Cayman), Mi Casa Limited (IOM) is once again wholly owned by the Bessie IOM Trust.[285]

Cottonwood I Limited, an IOM corporation ("Cottonwood I Limited (IOM)"), established on July 14, 2000, was initially wholly owned by the Bessie IOM Trust. As of June 1, 2002, Cottonwood I Limited (IOM) was owned by Bubba L.L.C. (Cayman) and Bessie IOM Trust.[286] After the liquidation of Bubba L.L.C. (Cayman), Cottonwood I Limited (IOM) was once again wholly owned by the Bessie IOM Trust.[287]

Cottonwood II Limited, an IOM corporation ("Cottonwood II Limited (IOM)"), 398 established on July 14, 2000, was initially wholly owned by the Bessie IOM Trust. As of June 1, 2001, Cottonwood II Limited (IOM) was owned by Orange L.L.C. (Cayman), Pops L.L.C. (Cayman), FloFlo L.L.C. (Cayman), Bubba L.L.C. (Cayman), Katy L.L.C. (Cayman), Balch L.L.C. (Cayman), and the Bessie IOM Trust.[288] After the liquidation of Orange L.L.C. (Cayman), Pops L.L.C. (Cayman), FloFlo L.L.C. (Cayman), Bubba L.L.C. (Cayman), Katy L.L.C. (Cayman), and Balch L.L.C. (Cayman), Cottonwood II Limited (IOM) is once again wholly owned by the Bessie IOM Trust.[289]

Spitting Lion Limited, an IOM corporation ("Spitting Lion Limited (IOM)"), established on February 3, 2000, was initially wholly owned by the Bessie IOM Trust.[290] As of June 1, 2001, Spitting Lion Limited (IOM) was owned by Orange L.L.C. (Cayman), Pops L.L.C. (Cayman), FloFlo L.L.C. (Cayman), and Bubba L.L.C (Cayman).[291] After the liquidation of Orange L.L.C. (Cayman), Pops L.L.C. (Cayman), FloFlo L.L.C. (Cayman), and Bubba L.L.C (Cayman), Spitting Lion Limited (IOM) is once again wholly owned by the Bessie IOM Trust.[292]

Woody Creek Ranch Limited, an IOM corporation formed on September 30, 1999 (whose name was changed to Two Mile Ranch Limited on April 14, 2000, and ultimately to Rosemary's Circle R Ranch Limited on August 26, 2003) ("Rosemary's Circle R Ranch Limited (IOM)"), was initially wholly owned by Devotion Limited (IOM), another Sam IOM corporation discussed further below.[293] As of April 11, 2000, Rosemary's Circle R Ranch Limited (IOM) was owned by the Bessie IOM Trust and Orange L.L.C (Cayman).[294] As of June 1, 2001, Rosemary's Circle R Ranch Limited (IOM) was owned by Orange L.L.C. (Cayman), Pops L.L.C. (Cayman), FloFlo L.L.C. (Cayman), Bubba L.L.C. (Cayman), Balch L.L.C. (Cayman), Katy L.L.C. (Cayman), and the Bessie IOM Trust.[295] After the liquidation of Orange L.L.C. (Cayman), Pops L.L.C. (Cayman), FloFlo L.L.C. (Cayman), Bubba L.L.C. (Cayman), Balch L.L.C. (Cayman), and Katy L.L.C. (Cayman), Rosemary's Circle R Ranch Limited (IOM) is once again wholly owned by Bessie IOM Trust.[296]

On July 18, 1995, the La Fourche Trust ("La Fourche IOM Trust") was settled in the IOM by Shaun Cairns ("Cairns"), an IOM resident.[297] The La Fourche IOM Trust was intended to be a grantor trust to Cairns under 26 U.S.C. §§ 671–679.[298] The beneficiaries of the La Fourche IOM Trust at various points in 399 time were (i) Sam, Sam's wife, Sam's issue, (ii) The University of Michigan, the First Church of Christ Scientist, the Leaves, Inc., the Community Foundations of Texas, (iii) Denison University and A Grass Roots Aspen Experience, (iv) the Humboldt Legal Foundation, (v) Cairns, and (vi) such persons or classes of persons appointed as beneficiaries by the Trustees with the prior written consent of the Trust Protectors.[299] Devotion Limited, an IOM corporation ("Devotion Limited (IOM)"), established on July 18, 1995, was wholly owned by La Fourche IOM Trust.[300] Relish Limited, an IOM corporation ("Relish Limited (IOM)"), was also wholly owned by the La Fourche IOM Trust.[301]

On March 11, 1992, Sam settled the Tallulah International Trust ("Tallulah IOM Trust") in the IOM with $100.00.[302] Tallulah IOM Trust was a grantor trust to Sam under 26 U.S.C. §§ 671–679.[303] Tallulah IOM Trust terminated and was dissolved on December 31, 1996.[304] The beneficiaries of the Tallulah IOM Trust were (i) Sam, Sam's spouse, and Sam's issue, and (ii) such persons or classes of persons appointed as beneficiaries by the Trustees with the prior written consent of the Trust Protectors.[305]

On December 21, 1995, Sam settled The Crazy Horse Trust (“Crazy Horse IOM Trust”) in the IOM with $100.00.[306] Crazy Horse IOM Trust was a grantor trust to Sam under 26 U.S.C. §§ 671–679.[307] Crazy Horse IOM Trust terminated and was dissolved on December 31, 1996.[308] The beneficiaries of the Crazy Horse IOM Trust were (i) Sam, Sam's spouse, and Sam's issue, and (ii) such persons or classes of persons appointed as beneficiaries by the Trustees with the prior written consent of the Trust Protectors.[309]

On December 28, 1995, Sam settled The Arlington Trust (“Arlington IOM Trust”) in the IOM with $100.00.[310] Arlington IOM Trust was a grantor trust to Sam under 26 U.S.C. §§ 671–679.[311] Arlington IOM Trust terminated and was dissolved on December 31, 1996.[312] The beneficiaries of the Arlington IOM Trust were (i) Sam, Sam's spouse, and Sam's issue, and (ii) such persons or classes of persons appointed as beneficiaries by the Trustees with the prior written consent of the Trust Protectors.[313]

On January 23, 1996, Sam settled The Sitting Bull Trust (“Sitting Bull IOM Trust”) in the IOM with $100.00.[314] Sitting Bull IOM Trust was a grantor trust to *400 Sam under 26 U.S.C. §§ 671–679. Sitting Bull IOM Trust terminated and was dissolved on December 31, 1996.[315] The beneficiaries of the Sitting Bull IOM Trust were (i) Sam, Sam's spouse, and Sam's issue, and (ii) such persons or classes of persons appointed as beneficiaries by the Trustees with the prior written consent of the Trust Protectors.[316]

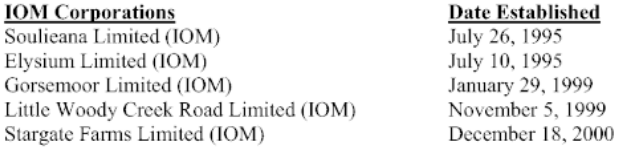
A chart depicting Sam's overall offshore system is attached as Exhibit B.

While using fewer entities, a similarly complex offshore system was established simultaneously by Charles. Specifically, on March 23, 1992, Charles settled the Pitkin Non-Grantor Trust (“Pitkin IOM Trust”) in the IOM.[317] The Pitkin IOM Trust was intended to be a non-grantor trust to him under 26 U.S.C. §§ 671–679.[318] Charles contributed corpus of $100.00.[319] The beneficiaries of the Pitkin IOM Trust included (i) the British Red Cross and the Community Chest of Hong Kong and their respective successors, and (ii) Charles' children and issue, specifically including, but not limited to, Martha Wyly Miller (“Martha”), Charles J. Wyly, III (“Chip”), Emily Wyly (“Emily”), and Jennifer Wyly Lincoln (“Jennifer”), but contingently, that is, only after the expiration of the second anniversary following Charles' death.[320] The following IOM Corporations are wholly owned by the Pitkin IOM Trust:[321]

IOM Corporations	Date Established
Rugosa Limited	October 31, 1989
Little Woody Limited	March 27, 1992
Roaring Fork Limited	April 3, 1992
Roaring Creek Limited	April 3, 1992

On December 4, 1992, Charles settled the Castle Creek International Trust (“Castle Creek IOM Trust”) in the IOM.[322] Castle Creek IOM Trust was intended to be a non-grantor trust to him under 26 U.S.C. §§ 671–679.[323] Charles contributed corpus of $100.00.[324] The beneficiaries of the Castle Creek IOM Trust included (i) the British Red Cross and the Community Chest of Hong Kong and their respective successors, and (ii) Charles' children and issue, specifically including, but not limited to, Martha, Chip, Emily and Jennifer, but contingently, that is, only after the expiration of the second anniversary following *401 Charles' death.[325] Quayle Limited, an IOM corporation (“Quayle Limited (IOM)”), established on January 15, 1992, is wholly owned by the Castle Creek IOM Trust.[326]

On February 2, 1994, King settled The Tyler Trust (“Tyler IOM Trust”) in the IOM.[327] Tyler IOM Trust was intended to be a grantor trust to King under 26 U.S.C. §§ 671–679.[328] The beneficiaries of Tyler IOM Trust at various points in time were (i) King, Charles, Dee, Charles' issue, (ii) the First Church of Christ Scientist or any United States Church associated with the Christian Science faith, (iii) Lady Thatcher's Archive at the Cambridge Foundation, (iv) Donald R. Miller, Jr., all the children and remote issue of Donald R. Miller, Jr., Deborah Paige Miller, and (vi) such persons or classes of persons appointed as beneficiaries by the Trustees with the prior written consent of the Trust Protectors.[329] The following IOM Corporations are wholly owned by Tyler IOM Trust:[330]



IOM Corporations	Date Established
Soulieana Limited (IOM)	July 26, 1995
Elysium Limited (IOM)	July 10, 1995
Gorsemoor Limited (IOM)	January 29, 1999
Little Woody Creek Road Limited (IOM)	November 5, 1999
Stargate Farms Limited (IOM)	December 18, 2000

[Editor's Note: The preceding image contains the reference for footnote[331]].

On July 8, 1995, Cairns settled The Red Mountain Trust ("Red Mountain IOM Trust") in the IOM.[332] Red Mountain IOM Trust was intended to be a grantor trust to Cairns under 26 U.S.C. §§ 671–679.[333] The beneficiaries of Red Mountain IOM Trust are (i) Charles, Dee, Charles' issue, (ii) the First Church of Christ Scientist or any United States Church associated with the Christian Science faith, (iii) Cairns, and (iv) such persons or classes of persons appointed as beneficiaries by the 402 Trustees with the prior written consent of the Trust Protectors.[334] Elegance Limited, an IOM corporation ("Elegance Limited (IOM)") established on July 10, 1995, is wholly owned by Red Mountain IOM Trust.[335]

On March 23, 1992, Charles settled the Woody International Trust ("Woody Int'l IOM Trust") with $100.00 in the IOM.[336] Woody Int'l IOM Trust was a grantor trust to Charles under 26 U.S.C. §§ 671–679. Woody Int'l IOM Trust terminated and dissolved on December 31, 1996.[337] The beneficiaries of Woody Int'l IOM Trust were (i) Charles, Dee, Charles' issue, and (ii) such persons or classes of persons appointed as beneficiaries by the Trustees with the prior written consent of the Trust Protectors.[338]

On December 28, 1995, Charles settled the Maroon Creek Trust ("Maroon Creek IOM Trust") with $100.00 in the IOM. Maroon Creek IOM Trust was a grantor trust to Charles under 26 U.S.C. §§ 671–679.[339] Maroon Creek IOM Trust terminated and dissolved on December 31, 1996.[340] The beneficiaries of Maroon Creek IOM Trust are (i) Charles, Dee, and Charles' issue, and (ii) such persons or classes of persons appointed as beneficiaries by the Trustees with the prior written consent of the Trust Protectors.[341]

On January 23, 1996, Charles settled The Lincoln Creek Trust ("Lincoln Creek IOM Trust") with $100.00 in the IOM. Lincoln Creek IOM Trust was a grantor trust to Charles under 26 U.S.C. §§ 671–679. Lincoln Creek IOM Trust terminated and dissolved on December 31, 1996.[342] The beneficiaries of Lincoln Creek IOM Trust were (i) Charles, Dee, Charles' issue, and (ii) such persons or classes of persons appointed as beneficiaries by the Trustees with the prior written consent of the Trust Protectors.[343]

A chart depicting Charles' overall offshore structure is attached as Exhibit C.

Once the offshore system was established (or at least part of it was established), Sam and Charles undertook a series of complex annuity transactions in order to get substantial amounts of their wealth offshore in the IOM. Specifically, in 1992 and 1996, Sam and Charles entered into multiple transactions whereby they transferred securities that they had earned from Sterling Software, Sterling Commerce, and Michaels Stores in exchange for private annuities. These transactions are described in detail in Joint Stipulations ¶¶ 119–160, but two of Sam's transactions will be summarized here for context.

For example, in 1992, Sam transferred 375,000 options to purchase stock in Michaels Stores to East Baton Rouge Ltd. (Nevada), a newly formed entity that had no assets, in exchange for an unsecured private annuity.[344] Immediately thereafter, 403 East Baton Rouge Ltd. (Nevada) transferred the options and the obligation to pay the private annuity to East Baton Rouge Limited (IOM), an IOM entity that had no assets or liabilities prior to the transfer of the options and the private annuity obligation to it.[345] East Baton Rouge Ltd. (Nevada) was wholly owned by East Baton Rouge Limited (IOM), which was wholly owned by the Bulldog IOM Trust.[346] Sam did five more similarly structured private annuity transactions in 1992, but using five different Nevada and IOM corporations.[347]

The structure of the private annuity transactions changed in 1996,[348] although those transactions were equally complex for no apparent business reason. For example, on December 29, 1995, Sam assigned 650,000 options to purchase stock of Sterling Software to Crazy Horse IOM Trust, a foreign trust he settled, which trust then assigned the options to Locke Limited (IOM), an entity wholly owned by the Bulldog IOM Trust, in exchange for an unsecured private annuity payable to Crazy Horse IOM Trust. Crazy Horse IOM Trust was then terminated, the effect of which was to put the right to receive the annuity payments to Sam who, as just noted, was the grantor of the now-liquidated Crazy Horse IOM Trust. Sam did five more similarly structured annuity transactions in 1996, using different entities.[349]

The structure of the annuity transactions undertaken by Charles was identical to those undertaken by Sam in 1992 and 1996. Charles did four private annuity transactions in 199 2[350] and four more in 1996.[351]

After deferring receipt of his annuity payments,[352] Sam began receiving annuity payments on some of the annuities in 2004 and on others in 2007.[353] Similarly, after deferring receipt of his annuity payments,[354] Charles' annuity payments commenced 404 in 2003, 2004, and/or 20 06.[355] To date, in exchange for approximately $105 million worth of options, Sam has received—and paid tax on—approximately $282 million in annuity payments.[356] However, Sam has forgiven approximately $60,972,221 in annuity payments from three IOM corporations (and agreed to forego all future annuity payments from those corporations)[357] and does not expect to receive $70,544,877 in annuity payments currently due (or any further annuity payments) from another four IOM corporations,[358] because all of those corporations have been rendered insolvent financing the Wyly "family's lifestyle and domestic business 405 interests,"[359] thereby enabling the remaining Wyly wealth to remain offshore untaxed,[360] as will be discussed further below. And, as the IRS correctly points out (and as will be discussed further below), the annuity payments only commenced after the Wylys admittedly learned of serious potential risks associated with their offshore system and/or when it became apparent to them that the offshore system would likely come under public scrutiny through some combination of (i) the filing of certain disclosures their then tax lawyers recommended they file with the IRS regarding potential problems with the positions they had taken on prior filed tax returns, (ii) an IRS audit, (iii) an impending Senate subcommittee investigation of them and tax haven abuses in general, and (iv) investigations of securities fraud allegations against them by, among others, the SEC.[361]

The Wylys offered some explanation for the complexity of their offshore structures, but often those explanations only lead to an analysis of other badges of fraud. For example, Sam's private annuity transactions in 1992 involved six Nevada corporations[362] and six identically named IOM corporations and Charles' private annuity transactions that year involved four Nevada corporations and four identically named IOM corporations. All of those transactions could have been accomplished in a single transfer for Sam (and another for Charles), as one of the attorneys on whose advice the Debtors are relying, Michael Chatzky ("Chatzky"), admitted on cross-examination.[363] However, if structured as a single assignment of opinions and warrants, the IOM entity that ultimately received the options and warrants would have been subject to SEC reporting requirements, which the Wylys were desperate to avoid. In fact, considerable effort went into attempting to insure that no IOM entity held more than 5% of the stock of Sterling Software, Sterling Commerce, and/or Michaels Stores, on whose boards Sam and Charles sat, as will be discussed further below.[364]

406 Similarly, no explanation was provided as to why the 1996 private annuity transactions were structured as they were (other than the attempt to avoid SEC reporting once again). As noted previously, unlike the 1992 annuity transactions, in 1996 Sam assigned options and warrants in Sterling Software, Sterling Commerce, and/or Michaels Stores to four IOM grantor trusts he had settled in 1992, 1995 and 1996 (Tallulah IOM Trust, Crazy Horse IOM Trust, Arlington IOM Trust, and Sitting Bull IOM Trust), who then assigned the options and warrants to six IOM corporations (Locke Limited (IOM), Moberly Limited (IOM), Sarnia Investments Limited (IOM), Audubon Asset Limited (IOM), Yurta Faf Limited (IOM), and Devotion Limited (IOM)) in exchange for those corporations issuing an annuity back to the four IOM trusts. Shortly after those four IOM trusts received the annuities, the trusts were terminated and the annuity contracts were assigned to Sam, who had been the grantor of those trusts. So, if the purpose of the transaction was for Sam to assign options and warrants to offshore entities in exchange for annuities, why not do it simply and directly? The inference the IRS asks this Court to draw from the elaborate and apparently unnecessary structure is that the use of so many entities and so many transfers would make the scheme harder to unravel and understand, which is a reasonable inference given the absence of any evidence suggesting a legitimate business purpose to this myriad of entities and transfers.

Similarly complex structures were undertaken through the Bessie IOM Trust's ownership of five IOM corporations (Mi Casa Limited (IOM), Cottonwood I Limited (IOM), Cottonwood II Limited (IOM), Rosemary's Circle R Ranch Limited (IOM), and Spitting Lion Limited (IOM)) that were used to indirectly purchase and hold title to real estate in the United States through the five IOM corporations establishment of a domestic “management” trust, which would then establish a Texas or Colorado limited liability company depending on where the real property was located, which would hold legal title to the real property. As the IRS correctly points out, if the Bessie IOM Trust had wanted to invest in U.S. real estate, it certainly could have done so in a much simpler structure. But, the layers upon layers of entities made it that much more likely that the existence and complexity of the offshore system could remain secret from the IRS. And, through this structure, a Wyly family member or former family member could obtain a small percentage ownership interest in the management trust and then, according to Wyly family tax lawyers, enjoy the benefits of that real property, by living in a home rent free or operating a business rent free in the property. In addition to the alleged lack of economic substance to these structures, the IRS attacks them as gifts from Sam to the respective family member(s) who enjoyed the use of the real property, which will be discussed further below. [365]

Another IOM entity owned by the Bessie IOM Trust, Audubon Asset Limited (IOM), [366] and an entity owned by Tyler IOM Trust, Soulieana Limited (IOM), [367] were used to purchase works of art, household furnishings, jewelry, and similar items of personal property that were then provided to various Wyly family members 407 to use and enjoy pursuant to “possession agreements” between the IOM entity and the applicable Wyly family member. [368] While these transactions will be analyzed in greater detail in connection with the Court's analysis of another badge of fraud—i.e., the use of the offshore system as the Wyly families' personal piggy bank, the point here is structural—if the two IOM trusts had wished to own items of personal property, they could have simply made the purchase and held title to the asset directly. However, the additional layer of entities made it more likely that the offshore system would remain undiscovered by the IRS.

As the above analysis demonstrates, the Wyly's offshore system was more complex than it needed to be. There is little credible evidence in the record suggesting a legitimate business reason requiring this level of complexity. As the Court can now independently attest, attempting to understand the structure and the myriad of transactions undertaken through the structure has required days and days (if not weeks and weeks) of thoughtful analysis. With little legitimate business explanation for the complexity, the Court infers—which inference is unquestionably supported by the record—that a primary reason for making the offshore system this complex was the hope that no one, including the Court, could ever figure out what was going on here and why. This badge of fraud was established by clear and convincing evidence from 1992 through 2013 as to Sam, which are all of the tax years at issue in the Motions, and from 1992 through 2011 as to Charles.

As this badge of fraud relates to Dee, however, the Court concludes that there is simply no evidence that Dee participated in the formation of the offshore system to any great extent, although she did sign some documents that Charles asked her to sign—albeit, without reading them. Dee testified credibly that (i) she was not involved in Charles' business affairs, (ii) never discussed business with him, and (iii) trusted him such that when he asked her to sign a document she would, without question. The Court believes her and simply cannot imagine her even being interested 408 in having a conversation with Charles about the complexities of the Wyly offshore system. Although Dee is intelligent, she is not financially sophisticated. The Court is satisfied that even if she had asked Charles questions, it is unlikely that she would have understood the implications of what she heard—particularly given the complexities of the offshore system here.

By way of background, and to give context for the above findings, Dee and Charles met and married while in college at Louisiana Tech. While Dee completed three years of college, she did not finish her degree after they married. In short, Dee was a homemaker who raised their children while Charles supported the family financially.[369] Dee is now 82 years old; the offshore system began to be established when she was about 58. After having asked no questions about Charles' business affairs for 36 plus years of their married life to that point, it strains credibility to think that she would have started in 1992 when the offshore system began to be implemented.

For these reasons this badge of fraud does not apply to Dee.

b) The Wylys' Willingness to Commit Securities Fraud to Preserve the Secret Offshore System and to Maintain its Tax Advantages.

The SDNY Court made the following findings and conclusions, which this Court has given collateral estoppel effect to and most of which were independently established here:

> Between 1992 and 1996, Sam and Charles Wyly created a number of IOM trusts, each of which owned several subsidiary companies. Michael French, the Wylys' family attorney, Sharyl Robertson, the Chief Financial Officer ("CFO") of the Wyly family office, and Michelle Boucher, the CFO of the Irish Trust Company, a Wyly-related entity in the Cayman Islands, served as protectors of the IOM trusts. French, Robertson, and Boucher conveyed the Wylys' investment recommendations to the trust management companies administering the Wylys' IOM trusts (the "IOM trustees"). All of the IOM trustees' securities transactions were based on the Wylys' recommendations and the IOM trustees never declined to follow a Wyly recommendation.[370]
> The Wylys served as directors of Michaels Stores, Sterling Software, Sterling Commerce, and Scottish Annuity and Life Holdings, Ltd. ("Scottish Re"). As part of their compensation, the Wylys received stock options and warrants. "Between 1992 and 1999, Sam and Charles Wyly sold or transferred to the [IOM] trusts and companies stock options in Michaels Stores, Sterling Software and Sterling Commerce" in exchange for private annuities while simultaneously disclaiming beneficial ownership over the securities in public 409 filings with the SEC. Between 1995 and 2005, the IOM trusts and companies exercised these options and warrants, separately acquired options and stock in all four companies, and sold the shares, without filing disclosures.[371]

The jury found that the Wylys were beneficial owners of the Issuer securities transferred to, held, and sold by the IOM trusts because the Wylys, directly or indirectly, had or shared voting and/or investment power over these securities. Thus, the jury concluded that the Wylys failed to accurately disclose the extent of their beneficial ownership in the Issuer securities under sections 13(d) and 16(a) of the Securities Exchange Act (the "Exchange Act"). The jury also found that the Wylys caused the Issuers to violate section 14(a) of the Exchange Act, because the Wylys misrepresented the extent of their beneficial ownership to the Issuers in their Director and Officer ("D & O") questionnaires, which were incorporated by the Issuers in proxy statements.[372]

In addition to these disclosure violations, the Wylys were found liable for securities fraud in violation of section 10(b) of the Exchange Act and section 17(a) of the Securities Act of 1933 (the "Securities Act"), and for aiding and abetting the Issuers' and the IOM trusts' securities law violations.[373]

In early to mid–1991, Sam Wyly asked Robertson to attend a seminar held by lawyer and trust promoter David Tedder on the use of foreign trusts as a method of asset protection and tax deferral. Shortly thereafter, the Wylys, Robertson, and French attended another Tedder seminar in New Orleans. Tedder, French, and the Wylys then had a private meeting at Sam Wyly's house in Malibu, California. At that meeting, Tedder "talked about establishing trusts that would provide tax deferral, and how the Wylys could transfer assets to those trusts and get tax deferral on the growth of those assets."[374]

Specifically, Tedder recommended transferring the Wylys' stock options in Sterling Software and Michaels Stores to a foreign trust in exchange for a private annuity "in a tax-free kind of 410 transaction." Under Tedder's plan, it was "expressly intended that [the Wylys] ... irrevocably surrender the enjoyment, control, ownership, and all economic benefits attributable to the ownership of the [options] which are sold in exchange for the private annuity." [375]

The Wylys pursued the offshore program primarily for its tax advantages. [376]

However, because Tedder suggested transferring stock options in publicly traded companies—Sterling Software and Michaels Stores—any such transaction would implicate the securities laws. French testified that he raised concerns about whether the Wylys would continue to have filing obligations as directors of Sterling Software and Michaels Stores, even after the transfers. Tedder responded that making SEC filings could threaten the Wylys' tax benefits, because "disclosure of the offshore trusts in SEC filings may lead the IRS to discover and investigate the tax issue, and ... the IRS might use the Wylys' SEC filings against them if the tax issue was ever litigated." [377]

But Sam Wyly corroborated French's account by testifying that Tedder told him that SEC filings 'could trigger tax problems if you had these things on file and [were] reporting the trust shares on [Schedule] 13Ds.' Further, it would be logical to draw an inference that the Wylys would have been concerned about taking inconsistent positions in their SEC and IRS filings when millions of dollars of tax savings were at stake. [378]

The jury found that the Wylys always had beneficial ownership over the options, warrants, and securities held by the IOM trusts. [379]

Thus, the Wylys were obligated to disclose, on the filings required by sections 13 and 16, any time they or the trusts transacted in those securities. Because beneficial ownership under the securities laws turns on having voting and/or investment power, truthful SEC filings would have forced the Wylys to admit having some element of control over the securities held by the trusts. To the Wylys, this would mean conceding some element of control over the trustees. But the Wylys believed—rightly or wrongly—that it was critical to conceal their control of the trustees in order to maintain the tax-free status of the trusts, including income from transactions in the Issuer securities. [380]

411 Footnote 91. [381] (Sam Wyly) ("We took steps to avoid control, and those are steps to create the appearance of avoiding control. It's reality and it's appearance. You want the appearance to match the reality.") Accord PX 890 (11/3/00 email from Robertson to Evan Wyly) ("Remember that it is critical from a U.S. tax standpoint that there is no appearance that the Wyly's [sic] are in control of the trusts or the protectors."). [382]

Because the Wylys made public filings showing the transfer of options to foreign trusts, and at other times publicized their relationship to the foreign trusts, the Wylys also took affirmative steps to minimize the trusts' SEC filings to conceal the ultimate exercise and sale of those options. For example, the Wyly family office tracked the percentage of ownership each trust management company had in a particular Issuer to avoid triggering mandatory SEC reporting. Thus, as Sam Wyly testified, not making SEC filings was logically "something that consistently went on" throughout the duration of the offshore system. [383]

Even when it would have been otherwise helpful to assert beneficial ownership over the stock held by the foreign trusts, such as during Sam Wyly's proxy battle for control of Computer Associates (the acquirer of Sterling Software) in February 2002, the Wylys chose not to do it in fear of inconsistent tax positions. From these facts, it is logical to draw the inference that making misleading statements in SEC filings, or not making SEC filings at all, was part of the Wylys' plan to maintain the appearance of separation and independence from the foreign trusts. [384]

412 Footnote 95. See PX 1101 (2/26/02 email from Keeley Hennington, tax director and, starting in 2000, CFO of the Wyly family office, to Boucher, attaching Hennington's note to Sam Wyly) ("The trusts are record owners of the shares on C[omputer] A[ssociates]' books. If it is represented [that] there are $2.9 shares [sic], I think it is likely CA may say we show the Wyly's [sic] only own 1.5M options and again the difference would need to be explained.... Our friendly IRS agent is still looming around and although he has verbally agreed not to look further at any foreign entities or trusts, I would not want to give him any fresh ammunition."). [385]

> The Wylys ultimately hired Tedder to help establish the first group of offshore trusts and subsidiary companies in 1992 (together with the Plaquemines Trust, the "Bulldog Trusts"). These trusts were settled by Sam or Charles Wyly and had beneficiaries including the Wylys' wives and children and several charitable organizations. The trust deeds permitted the protectors to "add [ ] or substitut[e]" a charitable organization "by notice in writing to the trustees." These trusts were explicitly set up as "non-grantor trust[s] rather than [ ] grantor trust[s] under Section 671–678 of the Code." Under the terms of the trusts, no United States beneficiary could receive a distribution from the trust until two years after the settlor's death.[386]
> Footnote 97. (Robertson). The 1992 Trusts relevant to the remedies phase are: 1) the Bulldog Non–Grantor Trust; 2) Lake Providence International Trust; 3) the Delhi International Trust; 4) the Pitkin Non–Grantor Trust; and 5) the Castle Creek International Trust. In 1995, the Bulldog Trust settled the Plaquemines Trust, which had a class of beneficiaries including Sam Wyly's children. These trusts are referred to as the "Bulldog Trusts" for purposes of this Opinion and Order. The terminology was coined by defendants' expert, Professor Robert Danforth, and has been adopted by the parties in their briefing and argument.[387]

As the above findings and conclusions make clear, and the record here independently establishes, Sam and Charles went to great lengths, using elaborate webs of entities, to avoid accurately and completely reporting the extent of their offshore holdings and the securities transactions that were occurring offshore at their direction. As found by the SDNY Court, and as independently established here, the offshore program was pursued primarily for its tax advantages.[388] That Sam and Charles were prepared to commit securities fraud to attempt to preserve those tax benefits is clear as Tedder told them before the first offshore trust was ever established (and the first private annuity transaction was ever undertaken) that "disclosure of the offshore trusts in SEC filings may lead the IRS to discover and 413 investigate the tax issue, and ... the IRS might use the Wylys' SEC filings against them if the tax issue was ever litigated."[389]

These facts support the existence of a badge of fraud by clear and convincing evidence as to Sam and Charles from the outset of the implementation of the Wyly offshore system in 1992 through 2005. However, there is no evidence that Dee participated in the securities fraud. While she may have benefited from it, that alone is insufficient for it to constitute a badge of fraud against her here.

c) The Failure to Take Action to Resolve the Conflicting Advice Sam and Charles Received Regarding the 1992 IOM Trusts

In his role as the Wylys' primary outside lawyer, French handled the details and was fully authorized to hire and consult with specialist advisors when he considered it necessary.[390] Moreover, as the Wylys' primary outside lawyer, French was intimately involved in the creation and maintenance of the Wyly offshore structure from its inception in 1992 until his relationship with the Wylys ended in 2001.[391] In fact, while not a tax specialist, French played a key role in the implementation of the Wyly offshore system and in facilitating many of the transactions undertaken through that system until his relationship with the Wylys ended in 2001.[392]

As was found in the SEC Action, and was independently established here:[393]

> [i]n 1993, French approached the law firm of Morgan, Lewis & Bockius ("Morgan Lewis") to discuss whether the Bulldog Trust was 'a grantor or non-grantor trust.' Morgan Lewis prepared a memorandum concluding 1) that there was a 'significant risk that the [Bulldog] 414 Trust will be characterized as a grantor trust under § 679 [because] income is being currently accumulated for the benefit of U.S. beneficiaries,' and 2) that '[i]t is also likely that the Trustee's power to add or substitute other foreign charities (within the class [of beneficiaries]) causes the Trust to be characterized as a grantor trust under § 674. Charles Lubar, the partner at Morgan Lewis retained to work on this matter, gave the memorandum to French and spoke with him about its conclusions.[394]

To amplify this finding a bit based on our record, Lubar was an experienced tax lawyer with impressive credentials. He graduated from Yale University in 1963 magna cum laude, received his JD from Harvard Law School in 1966 and received an LLM in tax from Georgetown University in 1967.[395] Lubar explained the significance of the distinction between foreign grantor and non-grantor trust status as follows: "[i]f you are a U.S. citizen and you set up a foreign trust that is treated as a grantor trust, then you are treated as owning all of the income of that trust, even if it is a completed gift to the foreign trust."[396] If the foreign trust was a valid non-grantor trust, "[t]here would be no tax."[397]

Recall that Sam settled the Bulldog IOM Trust as a foreign non-grantor trust in 1992 and that Charles settled the Pitkin IOM Trust as a foreign non-grantor trust then too. Obviously, if Lubar's concerns were well-founded, the impact on the Wyly offshore system and the annuity transactions undertaken by Sam and Charles in 1992 created substantial tax problems for them.

On this record there can be no doubt that French was Sam's and Charles' agent. French was undoubtedly acting on their behalf when he went to Lubar for a second opinion, as he had been authorized to do, on whether the 1992 IOM trusts settled by Sam and Charles were non-grantor trusts.[398] That French sought a second opinion in 1993 is significant because it confirms that: (i) French had lingering concerns about Tedder's legal opinion (ghost-written by Chatzky) concerning the tax consequences to the Wylys of the 1992 annuity transactions undertaken by Sam and Charles through the Bulldog IOM Trust and the Pitkin IOM Trust, respectively, and (ii) supports this Court' later finding that French had no specialized tax knowledge with which to evaluate the 415 proper status of the offshore trusts and the tax consequences flowing from the Wylys' 1992 annuity transactions. Significantly, knowledge of four facts can be imputed[399] to Sam and Charles from French's actions as their agent: (i) that French had lingering concerns about the proper characterization of the 1992 IOM trusts and the tax consequences flowing to the Wylys from the 1992 annuity transactions and the Wylys' reporting requirements regarding the 1992 IOM trusts, (ii) that French sought a second opinion from Lubar, a prominent international tax lawyer, (iii) that French learned that Lubar believed there was a "significant risk" that the 1992 IOM trusts would be characterized as grantor trusts to Sam and Charles, and (iv) that French learned that the tax consequences to the Wylys were vastly different if the 1992 IOM trusts were grantor trusts as to Sam and Charles.

Charged with knowledge of these facts, neither Sam nor Charles did anything further themselves, or acting through French, to resolve the conflicting advice they now had from two tax professionals they had hired to give them advice—Tedder and Lubar. And, rather than resolve this legal uncertainty, Sam and Charles continued with the offshore structure in its then form. And, they then chose to expand the offshore structure the following years through the settling of other foreign trusts with falsified documents, which we discuss below, and by continuing to transact business through the offshore system. These facts support the existence of a badge of fraud by clear and convincing evidence from 1993 through 2013 as to Sam and from 1993 through 2011 as to Charles.

However, there is no evidence that Dee ever knew about Lubar's conclusions—whether in 1993 or in 2003[400]—or that if she had known she would have understood the implications of those conclusions. This badge of fraud does not apply to Dee.

d) The Creation of False Documents to Support the Settling of IOM Trusts in 1994 and 1995 to Attempt to Obtain Favorable Tax Benefits for the Wylys

The SDNY Court made the following findings and conclusions, which are independently established here:

> The following year, French asked Lubar to advise the Wylys about whether a trust settled by "a foreign person who had done business with Sam Wyly" would be treated as a grantor trust. Lubar advised that "as long as there wasn't an indirect transfer of assets by the U.S. person and the foreign person put the money up, and there were certain powers in the trust, then it would be a foreign grantor trust, and the distributions then would not be taxable." For the purposes of rendering his opinion, Lubar assumed that the foreign grantor would be the "sole transferor of property to the trust[ ]," unless the taxpayers transferred funds "on an 'arm's length' basis."[401]
> In 1994 and 1995, two foreign citizens established several trusts for the benefit of the Wylys and their families (collectively, the "Bessie Trusts"). The Bessie 416 Trust and the Tyler Trust were purportedly settled by Keith King, an individual associated with

Ronald Buchanan, an IOM trustee selected by the Wylys, with initial contributions of $25,000 each. However, no such contribution was ever made. The trusts "were settled with a factual dollar bill ... plus an indebtedness of $24,999 each on the part of Keith King as settlor." That indebtedness was immediately forgiven.[402]

Footnote 107. The 1994/1995 trusts relevant to this Opinion and Order are: 1) the Bessie Trust; 2) the La Fourche Trust; 3) the Red Mountain Trust; and 4) the Tyler Trust. These trusts will be referred to as the "Bessie Trusts," as per Professor Danforth's grouping.[403]

The La Fourche Trust and the Red Mountain Trusts [sic] were purportedly settled by Shaun Cairns, another individual associated with Buchanan, also with initial contributions of $25,000 each. Cairns testified that French prepared letters stating that Cairns was establishing the trusts "to show [his] gratitude for [the Wylys'] loyalty to our mutual ventures and [their] personal support and friendship," and asked Cairns to sign them. In truth, Cairns had never met nor dealt with the Wylys before establishing the trusts, and had provided only $100 towards the trusts. Shortly after these trusts were settled, Cairns's trust management company was hired to serve as trustee for some of the Wylys' IOM trusts.[404]

These transactions were shams intended to circumvent the grantor trust rules. French and Buchanan, acting as the Wylys' agents, recruited King and Cairns to create a falsified record of a gratuitous foreign grantor trust. The trust documents are admittedly false—King and Cairns never contributed $25,000 towards the initial settlement.[405]

There were no gratuitous transfers here. First, I am doubtful that King provided even the factual $1 towards the trusts. In a November 26, 1995 fax to French, Buchanan writes that "Keith never produced the money." Buchanan explains that the King-related trusts "were settled with a factual dollar bill" only so that "there [was] no question of the[ ] [trusts] being voidable by reason of the 417 absence of assets" pending the Wylys' transfer of options. Even if King had contributed the $1, the premise that an unreimbursed dollar bill is sufficient to establish a tax-free foreign grantor trust cannot be taken seriously. Second, Cairns's transfer of $100 cannot be considered gratuitous because shortly after settling these trusts, he received lucrative work from the Wylys as trustee. Finally, in light of the falsified trust deeds and supporting documentation surrounding these trusts, it would be unjust to consider anyone but the Wylys to be the true grantors of these trusts.[406]

As was unquestionably established—both here and in the SEC Action—the establishment of the Bessie IOM Trust and the Tyler IOM Trust by King in 1994 and the establishment of the La Fourche IOM Trust and the Red Mountain IOM Trust by Cairns in 1995 was highly irregular from the outset. Of significance, the SDNY Court found that French and Buchanan were acting as Sam's and Charles' agents. This Court has given collateral estoppel effect to that finding, but at least as to French, the record here independently supports such a finding—by clear and convincing evidence. Moreover, that French was acting within the scope of that agency when he (i) consulted with Lubar about the potential tax ramifications to U.S. beneficiaries of a foreign trust settled by a non-U.S. person, and (ii) then proceeded to facilitate the implementation of those trusts through false documentation and other acts cannot be questioned.[407]

The law is clear, Sam and Charles, as French's principals, are charged with French's conduct in (i) facilitating the creation of the 1994 and 1995 IOM trusts, and (ii) creating false documentation that purports 418 to support the creation of the trusts. In explaining why this is so, the Court will first analyze the law regarding the general rule that an agent's conduct is imputed to his principal and will then explain why the Debtors' attempt to distinguish their situation from this general rule is ineffective.

[32] [33] First, and of significance, the Debtors have never argued that French was not the Wylys' agent regarding the implementation of the Wyly offshore system. Nor could they. Under Texas law, "an agency relationship arises when the principal consents to the agent acting on the principal's behalf."[408] An agency relationship need not be expressly established, and instead may be implied based on the conduct of the parties under the circumstances.[409]

Second, the evidence here unquestionably established that French was acting as Sam's and Charles' agent regarding the implementation of the Wyly offshore system from 1992 until his association with the Wylys' ended in early 2001.[410] For example, when explaining the roles of Robertson and French regarding the implementation of the 1992 IOM trusts, Evan testified that Robertson "as CFO, she did a lot of the research as well because there's accounting and finance related to this as well. So she would head up that part of the details, and Mike [French] would head up the legal details. That's typically how it worked whenever they worked on a project."[411] Then, Evan explained how the allocation of responsibility to implement the 1994 and 1995 IOM trusts was allocated between Robertson and French when he testified "[t]hat was handled by Mike French and Shari Robertson again ... We really left the legal part for Mike to work on. We left the accounting and financial part for Shari to work on. So we didn't get into too much of the details, but we felt comfortable that it was, you know, a fair and appropriate structure."[412] Sam also admitted that French acted with his authority with respect to the offshore system when he testified that French was "sort of the coordinator or the commander of the lawyers" who worked on creating the entities to create the offshore system.[413]

It is well settled that "a principal is chargeable with notice or knowledge concerning a matter within the scope of the agency, received by his agent while acting within the scope of his authority."[414] Comment b to § 5.03 of the Restatement (Third) of Agency illustrates the operation of, and reasoning behind, this legal rule:[415]

> Imputation charges a principal with the legal consequences of having notice of a material fact, whether or not such fact would be useful and welcome. If an agent has actual knowledge of a fact, the principal is charged with the legal 419 consequences of having actual knowledge of the fact. If the agent has reason to know a fact, the principal is charged with the legal consequences of having reason to know the fact. A principal may not rebut the imputation of a material fact that an agent knows or has reason to know by establishing that the principal instructed the agent not to communicate such a fact to the principal. Imputation thus reduces the risk that a principal may deploy agents as a shield against the legal consequences of facts the principal would prefer not to know.

[34] [35] [36] The Fifth Circuit, citing Texas law, also agrees that "[i]t is a fundamental rule of agency law that notice to the agent constitutes notice to the principal."[416] Moreover, long standing precedent from the Texas Supreme Court holds that an agent's knowledge may be imputed to a principal,[417] as has its more recent jurisprudence, which confirmed that Texas law "regard[s] it as well settled that if an agent's acts are within the scope of his authority, then notice to the agent of matters over which the agent has authority is deemed notice to the principal."[418]

[37] While an agent's knowledge is not imputed to the principal when the agent is acting in a manner that is actively adverse to that of his principal,[419] that adverse interest exception to the general rule is not applicable here, as French's actions were not adverse to the Wylys but were to benefit them. Even the Debtors agree in their post-trial briefing that the adverse interest exception is inapplicable here—i.e., we "have never argued that the 'adverse interest exception' applies."[420]

In an attempt to get out from under their agent's objective acts or conduct here, the Debtors argue that French's subjective fraudulent intent cannot be imputed to Sam and Charles for purposes of determining whether Sam and Charles underpaid their taxes in any year with fraudulent intent for purposes of 26 U.S.C. § 6663. The Court agrees that it is improper to impute French's subjective fraudulent intent to Sam and Charles 420 when it is Sam's and Charles' subjective intent that is at issue in determining whether fraud penalties are appropriate here, but that is not what the Court is doing, as will be explained below.

Moreover, relying on the Restatement (Third) of Agency, the Debtors argue that "[i]n other words, imputation is the general rule, but there is an exception 'when knowledge as distinguished from reason to know is important,' and circumstances exist where personal knowledge—as opposed to imputed knowledge—is the relevant question."[421] The Debtors go on to state that "case law bears out these principles and shows that only the Debtors' personal knowledge—not imputed knowledge—should be considered for purposes of the fraud penalties."[422] Significantly, the Debtors then cite to five cases decided in the tax law area and provide a parenthetical explanation of the holding of those cases. However, if those cases are examined closely, what the courts there are addressing is whether the specialized knowledge of a tax advisor can be imputed to the taxpayer in the context of the taxpayer's reliance on the advice of a tax professional to defeat the recovery of fraud or negligence penalties by the IRS.

For example, the first case cited by the Debtors is Henry v. C.I.R.,[423] with a parenthetical explanation as follows: ("holding that 'there is no evidence that [accountant] ever told [taxpayer] of this risk or of the [relevant treasury] regulation, and [accountant's] knowledge of the risk cannot be imputed to [taxpayer]' "). First, that is not the actual holding of the case, but irrespective of this, the quote does appear in the decision. Second, the Ninth Circuit's point in Henry is simply that the specialized knowledge of the accountant cannot be imputed to the taxpayer consistent with the Supreme Court's decision in U.S. v. Boyle[424] where the Supreme Court observed:

> When an accountant or attorney advises a taxpayer on a matter of tax law, such as whether a liability exists, it is reasonable for the taxpayer to rely on that advice. Most taxpayers are not competent to discern error in the substantive advice of an accountant or attorney. To require the taxpayer to challenge the attorney, to seek a 'second opinion,' or to try to monitor counsel on the provisions of the [Tax] Code himself would nullify the very purpose of seeking the advice of a presumed expert in the first place. 'Ordinary business care and prudence' do not demand such actions.[425]

The next case cited by the Debtors is Davis v. C.I.R.,[426] along with the following parenthetical ("[t]o hold a taxpayer guilty of fraud, who [files a return] without actual knowledge that a return is false, and after a full disclosure to the expert preparing the same, would be untenable.") While this quote appears in the Tenth Circuit's decision, once again it appears in the context of imputing the tax expert's knowledge to the taxpayer as the court made clear when it also stated:

> [t]o impute to the taxpayer the mistakes of his consultant would be to penalize him for consulting an expert; for if he must take the benefit of his counsel's or accountant's advice cum onere, then he 421 must be held to a standard of care which is not his own and one which, in most cases, would be far higher than that exacted of a layman.[427]

By way of one last example, the Debtors next cite Haywood Lumber & Min. Co. v. C.I.R.,[428] along with the following parenthetical ("[t]o impute to the taxpayer the mistakes of his consultant would be to penalize him for consulting an expert[.]"). While this quote appears in the Second Circuit's decision, it is simply repeating the substance of the Davis court's holding, but now in the context of deciding whether the taxpayer's reasonable cause defense should prevent the imposition of a 25% penalty.

As the Debtors themselves acknowledge later in their Post–Trial Brief, "[s]pecial rules have developed in the tax context for purposes of determining how to analyze taxpayer's relations with their advisors."[429] According to the Debtors, "[b]ecause tax law is such a complex area, specific rules have developed regarding the ability of taxpayers to rely on tax advice."[430] According to the Debtors, because of this complexity, > taxpayers have no obligation to second-guess or monitor their tax advisors. Because the imputation of knowledge rule that exists in other areas of the law is grounded in the principal's ability to monitor his agent to ensure compliance with the > agent's duty to transmit material facts to the principal, imputation conflicts with the special tax rule that no monitoring is required.[431]

The Court agrees with these statements and the holdings of the courts in Henry, Davis, and Haywood Lumber. But, what the Debtors' arguments overlook is that French was not the Debtors' specialized tax advisor. French had no specialized competence to address tax matters. That's why the Wylys looked to, among others, Tedder, Chatzky, Lubar, Owens, Pulman, and Cousins for their tax advice—not French. French was a securities lawyer.[432] And, in the context that this Court is discussing, French was simply the Wylys' agent; in essence, their middleman. Instead of the Wylys going to Lubar themselves for his tax advice, they sent French. So French, directly, and they, indirectly, consistent with the holdings of these cases and the Supreme Court in Boyle, may be able to reasonably rely on the advice of their specialized tax advisors, but the Court is not imputing Lubar's specialized tax knowledge to the Wylys for purposes of analyzing this objective badge of fraud.

Rather, all the Court is doing is imputing to Sam and Charles certain things their agent, French, did—again, not as their specialized tax advisor, but as their agent charged with responsibility to facilitate the implementation of the offshore system. So what acts did French do in his capacity as the person responsible to facilitate the implementation of the offshore system?

First, French went to Lubar and told Lubar to assume, as relevant here, three facts for purposes of offering his advice on the tax consequences to U.S. citizen beneficiaries 422 (Sam and his family, and Charles and his family) of transactions done within valid foreign grantor trusts settled by an individual who is a nonresident alien of the United States (King and Cairns). The three facts French told Lubar to assume were true were: (i) "[t]he Grantor, although not related to the Taxpayers, has known the Taxpayers for a considerable period of time," (ii) "[the Grantor] will establish the Trusts for the Taxpayers' benefit as an entirely gratuitous act," and (iii) "[a]ll moneys contributed to the Trusts, now or in the future, will belong to the Grantor, and he has not previously and will not in the future receive any consideration, reimbursement, or other benefit for, or in respect of, this act, directly or indirectly."[433]

Second, after enlisting Buchanan's help, French asked two virtual strangers to the Wylys—King and Cairns—to settle foreign grantor trusts with $25,000 of King's and Cairns' own money per trust—a total of $50,000 for each of them. One must wonder why French would ask virtual strangers to settle the trusts (given the facts he told Lubar to assume were true) or that either King or Cairns would settle trusts with $50,000 of their own money for the benefit of Americans one of them (King) barely knew[434] and the other of them (Cairns) did not know at all,[435] particularly since it was to be "an entirely gratuitous act." Of course, as was later discovered, they did not settle the trusts with the required money. None of the 1994 or 1995 Wyly IOM trusts was settled with the $25,000 that each Deed of Settlement required.

Third, after Cairns agreed to settle his trusts, French prepared and had false documents signed to attempt to create a paper record to show that the Cairns-settled trusts "fit" into the proper mold for (i) the establishment of a valid foreign trust by a non-U.S. grantor, and (ii) the Wylys to obtain the tax benefits such a structure would offer. In short, French "papered" the transactions in such a way that the trusts might later withstand scrutiny by the IRS—or so French and his principals, Sam and Charles, hoped.[436]

Fourth, shortly after these trusts were settled, Cairns' trust management company was hired to serve as trustee for some of the Wylys' IOM trusts.[437] Thus, Cairns received "consideration, reimbursement, or other benefit ..., directly or indirectly," for purportedly settling these trusts for the benefit of Sam, Charles, and their respective families.

Fifth, although the record does not reflect that King received business from the Wylys after settling the Bessie IOM Trust and the Tyler IOM Trust, it does reflect that King had previous dealings with Maverick, 423 [438] trading in South African bonds. This is why French reached out to King to settle the trusts, because French believed that King had made a substantial amount of money on these dealings, and had reason to "want to give something back" to the Wylys.[439]

These acts undertaken by French, acting within the scope of his agency, in order to obtain favorable tax treatment for the Wylys offshore transactions undertaken through the 1994 and 1995 IOM trusts supports the existence of a badge of fraud from the date of the creation of each trust through 2013 as to Sam and from 1992 through 2011 as to Charles.

One final point must be addressed. During closing arguments, the Wylys' counsel argued that French had gone rogue—out acting on his own without the Wylys' knowledge. The Court rejects this argument for at least two reasons. First, it is simply incredible that a "trusted advisor"—French; in fact, one of the Wylys' "most trusted advisors"[440]—would go rogue. And, if he was acting out as they now argue, that they would keep him around for another six years all the while guaranteeing him an annual income of at least $1.5 million.[441] On this record, that is not a credible assertion and the Court rejects it. Second, as a matter of law, it does not matter if French was a rogue actor. Sam and Charles chose to rely on him to act as their agent to facilitate the implementation of their offshore system, and they are stuck with what he did on their behalf.

However, there is no evidence that Dee ever knew about the falsified documents or other things that were done to try to make the 1994 and 1995 IOM trusts fit into the proper mold for a valid foreign trust settled by a non-U.S. person. Moreover, there is no evidence that French was Dee's agent in connection with the implementation of the offshore system. This badge of fraud does not apply to Dee.

e) The Treatment of the Offshore System as the Wyly Family Piggy Bank

The IRS argues, and the Court agrees, that the Wyly family treated the offshore system as their personal piggy bank, of that there is no doubt on this record. The record is replete with instances where a Wyly family member would purchase an item and, after making the purchase, figure out a way to have it paid for with offshore funds.

A prime example is the purchase of an expensive piece of art, Noon Day Rest, by Cheryl Wyly, Sam's wife. Cheryl apparently attended an art auction at Sotheby's in London where she found a painting she liked by a British artist, John Frederick Herring. The invoice is dated July 10, 1996 and the purchaser is shown to be Mrs. Cheryl Wyly, along with the address of their Dallas home.[442] The purchase price is £155,000. Nine days later French sends a memorandum to Ronald Buchanan at Lorne House Trust, the IOM trust management company that served as trustee for the Bessie IOM Trust, in which French 424 directs that the painting be purchased with offshore funds:[443]

> Attached is language from the Deed of Settlement of the Bessie Trust. This language clearly authorizes a purchase of personal property for personal use or enjoyment in specie by any beneficiary.
> Unless there is a clear and unequivocal requirement of IOM law (which I doubt), that any such purchase that is specifically authorized by the trust agreement must nevertheless be weighed against the investment returns that could otherwise be obtained on the funds, then I must assume that this transaction is authorized and lawful. If you wish to search for such a legal prohibition, you should do so at your own expense and not that of the Trust.
> The Protectors have already recommend [sic] this transaction. Please advise if you are willing to proceed on that basis in light of the explicit authorization for the transaction contained in the Trust Deed.
> We need to resolve this issue at once.

In a rare instance of an offshore trustee pushing back against a recommendation of the Wyly trust protectors (French and Robertson at that time), Buchanan wrote back to Boucher stating his concerns regarding the purchase:[444]

> Thank you for your overnight fax.[445] We will put in train the necessary actions but we would draw to the Committee of Protectors' attention that they are recommending the substitution of a very safe, income-producing asset by one which might be difficult to sell at a profit at short notice and which generates no income, especially since it is suggested that the Trustees should buy it—through Fugue Limited, which is wholly owned by the Bessie Trust—at 222% of the pre-auction estimated price.

> We would therefore ask them to confirm, either directly to us or though you under your delegated authority, that: > they do not believe that the beneficiaries will need the income which the proposed purchase price could have generated in the near or medium-term future.
> that [sic] they believe that, over the long term, the painting will gain appreciably more in value than would Treasury Bills with the income reinvested."

On July 24, 1996, French sent a draft letter back to Buchanan, asking if the draft letter will suffice and, if it will, advising that he will get it signed by Sam.[446] Although Buchanan asked for confirmation that the trust protectors believed that the beneficiaries will not need the income and that they believe that the painting will appreciate in value more than Treasury Bills would earn, no trust protector responds; rather, Sam apparently responds, saying that the beneficiaries of the Bessie IOM Trust have no need for the money,[447] although it is unclear in the record whether Sam actually signed the draft letter prepared by French, as no signed copy was introduced into evidence. Moreover, the draft letter ignores the IOM trustee's 425 question of whether the painting will appreciate in value.[448]

Then, on July 26, 1996, Sotheby's reissues an invoice for Noon Day Rest—but now to Fugue Limited, Mr. Ronald Buchanan Esq. C/O Lorne House Trust at the trust company's IOM address.[449] Fugue Limited (n/k/a Audubon Asset Limited (IOM)) is one of the IOM corporations wholly owned by the Bessie IOM Trust,[450] of which Lorne House Trust (acting through Buchanan) served as trustee.[451] Noon Day Rest was immediately hung in the home of Sam and Cheryl in Dallas after Fugue Limited's purchase of it, where it hung until it was recently sold pursuant to an Order of this Court.

During his trial testimony, Sam appeared to recall little about the transaction, but when he realized what painting he was being cross-examined about he testified "[i]t's a Herring. Yeah, we love Herrings."[452] Buchanan's inquiry about appreciation of the painting from an investment perspective proved insightful (although he ignored his own instincts as Sam "wished"), as Noon Day Rest was recently sold at an art auction in Dallas, for an amount substantially less than the amount paid to acquire it.[453]

Two things stand out about this transaction. First, Cheryl made the purchase as the initial invoice demonstrates. After the fact, the purchase is recharacterized as an offshore purchase. Second, it is the first instance in the record where trust protectors recommend that offshore funds be used to purchase personal property for use by a Wyly family member. When Buchannan (the relevant IOM trustee) expresses concern regarding the wisdom of an entity owned by the Bessie IOM Trust making the purchase, he is sharply reprimanded by French and directed to make the purchase, which brings to mind a comment from Sam that an IOM trustee would simply be fired if he failed to follow a Wyly "wish".[454] In an instance where Buchannan tries to exercise independent judgment, he is immediately shut down. Clearly, this transaction set the tone for future dealings between the Wylys and the various IOM trustees, demonstrating that Sam's and Charles' "wishes" were to be followed without question.

While the record is replete with other instances on the Sam side of the Wyly family, the Court will only discuss one other example in detail and six others briefly before turning to the Charles side of the Wyly family. On January 25, 2000, Hennington emails Owens at the Meadows Owens law firm, copying two of Sam's children and Boucher, stating:[455]

> Evan, Lisa, Laurie and Kelly are planning to purchase a house for their mother using off-shore funds. I think we would like to use the same Texas LLC, Texas Trust and off-shore corp to get this done. The house will cost around $850,000. I assume we will need her to come in for 1% to the trust. They are coming up with names now and Michelle 426 Boucher is starting the process for the off-shore side. Can you please get someone started ASAP on drawing up these documents. I do not think it should take a lot of time since we have basically done this a few times now. We have told her to give us 2 weeks to have the necessary documents drawn up. I will get you the names in the next few days. Please let me know if there is anything else we should be thinking about. As always, thanks for your help.

Owens responds 20 minutes later:[456]

> Will do, with pleasure. Please forward names of mother, offshore company and Texas Trust name, as well as legal description of property, and finally the total capital needed. To which file do you want this billed? If to one of the offshore Trusts, please ask Shari to let me know which one. This is fun!

Two days later, on January 27 Hennington emails Owens again stating: [457]

> Here are the names for the entities to do Rosemary Acton's house that Lisa, Laurie, Evan and Kelly are purchasing.
> Offshore corp—Spitting Lion Limited
> Domestic Texas Trust—Spitting Lion Management Trust
> Domestic Texas LLC—Spitting Lion LLC
> Michelle Boucher is going to let me know as soon as the name is approved (I do not think we will have a problem). We are planning to fund $900,000 from off-shore to cover closing costs, etc. I am assuming Rosemary will come into trust with $9,000. Does anyone else need to be co-settlor of the trust? ? Please let me know if you need anything else.

Four days later, on February 1, Hennington emails Owens to advise: "they have formed the off-shore entity Spitting Lion Limited. Would you please let me know where the other stuff is or who is working on it so I can bug them. As with everything, it has a short fuse. Thanks." [458]

There are so many problems captured by this rather simple 4–page exhibit of emails that the Court is almost at a loss where to begin. First, the emails make clear that four of Sam's children have decided to buy their mother and Sam's first wife, Rosemary Acton, a house in Dallas. That's a lovely thought, but they apparently don't want to use their own money or pay gift tax on their gift to her, so they decide to use offshore funds, which leads us to the second issue. The use of offshore funds is not their decision to make—i.e., "Evan, Lisa, Laurie, and Kelly are planning to purchase a house for their mother using off-shore funds," followed by "[w]e are planning to fund $900,000 from off-shore to cover closing costs, etc." Rather, it is the decision of the Trustee of the Bessie IOM Trust, which will ultimately own Spitting Lion Limited (IOM), through which this transaction is ultimately undertaken. However, as the emails also make clear, there is not a single thought in anyone's mind that the offshore Trustee will not simply do as instructed by the Wylys—i.e., "Michelle Boucher is starting the process for the off-shore side," followed by "[w]e have told her [Rosemary Acton] to give us 2 weeks to have the necessary documents drawn up," and concluding with "I do not think we will have a problem."

427 Hennington was right—there was apparently no problem offshore, as the Spitting Lion transaction was consummated through the creation of Spitting Lion Limited (IOM) on February 3, 2000 as a wholly owned corporation of the Bessie IOM Trust, and Rosemary Acton was provided a $850,000 home in which to live for her contribution of $9,000 to Spitting Lion Management Trust for a 1% ownership interest in that trust, which enabled her, according to Owens' alleged advice, to live in the home rent free for the remainder of her life. [459]

Finally, the Court has puzzled over Owens' comment in his original reply "This is fun!" For context, the Court understands that Owens was the lawyer who came up with the rather complex structure the Wylys used—repeatedly—to bring offshore money back onshore for real estate transactions like this one, where one or more Wyly family member would have the use and enjoyment of the property without it being taxed as a distribution from an offshore trust and without the family member having to pay tax on the value of their use of the property. As one of Owens' law partners, Pulman, explained in his testimony: [460]

> Rodney [Owens] was a very good lawyer and a creative lawyer, and he worked very hard for his clients. Rodney came up with the idea that generally in the real estate area, co-tenants can use property, they both have the right to it, and the use of it is not income from one to the other. So—
> Q. Excuse me. Is that under state law or federal law?
> A. It's under state law, but it's general—it's co-tenants, joint tenants can use any kind of property, but we were talking about real estate. So the concept was we were going to have a foreign corporation, because of the liability and because of the estate tax, that would be the investor. But then we had to have a > structure so we could have co-tenants, but not owning the property directly, so Rodney came up with the idea of this joint manage—of this management trust. And the management trust would own the entity that owns the real estate. And the management trust was structured specifically to say that the—that the grantors—in this case, it would be Sam Wyly and the offshore company—would have the right to use of the property as co-tenants, and that if they withdrew, which either partner had the right to do at any time, they would get back what they put in, plus their percentage share of the value of the property. So we were trying to structure it so that it was truly a co-ownership arrangement that under state law, whether it would be Texas or Colorado, would have the right as a co-tenant, and the LLCs agreements were also drafted consistently so that the owners—so that the co-grantors or the management trust would have the right to use the property as co-tenants.

Pulman went on to explain that Owens took a personal interest in the Wylys and reviewed all of the work done by other lawyers at Meadows Owens on a Wyly matter. [461]

Turning back to Owens' "this is fun!" remark, the only realistic inference the Court can draw from this rather unfortunate comment is that Owens thinks it is 428 "fun!" to have devised a clever structure to bring money onshore for Wyly family members' use tax free (in his view) and to then see his structure being implemented several times, as Hennington's email makes clear—i.e., "Can you please get someone started ASAP on drawing up these documents. I do not think it should take a lot of time since we have basically done this a few times now." [462]

This same structure was used on the Sam side of the family on at least four other occasions—in connection with the Rosemary Circle R Ranch property near Aspen Colorado, for the use and enjoyment of Lisa and Kelly, two of Sam's daughters; for the Cottonwood I and Cottonwood II condominium purchases in Aspen, also for the use and enjoyment of Kelly (she operates an art gallery on the first floor of the condominium (the Cottonwood I transaction) and apparently has an apartment and office on the second floor of the condominium (the Cottonwood II transaction); [463] and in connection with the Mi Casa property located in Dallas, where Laurie, another of Sam's daughters, lives with her husband and children. [464]

Finally, as found by the SDNY Court, in June 2002, Sam Wyly contacted a broker directly and instructed him to 'hold on' to 100,000 shares of TYCO stock, overriding a previous order from the IOM trustee, based on an earlier Wyly recommendation, to sell all TYCO shares." [465]

Turning to the Charles side of the Wyly family, the same structure devised by Owens was used to bring offshore money onshore to purchase real estate for the use and enjoyment of his and Dee's children at least twice. First, Little Woody LLC, which was owned by Little Woody Management Trust, which was owned by Little Woody Creek Road Limited (IOM)(98%) and Emily (1%) and Jennifer (1%), which was owned in turn by the Tyler IOM Trust, bought a piece of real estate near Aspen in 2001 (LL Ranch) for the use and enjoyment of Emily and Jennifer, two of Charles and Dee's daughters. [466] Second, Stargate Sport Horses, LP, which was owned by Stargate Horse Properties, Inc. (91.21%) and Stargate Sport Horse Management LLC (8.79%), which was owned by Stargate Farms Limited (IOM), which was owned in turn by the Tyler IOM Trust, bought a piece of property in Texas where Emily ran an equestrian center for several years, after which it was liquidated after experiencing net operating losses over the life of the Tyler IOM Trust's indirect "investment." [467]

For other examples of property desired by a family member being purchased by 429 them, but then paid for by an offshore entity, we turn to Dee's testimony at trial. Charles gave Dee two very expensive pieces of jewelry for Christmas in 2000, a diamond necklace and a diamond ring that he purchased from Eiseman Jewels in Dallas for $759,000 and $667,000, respectively. The invoice reflecting the sale to Charles is dated November 21, 2000. [468] The invoice reflects that it is to be shipped to Aspen Colorado, where Dee and Charles have a home and where they were spending Christmas that year. Because the jewelry is to be shipped out of state, no Texas sales tax is charged to Charles. [469] Dee testified: [470]

> Q. So, they were given to you in Aspen. Is that right?
> A. Right, by my husband.
> Q. Now, with respect to this ring and this necklace, it's fair to say that you didn't consider anyone else other than yourself as the owner of those two pieces of jewelry. Is that correct?

> A. Correct.
> Q. And, in fact, do you still possess these items?
>
> A. Yes.
> Q. They're in a safe in your home?
> A. Yes.

However, apparently unbeknownst to Dee, Soulieana Limited (IOM), an entity wholly owned by the Tyler IOM Trust, paid for those two pieces of jewelry at Charles' direction, and Soulieana Limited (IOM) also claims to own those pieces of jewelry, which are kept in Dee's safe in Dee's home in Dallas, which home is the same home she shared with Charles when he was alive. Soulieana Limited (IOM) purchased other jewelry that Charles gave Dee and that Dee considers herself to be the owner of.[471]

Moreover, Dee purchased pieces of art from the Huntsman gallery, which were hung in one of her homes —either in Dallas or Aspen, but which were paid for by Soulieana Limited (IOM).[472] For example, on February 10, 1997, Amy Browning, who worked at the Wyly family office,[473] sent a fax to Paul at Huntsman stating:[474]

> Pursuant to my telephone conversation, please invoice the recent purchase by Dee Wyly as follows:
> Soulieana Limited
> Lorne House Trust Limited
>
> c/o Lorne House
>
> Castletown, Isle of Man
> British Isles
> Each invoice should be accompanied by a picture of the item being purchased. In addition, please send these invoices and the necessary documentation to the attention of Shari Robertson, 8080 North Central Expressway, LB 31, Dallas TX 752–6. The Wyly name should not be noted on the invoices.
> If you have any questions, do not hesitate to contact me.

430 As another example, the Court will note Dee's purchases from Marguerite Theresa Green & Associates, which is an interior design firm Dee used when Charles and she remodeled their home in Dallas. Dee testified that, with Ms. Green's assistance, she selected a number of items —largely collectibles and furnishings—for their Dallas home.[475] Yet, once again, those items were invoiced to, and paid for by, Soulieana Limited (IOM).[476]

Finally, in late 2000, someone apparently decided it would be a good idea to create a better paper trail, so what the Court will refer to as “possession agreements” were thereafter entered into by the offshore entity who had paid for the items and the person who had selected them and had possession of them in the United States. An example of such a possession agreement between Soulieana Limited (IOM) and Charles is IRS Exhibit 26.[477] Of note, Schedule A lists the items Soulieana Limited (IOM) claims to own, the location of the items, their acquisition dates, from whom the items were purchased, and the total cost of each item in USD. This schedule includes 9 pages (single spaced) of art purchases; wall sculptures; photographs (several original Ansel Adams photographs); china and silver; and furniture, furnishings, and ornaments, all of which are located at Charles' and Dee's home in Dallas.

There are many other examples in the record that amply support the finding that Sam, certain of Sam's family members, and Charles considered the offshore system to be their personal piggy banks, through which they could purchase items using offshore money on a tax-free basis. This badge of fraud is established by clear and convincing evidence as to Sam from 1996 through 2013 and for Charles from 1997 through 2011.

The record, however, does not support such a finding with respect to Dee. Although the record shows that Dee purchased items paid for with offshore funds, her uncontroverted testimony was that (i) she was not aware of this,[478] and (ii) her lifestyle did not measurably change as a result of Charles establishing the various 431 IOM trusts and corporations.[479] Indeed, Dee was surprised that Soulieana Limited (IOM) claims to be the owner of various pieces of jewelry Charles gave her, believing she is the owner.[480]

f) The Planned Insolvency of Various IOM Corporations that Owed Annuity Obligations

As discussed previously, Sam did six private annuity transactions in 1992 and six more in 1996. Charles did four private annuity transactions in each of those years (though one in 1992 involved Dee). With respect to the 1992 annuity transactions, Sam, Dee, and Charles were each scheduled to begin to receive payments when they reached the age of 65 (which was 1998 for Charles, and 1999 for each of Sam and Dee).[481] With respect to the 1996 annuity transactions, Sam and Charles were each scheduled to receive additional annuity payments when they reached the age of 68.[482] However, the payment commencement date for each set of annuities was extended, so that Sam, Dee, and Charles would begin to receive payments on the 1992 annuity transactions on their 70th birthdays, and payments on the 1996 annuity transactions on their 73rd birthdays.

In 2003, Charles began receiving annuity payments,[483] as did Dee and Sam in 2004. To the date of his death in 2011, which terminated the annuities payable to him, Dee and Charles received, and paid tax on, $112,693,782.00 in annuity payments.[484] To date, Sam has received, and paid tax on, $281,852,553.00 in annuity payments.[485] Dee is still receiving some annuity payments, as is Sam.

However, several of the IOM corporations that owed annuity payments to Sam became insolvent, causing them to be unable to pay and causing Sam to forgive those payments and any future payments from them prior to his bankruptcy filing 432 here. For example, in a letter dated May 31, 2013 from Tensas Limited (IOM) to Sam, Tensas Limited (IOM) stated that it was not in a position to make the required annuity payment and that it did not anticipate being able to do so in the future.[486] The letter acknowledged that Tensas Limited (IOM) had not made full payments to Sam since 2010 and, consequently, owed Sam a total annuity payment of $5,403,975, plus accrued interest to May 31, 2013 of $787,742.13, with further interest accruing at a daily rate of $1,006.77.[487] Tensas Limited (IOM) proposed assigning to Sam all of the assets then belonging to Tensas Limited (IOM)—approximately $2,068,000 in cash—as full and final payment against all outstanding annuity payments and annuity interest owed, plus any future annuity payments due under its agreement with Sam.[488] Sam accepted the proposal, signing the letter "as full and final payment against all outstanding annuity payments and annuity interest owed, plus any future annuity payments."[489] And, having reached this result with Sam, it appears that Tensas Limited (IOM) was voluntarily liquidated.[490] According to the Tensas Limited (IOM) Financial Statements for the year ended December 31, 2012, the value of the annuity for future payments was $10,789,436.[491] Thus, Sam agreed to forego approximately $14,913,153 million owed to him by Tensas Limited (IOM).[492]

Sam forgave other annuity obligations owing from IOM corporations. In a letter dated the same day, May 31, 2013, East Baton Rouge Limited (IOM) notified Sam that it was not in a position to make the required annuity payment of $2,467,258 and that it did not anticipate being able to do so in the future.[493] The letter acknowledged that East Baton Rouge Limited (IOM) had not made full payments to Sam since 2011 and, consequently, owed Sam a past due annuity payment of $3,416,187, plus accrued interest to May 31, 2013 of $252,553.97, with further interest accruing at a daily rate of $786.19.[494] Just like Tensas Limited (IOM), East Baton Rouge Limited (IOM) proposed assigning to Sam all of the assets then belonging to it—approximately $1,987,646 in cash—as full and final payment against all outstanding annuity payments and annuity interest owed, plus any future annuity payments due under its agreement with Sam.[495] Sam accepted the proposal, thereby accepting about $2 million in satisfaction of an approximate $3.6 million current obligation[496] and agreeing to forgo future payments 433 valued at $19,266,843 million.[497] East Baton Rouge Limited (IOM) was apparently then liquidated.[498]

Similarly, by letter dated October 4, 2013, East Carroll Limited (IOM) notified Sam that it was not in a position to make the required annuity payment of $3,142,095 and that it did not anticipate being able to do so in the future.[499] Just like the other IOM corporations just discussed, East Carroll Limited (IOM) proposed assigning to Sam all of the assets then belonging to it—approximately $1,283,807.74 in cash—as full and final payment against all outstanding annuity payments and annuity interest owed, plus any future annuity payments due under its agreement with Sam.[500] Once again, Sam accepted the proposal, thereby accepting approximately $1.3 million in satisfaction of a $3.1 million obligation and agreeing to forgo future payments valued at $23.2 million.[501] East Carroll Limited (IOM) was presumably then liquidated.[502]

Sam and Charles structured the IOM corporations that were liable to make the annuity payments in such a manner that they could manipulate whether annuity payments would be made due to the planned illiquidity or insolvency of the IOM corporations, including by moving funds between the various IOM and Cayman corporations and deciding when loans would be repaid (as discussed below). While the IOM corporations owing annuity obligations to Sam were provided stock options worth at least the value of the annuities they issued, by 2003, Hennington and Boucher advised Sam and Charles, among others, that several of those corporations had insufficient assets to fulfill those annuity obligations.[503] In other words, their insolvency was a virtual certainty, unless the Wylys infused these corporations with additional funds from other IOM or Cayman corporations, something that they had done in the past and continued to do from time to time. For example, in 2007, Audubon Asset Limited (IOM) borrowed money from three of the Cayman 434 LLCs to pay the $5,793,464 annual annuity payment owed to Sam,[504] and Moberly Limited (IOM) borrowed $8 million from Morehouse Limited (IOM) to pay the $8 million annual annuity payment owed to Sam.[505] But, nothing in the record explains why loans were sometimes made to fund annuity payments but not always made.

As a result, and as the Court analyzed the trial record, it wondered about the timing of the forgiveness of these annuity receivables since these IOM corporations had not been able to make a full payment to Sam for years. Specifically, why were the annuity receivables forgiven in 2013? Why were loans not made? The Court has come to an answer—albeit one that shows further efforts to protect the offshore system and family members from creditor collection actions, as explained below.

Given that we know that nothing happened offshore unless Sam or Charles "wished" for it to happen, the Court reasonably infers that Sam "wished" that the letters proposing that the annuity obligations due to him be forgiven be sent to him. So, Sam "wished" for the offers to forgive the annuity receivables to be sent to him and he then accepted the offers he caused to be made. But, why did Sam "wish" for these letters to be sent to him in May and October of 2013? The answer is obvious if you think about it—even briefly. Trial in the SEC Action commenced on March 31, 2014,[506] which date had been known by the parties from at least July 23, 2013.[507] Sam was "cleaning up" the offshore system just in case the SEC prevailed in its claims against him there. If the SEC obtained a judgment against Sam and he had annuity receivables owing to him, the SEC could attempt to collect those receivables in order to collect on its judgment. That could trigger the possible unraveling of other offshore transactions and entities that Sam "wished" to avoid. How do you avoid this possibility? Simple, forgive the annuity receivable and liquidate the IOM obligor, which is what the Court reasonably infers Sam directed be done here. Thus, by the time any judgment was entered against him, there was no annuity receivable to collect and no entity to collect it from.

Moreover, and as noted previously, other IOM corporations could not fulfill their annuity obligations to Sam by the time Sam filed his Case here in October 2014. Specifically, Audubon Asset Limited (IOM) owed him $43,085,167, Moberly Limited (IOM) owed him $16,519,813, Yurta Faf Limited (IOM) owed him $1,007,096, and Locke Limited (IOM) owed him $9,932,801 in annuity payments.[508] According to Sam's testimony at trial, no payment is realistically expected from any of these IOM corporations.[509] Moberly Limited (IOM) is unable to make annuity payments 435 to Sam[510] because it loaned its money to Greenbriar Limited (IOM) and no payments are due from Greenbriar Limited (IOM) for years.[511] Audubon Asset Limited (IOM) is not in a position to make annuity payments to Sam[512] because its assets have been invested in illiquid assets like art or its indirect interest in real estate in Texas and/or Colorado[513] being enjoyed by a Wyly family member(s). Locke Limited (IOM) is illiquid due to $11 million in loans it made to other IOM entities that remained outstanding as of 2013,[514] while its annuity liability to Sam was valued at $59,183,748.[515]

And, once again, the only credible inference to make from the evidentiary record is that Sam "wished" for (i) Moberly Limited (IOM) to loan money to Greenbriar Limited (IOM) and he dictated the terms of that loan, (ii) the assets that Audubon Asset Limited (IOM) purchased to be purchased, and (iii) the loans that Locke Limited (IOM) made to be made. And, equally clear is that if Sam "wished" for assets to be sold so that his annuity payments could be made, that would happen too. But, Sam does not "wish" for that to happen because that might require a Wyly family member to give up their use and enjoyment of a house, a piece of art, jewelry, or other items of property and, of course, would cause him to pay tax on the annuity payment he then received, while the net receivable after tax would be available to pay to his creditors with allowed claims here. From Sam's perspective, it is much better to have uncollectable annuity receivables and leave the bulk of the IOM structure in place offshore, which makes it much more difficult for his creditors with allowed claims here to collect on those claims.

In total, Sam has forgiven $60,972,221 in annuity obligations, and will not collect another $70,544,877 in annuity obligations—all because Sam "wished" for that 436 to be the outcome. But we get a bit ahead of ourselves in the timeline, to which we return.

It is clear from the evidence that there were concerns about the commencement of annuity payments and the effect of reporting those payments as income on Sam's and Charles' tax returns. And, while the record supports an inference that these concerns had existed for some time, they are captured in a memorandum dated June 30, 2003 from Hennington and Boucher to Sam, Charles, Evan, and Donnie Miller.[516] To put the timing in perspective, this memorandum is prepared after Hennington and Boucher have met with Lubar in London to discuss his concerns with the Wyly offshore system, most of which concerns were communicated to French in 1993 as discussed supra at pp. 371–74. The memorandum starts with a background section as follows:[517]

> As you are aware, we have been planning for some time for the commencement of the annuity payments. As we have studied the impact of these payments we have become increasingly concerned with the logistical problems of paying the annuities. Our concerns include the following:
> 1. When the payments are reported on your 1040, they will be on a separate line on page one for annuity payments. It is almost certain given the large amount of these payments that the reporting will result in an IRS audit. There is also a high likelihood that as a result of this audit the entire structure of the foreign system will be audited by the IRS.
> 2. As the annuities pay over your lifetime you will pay 35% ordinary tax on all payments. In addition, whatever is not consumed in living expenses will be included in your estate and taxed at up to 55%. See the attached spreadsheet detailing the impact of these taxes.
>
> 3. The annuity payments will bankrupt several of the I0M companies, which could bring the validity of the annuity transaction into question.
> 4. After a few years of payments, the companies will be left with non-liquid assets, which will result in payments being made in-kind. This is mostly the case with real estate, Green Mountain and First Dallas, which cannot be easily liquidated to make payments. It could also be the case with assets that could be negatively impacted by a liquidation like Michaels, Maverick, or Ranger.

> 5. The possibility of an in-kind payment raises a few issues. First, the value of the property will be taxed at 40% with no resulting cash to pay the tax. Secondly, the acceptance of property in-kind may also call into question the validity of the transaction and the 'arms-length' nature of the transaction. The annuities are structured as retirement annuities and most annuitants would not deem non-liquid assets acceptable payment.

From these statements and others made in the June 30, 2003 memorandum, the Court makes several inferences of significance. First, these statements shed light on why Sam and Charles decided to defer receipt of the annuity payments in the first place. Sam and Charles knew that given the amount of the required annuity payments, the reporting of them as income to them on their tax returns would "almost certain[ly]" trigger an IRS audit, something that they had expended great effort (and committed securities fraud) to avoid from the outset.

437 Second, supporting the Wyly family's lifestyle had left the IOM corporations with the annuity obligations without the financial ability to make their required payments. Additional explanation is required. The principal means Sam and Charles used to move money from the IOM corporations was through Security Capital, Ltd. ("Security Capital"). Security Capital, a Cayman Island corporation formed in August 1998, is wholly owned by Security Capital Trust, whose grantor and trustee was Queensgate Bank & Trust.[518] As explained herein, Security Capital was a conduit entity that would receive offshore funds from various Wyly IOM corporations and then loan those funds to Sam, Charles, and/or Wyly-related businesses in order to domesticate the offshore funds.[519] In fact, Boucher testified that Security Capital was created to act as a loan company.[520] As Sam or Charles "wished" loans to be made, money was loaned from IOM corporations, including Richland Limited (IOM), Morehouse Limited (IOM), East Carroll Limited (IOM), Locke Limited (IOM), and Greenbriar Limited (IOM), among others, to Security Capital, which would then loan substantially similar amounts to Sam, Charles, or a Wyly-related onshore entity.[521] In fact, Boucher could not recall Security Capital ever making a loan that wasn't to a Wyly family member or a Wyly-related entity.[522]

Indeed, the record is replete with evidence that money was moved from one IOM corporation to another at the whim of the Wylys for a variety of purposes including (i) enabling Security Capital to loan funds to Sam, Charles, and Wyly-related entities,[523] (ii) making funding available for 438 real estate, art, jewelry and other personal property purchases already discussed,[524] and (iii) making investments in other Wyly-related business ventures.[525] This memorandum itself makes this point clearly when it says "[b]ased on current and projected cash flow analysis, there is a need to bring a substantial value of assets onshore to provide for general expenses and maintenance of the family's lifestyle and domestic business ventures."[526]

Finally, the fact that the IOM corporations will become unable to make the payments at all, or will be left with illiquid assets, which will result in in-kind payments being made, will call into question the validity of the annuity transactions and the arms-length nature of those transactions. It goes without saying that getting the wealth associated with the options and warrants, which underlie the annuity transactions, offshore was the primary purpose for establishing the IOM trusts in the first place. Thus, the inability to make annuity payments when due puts the entire system at risk and jeopardizes the enormous tax savings realized through the implementation of the offshore structure.

While these inferences are strongly supported by the record (by clear and convincing evidence), another that the IRS asks this Court to make is not. The IRS argues that the record supports an inference that Sam and Charles never intended to have the offshore corporations obligated on the private annuity contracts make payments to Sam, Dee, and Charles as contractually obligated to do. The Court cannot make that leap, as it stretches the record too far. While there is some evidence to support the IRS' argument at least as of 1996,[527] the Court is not convinced—certainly not by the evidentiary standard of proof required here (clear and convincing evidence)—that Sam and Charles entered into the annuity transactions intending, from the outset, that the annuities would not be paid. And, while the document the IRS points to for its argument could be read as the IRS asks the Court to read it, that is not the only credible reading. Specifically, the IRS points to its Exhibit 93, which is an analysis of the Wyly Offshore Tax Savings (By Year and Since Inception), and which has two lines of particular importance to the IRS' argument here. The first line is the 439 Annuity Payable (Potential add back).[528] The second line is the Equity Valuation (Potential if annuity not paid) line. According to the IRS, by calculating the tax savings if the annuity is not paid, the Wylys are admitting that they did not intend to have the annuities paid to them. However, another equally plausible reading of this document is, as the Debtors' argue, simply that the Chief Financial Officer of Highland Stargate was calculating what would happen if the annuities were not paid for whatever reason, for example if they were terminated by Sam's or Charles' death. And, of course, we know that Charles' annuities terminated upon his death in 2011, which is at least part of the reason that he has received less in annuity payments than has Sam.

Moreover, the Wylys in fact received annuity payments and paid tax on these payments. While the Court is not convinced that Sam and Charles intended from the outset that the annuities never pay out (such that there would never be any income received onshore that would be taxed to them as ordinary income), the Court is satisfied that along the way they had a better idea that was facilitated by their "creative" lawyers—i.e., if they could get the money onshore to support their families' lifestyles through loans to themselves and other family members, direct purchases of assets by IOM entities for the family members' use and enjoyment, or indirect transfers of offshore funds through a myriad of onshore management trusts and limited liability companies or limited partnerships (and do it tax free if Owens was correct), they simply didn't need to bring the money onshore through the mechanism originally intended—i.e., the annuity payments, which everyone agreed would be taxable to them at ordinary income rates.

The Court asked a question in closing that is of significance to it in evaluating this badge of fraud, which question could not be, or was not, answered by Debtors' counsel—where is the money that should have been available offshore to make the annuity payments to Sam when they came due? If there was a legitimate explanation —frankly, even a bad explanation—for where the money went the Court wanted to hear it. But, when questioned, the Debtors' various counsel could only state that they were not aware of any evidence in the record showing where the money went. [529]

In the absence of direct evidence tracing [530] the monies realized from the sale of the stock received through the exercise of the options and warrants offshore, which was the money that was supposed to be available to make annuity payments to the Wylys when they came due, to investments that simply didn't pan out or some other even unreasonable explanation of bad money management by the IOM trustees that controlled the IOM corporations that owed the annuity obligations, the Court will draw the inferences it believes the record amply supports—by clear and convincing evidence. In short, the Wylys raided the offshore system, causing money to be moved from offshore entity to offshore entity where it was "needed" at the time to finance the latest Wyly purchase or domestic business venture, as directed by Sam through making his every "wish" 440 known to the IOM trustees who allegedly controlled the IOM entities—at least on paper. This badge of fraud—the planed insolvency of the IOM corporations that owed annuity obligations—is established as to Sam, by clear and convincing evidence, from 1996 through 2013.

However, there is simply insufficient evidence in the record to support the application of this badge of fraud to Dee. Although a document was admitted at trial that indicates that Dee forgave an annuity obligation owed to her through Stargate Investments (Texas), for the reasons explained below, the Court concludes that there is no evidence in the record that supports a finding that Dee understood the import of this document. Thus, this badge of fraud does not apply to Dee.

For context, the Court notes that Dee's receipt of annuity payments works differently than Sam's. Recall that Dee and Charles assigned all of their rights to receive annuity payments from the various IOM corporations that were a part of Charles' offshore system to Stargate Investments (Texas). [531] Charles and Dee each own half of Stargate Investments (Texas) through their respective Revocable Trusts. [532] Thus, Dee receives half of all annuity payments made to Stargate Investments (Texas). [533]

One of the private annuity agreements assigned to Stargate Investments (Texas) was between Dee and Rugosa Limited (IOM). [534] Prior to Dee's assignment of this private annuity agreement to Stargate Investments (Texas), Rugosa Limited (IOM) was required to make annuity payments to Dee from age 65 until her death. [535] Acting on behalf of Stargate Investments (Texas), in 2011 Dee accepted a proposal to settle the amounts owing on this private annuity agreement because Rugosa Limited (IOM) became insolvent. Specifically, IRS Exhibit 401 is a draft document titled "RUGOSA LIMITED SCHEME OF ARRANGEMENT between the Company and its Creditors" ("Scheme of Arrangement") with the phrase "DRAFT—27 September 2011" crossed out at the top. [536] The Scheme of Arrangement is signed by Dee as the general partner of Stargate Investments (Texas). [537] The Scheme of Arrangement states that Rugosa Limited (IOM) is insolvent and that "the Company also has an ongoing liability to Stargate [Investments (Texas)] to pay to it an annuity calculated in accordance with detailed provisions contained in the Stargate Annuity; this annuity is payable for so long as Ms [sic] Caroline D Wyly shall remain alive." [538] The Scheme 441 of Arrangement values Dee's right to receive future payments at $8,988,971 and her past due payments at $5,067,119, [539] and proposes that Rugosa Limited (IOM) will pay all of its creditors "approximately thirty-nine per cent of the debts owed to each Creditor by the Company; payment of sums due under the Scheme will be in full and final settlement of each Creditor's Claim." [540] Thereafter, Rugosa Limited (IOM) made an annuity payment of $5,538,594 to Stargate Investments (Texas), [541] which was slightly over 39 percent of the total value of Dee's past due and future annuity payments as listed in the Scheme of Arrangement. [542]

There is little evidence in the record regarding the Scheme of Arrangement other than: (i) it exists, and (ii) Dee signed it. While Dee testified that her signature appears on the document, she also credibly testified that she had no knowledge of the information that was referenced in it. [543] Beyond asking Dee whether the signature on the Scheme of Arrangement was hers—it is—and whether she had any knowledge of the statements contained within it—she did not—the IRS asked Dee no further questions about the Scheme of Arrangement. [544] Based on the limited evidence in the record regarding the Scheme of Arrangement and Dee's uncontroverted testimony at other points during trial, the Court infers that the Scheme of Arrangement was simply one more document that Dee had placed in front of her by people she trusted, and she signed this document without question.

In order for the Court to conclude that this badge of fraud applies to Dee, the Court would have to conclude that Dee understood the effect of the Scheme of Arrangement. Based on Dee's uncontroverted testimony during trial that she had no involvement in the family's financial affairs and no understanding of the offshore system, the Court cannot so conclude. For these reasons, this badge of fraud does not apply to Dee. [545]

g) Understatement of Income

As reflected in the Computation Stipulations, Sam understated his income in the following tax years: 1992 through 2003, 2005 through 2006, 2010. [546] Similarly, Charles and Dee or Dee understated their or her income in the following tax years: 1992, 1994 through 2003, 2006, 2008, 2011, 2013. [547]

Accordingly, this badge of fraud is present for the listed years, unless it requires some sort of intentional for deliberate conduct, to which we now turn. For the reasons explained below, the Court concludes 442 that while an understatement of income that is not intentional has little weight as a badge of fraud, Sam engaged in an intentional understatement of income from 1999 forward due to his deferral, forgiveness, and non-receipt of annuity payments. [548] This badge of fraud does not apply to Dee because any understatement of income by her was not intentional.

Sam argues that, "to constitute a badge of fraud, underpayment of income must be knowing or deliberate." [549] It is true that when listing the classic badges of fraud, the Fifth Circuit has indicated that "[i]ntentional understatement of income, substantial in amount per se or substantial in relation to the total reported income" is a badge of fraud. [550] However, other courts listing badges of fraud have dropped this "intentional" qualifier, indicating that a mere understatement of income can constitute a badge of fraud. [551] Thus, there are authorities that cut both for and against Sam's argument that only an intentional understatement of income can be a badge of fraud.

Common sense concerns also cut both ways on this issue. On the one hand, underpayment of tax—which necessarily comes about by way of understatement of income or overstatement of deductions—is itself an element of civil tax fraud under 26 U.S.C. § 6663. [552] Therefore, in a case where fraud penalties are applicable, there will almost always be an understatement of income. Thus, unless understatement of income as a badge of fraud is always a given for the IRS in any case that does not involve overstated deductions, then it seems that the mere fact that an understatement of income exists should not be a badge of fraud, and some kind of intent should be required.

On the other hand, there are also problems with stating that understatement of income must be intentional in order to constitute a badge of fraud. At least one court has pointed out that if it is shown that a taxpayer intentionally understated income, that this is not just a badge of fraud, it is direct proof that fraud has occurred. [553] Indeed, civil tax fraud is defined as an underpayment of tax with the specific purpose to evade a tax known or believed to be owing. [554] If the IRS in fact shows that a taxpayer has intentionally understated his or her income, then it seems that the fraud inquiry could end 443 there. Resort to the badges of fraud as circumstantial evidence that fraud occurred is no longer necessary, because there is now direct evidence that fraud occurred.

However, before we agonize too much over these apparent inconsistencies, we must stress two things. First, the Supreme Court has noted that "any conduct, the likely effect of which would be to mislead or to conceal" can indicate tax fraud.[555] Thus, the phrasing that courts choose to employ when enumerating their lists of badges of fraud may be more of a product of the particular cases at hand than any hard and fast rule regarding understatement of income. Second, because this Court is bound by Fifth Circuit precedent, it will follow Webb and require the understatement of income here to be intentional.[556]

Sam engaged in intentional understatement of income of a certain, albeit subtle, kind. Although Sam did not do something as simple as omit wages from his return or neglect to report a realized capital gain, he did engage in a subtler form of intentional understatement of income when he deferred and eventually forgave annuity payments contractually due to him from IOM corporations that should have been paid to him. Moreover, Sam's income was intentionally understated when he manipulated the assets of other of the IOM corporations that owe annuity obligations to him such that those obligations are now uncollectible.

At trial, Sam testified that it was his understanding that annuity payments he received from the complicated annuity transactions he entered into in 1992 and 1996 involving the transfer of the options and warrants offshore would be taxed as ordinary income to him when he actually received those annuity payments from the IOM corporation that had received the options and warrants in exchange for issuing an annuity payable to him:[557]

> Q. (By Mr. Daniel) Mr. Wyly, how did you understand that taxes will be paid on the assets that were placed into the trust?
> A. [By Sam] That taxes would be paid when they were paid back a—in cash to—on the annuity I received or any other distribution ...

And, despite Sam's argument that the annuity transactions were done to simply defer taxes upon the exercise of the options and warrants transferred offshore, not avoid the payment of taxes, Sam then took actions that insured that those taxes would never be paid.

444 As found previously, Sam caused several of the IOM corporations that owe annuity obligations to him to become insolvent by manipulating how their assets were used by him and other members of his family.[558] While the IOM corporations owing annuity obligations to Sam were provided stock options worth at least the value of the annuities they issued to Sam, after supporting Sam's extended families' lifestyles, several of those IOM corporations are no longer able to make their contractually required annuity payments to Sam, as their assets were dissipated consistent with Sam's "wishes."

So, where did the cash these IOM corporations realized upon the exercise of the options and the sale of the associated stock go? The short answer is it went wherever Sam "wished" it to go. And, as previously found, Sam "wished" for it to be used to purchase, among other things, (i) domestic real estate on which homes for Wyly family members were built in Texas and Colorado (also using offshore monies), (ii) two floors of the Paragon building in Aspen, which provided Sam's daughter Kelly with space for her art gallery, a condominium and an office, and (iii) art, jewelry, and other items of personal property, which various members of Sam's family keep in their homes and continue to use and enjoy today.[559] All of these purchases were made with offshore funds using structures Sam allegedly believed prevented them from being taxed as gifts or other distributions from offshore.[560] And, to be sure, Sam "wished" for each of these expenditures of offshore funds to be made, which expenditures, along with other uses of the funds that Sam "wished" to occur, drained certain of the annuity obligors' assets such that they were no longer able to make their contractually required annuity payments to Sam.

By manipulating the IOM corporations and their assets in this way, Sam intentionally insured that the annuity payments he was due could not be paid to him, thus enabling him to escape his obligation to pay tax on the annuity income he was contractually entitled to receive. And, instead of liquidating assets or otherwise ceasing his families' extravagant expenditures, Sam deferred all annuity payments due to him for five years.[561] Then, once the deferred payment date was reached, Sam began accepting less than full annuity payments from certain of those corporations whose monies had been used for other purposes.[562] Ultimately, Sam chose 445 to forgive certain of the annuity obligations due to him totaling

$60,972,221.[563] And, as Sam admitted at trial, another $70,544,877 in annuity obligations due to him from certain IOM corporations that received valuable options and warrants in exchange for its annuity obligation to him are now uncollectible.[564]

As previously found, all of this happened because Sam "wished" for that to be the outcome here.[565] In this way, Sam insured that he did not pay the taxes he was obligated to pay. Sam deferred the commencement date of his annuity payments in 1998[566] knowing that his receipt of large annuity payments would likely trigger an IRS audit, thereby exposing the extent of his offshore system.[567] While the private annuity agreement amendments recite that Sam deferred the annuities because he wasn't ready to retire at age 65 or 68,[568] inferring that Sam did not yet need the annuity income, that testimony rings hollow given that Sam began borrowing money from offshore through Security Capital in 2002 on sweetheart terms.[569] And, of course, we know that Security Capital had no money of its own to loan to Sam; rather, it borrowed the money it loaned to Sam from one or more of the IOM corporations that form a part of Sam's offshore system. We also know that Sam would not pay income tax on loan proceeds—i.e., the money he borrowed from offshore to support his families' lifestyle, but that he would have paid tax on any annuity income he received from offshore. Finally, we 446 know that Sam began using the offshore funds to support extravagant purchases of real estate for the benefit of himself and his family members beginning in late 1999 and continuing into early 2001.[570]

Because Sam deferred his annuity payments in 1998 as part of a scheme to keep the extent of his offshore system secret from the IRS and then began to excessively manipulate how funds within the offshore system were used by at least 1999,[571] the Court concludes that this badge of fraud is present as to Sam beginning in 1999 through 2013, the last year at issue in the Motions and Claim Objections.

Dee's situation is different. While Charles' and Dee's annuity payments were also deferred,[572] it is clear that Dee was not the person who chose to defer their receipt of annuity payments. This is because Dee relied completely on Charles regarding all business, legal, and tax matters.[573] On this record, the Court doubts that Dee understood that deferrals of annuity payments occurred or the significance of those deferrals.[574] Furthermore, there is no evidence in the record that annuity payments due to Dee will not be able to be made per the annuity agreements. For these reasons, this badge of fraud does not apply to Dee.

h) Concealment of Income or Assets

It is obvious from the facts already found that the Wylys went to considerable effort to conceal the extent of their offshore assets and activities. There is little to be gained here by repeating this analysis 447 except to say that the IRS has established this badge of fraud—by clear and convincing evidence—as to Sam from 1992 to through 2013. However, once again, there is insufficient evidence in the record to support such a finding as to Dee.

i) Offering False or Incredible Testimony

Sam was not a great witness at trial. His memory was vastly superior on direct examination than it was on cross-examination. He easily remembered events dating back to his childhood in Louisiana; his college years and professors who made an impact on him there; the progression of his wide-ranging business ventures; to concerns over the domestic banking industry in the 1980s, and on and on through events to the present day. However, on cross-examination, his memory seemed to fail him and he was impeached regularly with either the deposition testimony he gave in connection with the Motions, the testimony he gave during trial of the SEC Action, or documentary evidence.[575]

And, while the Court appreciates that Sam is 81 and suffers from some health issues, the Court accommodated those issues by scheduling Sam's testimony early each day as his counsel requested in two hour or less increments, which meant Sam's testimony occurred over nine trial days. Moreover, breaks were taken any time Sam's counsel or he requested one. And, of course, neither Sam's age nor his health issues explains the obvious disparity between his ability to recall facts on direct as opposed to cross-examination.

That Sam was an uncooperative witness on cross-examination by the IRS was obvious. That he had to be impeached frequently to get him to admit to fairly obvious facts is equally clear. In fact, given the difficulty in getting Sam to admit facts that were obviously true, the Court encouraged his counsel to offer to stipulate to those facts when Sam was asked a question that he was struggling to crisply answer, assuming it wasn't more prejudicial to Sam's case to do so than a patient and tedious cross-examination followed finally by a grudging admission from Sam would be. However, that rarely happened and so a slow and tedious cross-examination of Sam continued for days, with Sam regularly 448 being impeached by either documentary evidence or his own prior testimony, resulting in what should have been an easy answer finally being given.

Sam's obvious reluctance to answer questions asked of him directly reflects poorly on him. As a result, the Court does not have confidence that it can rely on Sam's testimony to accurately reflect what really transpired here, absent other, disinterested evidence corroborating his testimony.

Attempting to apply this badge of fraud on a year-by-year basis is problematic, as it is less susceptible to that type of breakdown than most of the other badges of fraud.[576] Rather, the presence of this badge of fraud casts a shadow over a taxpayer's entire course of conduct. This is understandable because, in most instances, the taxpayer offers false or incredible testimony after the fact—often at trial or during an IRS examination—rather than during a specific year in which it is alleged that fraud has occurred.

The Fifth Circuit grappled with these principles in Toussaint v. C.I.R.,[577] where a taxpayer made a truly incredible claim—that his grandfather, an admittedly poor man, had given him a Picasso painting worth $190,000, which he failed to register or insure and simply stored in his closet for years. After the painting was stolen, Toussaint filed a police report in which he claimed that three items were stolen: one car battery, one brown business suit and the Picasso. Toussaint carried a casualty loss deduction related to the supposed theft of the Picasso back and forward on his tax returns, resulting in deficiencies for years 1971 through 1975.[578] The IRS disagreed with these deductions. At trial before the tax court, Toussaint testified that not one but several suits were stolen (he did not know how many nor could he describe any of them—even the "brown" one) and that not one but several car batteries were stolen. He could not explain why he failed to report these additional items as stolen to the police. Moreover, to the police, Toussaint described the Picasso painting as depicting a boat on an island but he could give no further details. Before the tax court, Toussaint testified that the painting actually depicted "a woman" from about the waist up. Possibly, he said, there was a small boat in one corner of the painting. Again, Toussaint could not explain the discrepancy in the two descriptions of the subject matter of the painting, nor could he describe the painting further.

In affirming the tax court's imposition of fraud penalties for all five of the years at issue there, the Fifth Circuit noted that "in an action for fraud, the honesty of the accused is not only important, it is controlling."[579] The Fifth Circuit affirmed based in part on the implausible and false nature of Toussaint's testimony, even going so far as to note that it most likely would have found clear error if the tax court had found that Toussaint had not committed tax fraud.[580] In assessing Toussaint's testimony as an indicator of fraud, the Fifth Circuit did not proceed on a year by year basis, but instead viewed the incredible nature of Toussaint's testimony as casting 449 a shadow over his conduct in all of the tax years at issue.[581] The Fifth Circuit did caution, however, note that "[a]lthough mere refusal to believe the taxpayer's testimony does not discharge the Commissioner's burden, the lack of credibility of the taxpayer's testimony, the inconsistencies in his testimony and his evasiveness on the stand are heavily weighted factors in considering the fraud issue."[582]

Similar to the Fifth Circuit in Toussaint, tax court judges have also looked to a taxpayer's false or incredible testimony[583] as indicative of fraud generally as opposed to applying it on a year-by-year basis. This approach makes sense here. Thus, this badge of fraud is found as to Sam for 1992 through 2013.

Conversely, while Dee is uninformed on a wide range of business issues and activities, she was credible. The Court is convinced that she testified truthfully; and thus, this badge of fraud does not apply to Dee.

j) Offering Implausible or Inconsistent Explanations of Behavior

It is hard to believe that Sam didn't know what French was up to on his behalf—both when French (i) received a second opinion from Lubar in 1993 due to French's lingering concerns about the proper legal characterization of the Bulldog IOM Trust and the resulting tax treatment to the Wylys of the 1992 annuity transactions, and (ii) created false documents to "paper" the 1994 and 1995 IOM trusts in such a way that those trusts would "fit" the mold for foreign grantor trusts of a non-resident alien in order that the Wylys, as beneficiaries of those trusts, could obtain favorable tax treatment for transactions undertaken through them.[584] That Sam would not know of French's concerns and actions seems inconsistent with what the Court has learned about him here.

While Sam may be an "idea guy" who hires the best and the brightest to run his ventures or otherwise work for him because they know more about the business or their work than he does, as he described himself and as others described him, it is abundantly clear that Sam does not suffer fools gladly. Sam is obviously a very smart man, who is incredibly savvy in the business world and who expects to be kept informed and for things to happen as he directs. You don't amass the kind of wealth that he was able to amass unless you are smart, savvy, prepared to take risks and cut loose dead weight. That he had no idea what French was doing, or that there were problems associated with the offshore system that was put in place at his direction, is highly unlikely if not unthinkable.

450 A businessman as savvy and sophisticated as Sam could not truly believe that it was appropriate for him to do what he did here. Put hundreds of millions of dollars of value offshore in exchange for unsecured annuity obligations from newly-formed domestic and IOM corporations that owned no assets other than the stocks and warrants that he assigned or sold to them. And then, after those options and warrants are exercised by the IOM corporations and the stocks are sold, thereby generating hundreds of millions of dollars of cash in the corporations owing him the annuity obligations, Sam manipulated the corporations in such a way that the obligations owing to him cannot now be paid. However, his lifestyle and the lifestyle of his loved ones have not suffered. In fact, the Wyly family lifestyles have prospered through the enormous wealth that his offshore-directed activities have permitted him to accumulate tax-free.[585] As the SDNY Court found, and was independently established here,[586]

> [r]easonable and savvy businessmen do not engage in such activity unless it is profitable. Of course it was profitable—by transferring property, including valuable options and warrants, to the trusts, by exercising the options and trading in secret, and using the proceeds to reinvest in other ventures, the Wylys were able to accumulate tremendous tax-free wealth.

It is abundantly clear here that the IOM trustees chosen by Sam (and Charles) did not have an original thought or idea for the last 25 years. Or, if they had had one (and Sam or Charles didn't like it), they were bullied into acquiescing to a Wyly "wish" under threat of being fired ("removed" in trust speak) if they didn't go 451 along.[587] In short, all original thoughts and ideas came from Sam, Charles, another family member, or one of their "trusted" or "creative" advisors. But, rest assured, Sam and/or Charles blessed each and every idea. The record is clear—nothing happened offshore without Sam's or Charles' express approval, all under the guise of expressing their demands or directions as "wishes." In short, money moved or didn't move within the offshore system as Sam and/or Charles, and no one else, "wished." For example, when Laurie wanted to know if she could use the structure that she and two of her sisters had used in Colorado for the homes they use and enjoy there,[588] she did not go to the trustee of the Bessie IOM Trust to ask permission to use that same structure in Dallas for the home she and her husband have lived in for the last fourteen or so years (rent free), she went to her dad—Sam. And, with his blessing, it happened, as did the overwhelming majority of the funding for the design and building of the home.[589] Although the record does not divulge exactly how much in offshore funds were used to build the Mi Casa home, financial statements appear to value the home at a book value of $3,215,000 as of November 30, 2015.[590] All without a whimper from the trustee of the Bessie IOM Trust.

This badge of fraud has been established by clear and convincing evidence as to Sam from the outset of the offshore system in 1992 through 2013.[591]

As it relates to Dee, the IRS asks this Court to conclude that Dee's story is equally incredible—but for different reasons. The IRS says she had to have known about what was going on here because, among other things, she: (i) signed some of the documents concerning the offshore system, (ii) signed and filed false and fraudulent tax returns, and (iii) she learned of the Senate investigation of her family's offshore system but did nothing thereafter. According to the IRS' theory, once Dee learned of the Senate investigation, she should have asked Charles tough questions and when she wasn't satisfied, she should have hired independent counsel to advise her with regard to the offshore system and what she needed to do. The Court has several problems with this argument.

First, the IRS asks too much of Dee under the facts and circumstances here. While it is admittedly surprising that after learning of the Senate investigation of her 452 family she didn't speak to Charles about it, there is no evidence in the record to the contrary. And, after listening carefully to her testimony and observing her demeanor, the Court is convinced that she was being truthful and candid. That she didn't participate in business affairs is clear; that she doesn't understand her financial circumstances—now or then—is clear. Charles took care of her and the family financially and she took care of the children and the home. Even after his death in 2011, Dee has not had to grapple with learning about business issues, leaving those issues to her son-in-law and executor of Charles' probate estate, Donnie Miller, and Hennington, the CFO of the Wyly family office. The Court is satisfied that Dee is a genuinely nice person who was largely oblivious to both the facts of the offshore system and its expected tax advantages, the controversy surrounding it, and the securities fraud that occurred to try to protect it. That she may be unsophisticated in financial matters or a beneficiary of the family wealth does not make her story incredible.

Second, the IRS assumes that had she consulted independent counsel that counsel would have given her different advice from that Sam and Charles received in 2003 from Meadows Owens regarding the filing of the Form 8275 disclosures with their tax returns. While it is certainly possible that she would have gotten different advice, that conclusion is pure speculation on this record.

Third, the IRS audit of the offshore system was already underway by the time Dee learned of the Senate investigation. It would not be unreasonable for Dee (or her separate counsel) to conclude that the issues would get resolved there in a reasonable period of time, even assuming Dee was aware of the audit.

Finally, given what the Court has learned about Dee and Charles' marriage, the Court can infer what would have happened, in all likelihood, if Dee had done as the IRS suggests. She grills Charles, which would have, again in all likelihood, resulted in him simply reassuring her that all was fine—Sam and he had consulted various professionals throughout the time the offshore system was in existence and had been assured that it was legal. By now it is 2005, Dee is about 72 and has been a homemaker for about 50 years during which she knew virtually nothing about the offshore system or Charles' business affairs. Really —at this point she should have hired her own lawyer to investigate what her husband of 50 years assured her had been amply investigated and was fine? To be honest, that seems the more implausible of the behavior options under the circumstances here.

After carefully considering the evidence, the IRS has failed in its proof of this badge of fraud as to Dee.

k) Filing False Documents.

So, what documents does the IRS claim were false or misleading when filed with it by the Wylys? The IRS argues that: (i) the manner in which the Debtors reported the annuity payments they received from the offshore system on their tax returns was false and misleading, (ii) the Forms 3520 and 3520–A[592] that the Debtors did file were false and misleading, particularly in light of the Forms 3520 and 3520–A that should have been filed and were not, and (iii) the Debtors' tax returns were false and misleading because they (a) underreported their income from offshore, and (b) 453 chose to check “no” in response to the Form 1040 question “[d]uring [relevant year], did you receive a distribution from, or were you the grantor of, or transferor to, a foreign trust?”[593] Each is addressed below.

Throughout trial, the IRS argued that the manner in which the Debtors reported annuity income from the offshore system was misleading. Instead of reporting annuity income on the face of their tax returns on line 16a, which is labeled "Pensions and annuities," [594] the Debtors reported their annuity income from the offshore system on Schedule C, and labeled this income simply as "ANNUITIES." [595] The IRS contrasted the way this offshore annuity income was reported and the way other annuity income Sam received domestically was reported. Unlike the IOM annuity payments, a domestic annuity payment Sam received was reported as income on line 16a of his tax return, and included the name of the entity making the payment to him. [596] In contrast, when Sam reported his offshore annuity income on Schedule C, the name of the IOM corporation(s) making the payment(s) to him was not included. [597]

At trial, a revenue agent involved with the Wylys' audit, Charles Herrick ("Herrick") testified that this manner of reporting is unusual—i.e., "annuity income is generally reported on Line 1 or on the face of the return. Here it was on a Schedule C, which is unusual." [598] Herrick also testified that the way in which Sam, Charles, and Dee reported their offshore annuity income caused some confusion during the audit and caused the IRS to be uncertain whether the annuity income was actually reported by them on their tax returns. [599]

In contrast, Hennington explained why Sam, Charles, and Dee reported offshore annuity income in the way that they did. Specifically, she testified that the offshore 454 annuities were reported on Schedule C because these annuity payments needed to be subject to self-employment tax. [600] According to Hennington, reporting the offshore annuity income on line 16a would have led to the Wyly family office's tax software calculating a tax amount that was too low. [601] Hennington also testified that domestic annuity payments were reported with the name of the entity making the annuity payment included because "there would have been a 1099 that needed to be matched" against it by the IRS. [602]

In its Amended Proposed Findings of Facts and Conclusions of Law, the IRS argues that this characterization of the offshore annuity payments as self-employment income is specious, because there was no nexus between the income received and the trade or business operated by Sam and Charles. [603] However, Hennington testified that she understood that because the stock options transferred in exchange for the offshore annuity obligations had been received by Sam and Charles as compensation, the required nexus for the payments to be subject to self-employment tax exists. [604] Moreover, Hennington did not come up with this reporting position herself; she testified that Pulman, a tax lawyer at Meadows Owens, and French advised her that the Wyly offshore annuity income was subject to self-employment tax. [605]

[38] [39] Hennington's explanation that the offshore annuity income was subject to self-employment tax is not unreasonable. 26 U.S.C. § 1402 defines "net earnings from self-employment" as "the gross income derived by an individual from any trade or business carried on by such individual" less any applicable deductions. [606] According to the Fifth Circuit, "[t]he common-law determines whether a taxpayer is self-employed...." [607] In its Amended Proposed Findings of Facts and Conclusions of Law, the IRS cites a number of cases for the proposition that "in order to be classified as net earnings from self-employment under 26 U.S.C.S. § 1402(b), there must be a nexus between the income received and the trade or business that was actually operated by a taxpayer." [608] These cases go on to say that "[t]he income must arise from some actual (whether present, past or future) income-producing activity" and that "self-employment income is determined by the source of the income, not the taxpayer's status at the time the income is realized." [609]

Although the Court does not here decide whether the Wylys' annuity payments 455 needed to be subject to self-employment tax, the Court notes that the Debtors' belief that such payments would be treated as self-employment earnings under the "nexus" test cited by the IRS makes sense. The IRS' own expert characterized the stock options that initially funded the offshore system as "compensatory stock options ... and that income, then, is basically considered wage income under the Internal Revenue Code." [610] This understanding comports with Hennington's understanding. From the Court's perspective, (i) Hennington provided a coherent explanation as to why the offshore annuity income was reported in the manner that it was, and (ii) although the IRS complains that the source of the annuity payments was not disclosed, the instructions to Form 1040 do not require that the source be identified and the IRS has not cited us to anything requiring the disclosure of the source.

The IRS also argues that the manner in which the Debtors went about reporting—or not reporting—their dealings with the offshore system on Forms 3520, 3520–A, and 5471 [611] was false and misleading. The Court notes that one of the largest portions of the IRS' claims against the Debtors consists of penalties for the Debtors' failures to file these forms. [612] The Debtors' failures to file these forms—when they were actually required to be filed [613] —can be properly considered as a part of the badge of fraud of filing false documents. This is because, as the Supreme Court has noted, "any conduct, the likely effect of which would be to mislead or conceal" can be weighed as a badge of fraud. [614] As found in other portions of this opinion, Sam and Charles attempted to structure, and in certain circumstances succeeded in structuring, their offshore transactions in such a way as to avoid reporting requirements that would reveal the true nature and extent of their offshore holdings. [615] But, even when required, the Wylys chose not to file those forms as part of their efforts to keep the extent of their offshore holdings secret from the IRS.

Moreover, the Forms 3520 and 3520–A that the Wylys did file were, in the context 456 of their overall offshore system, at least misleading. First, most of the forms that were filed related to entities that were not significant players in the Wyly offshore system—i.e., the forms were filed for entities that were not the entities through which the majority of the Wyly offshore transactions were conducted. [616] This, when considered in the context of the other similar forms that were required to be filed but were not, makes the filed forms misleading. Second, many of the forms that were introduced into evidence here were not signed and not dated, [617] signed but not dated, [618] or were completely missing their signature pages, [619] despite the fact that both Forms 3520 and 3520–A contain a signature and date line and are to be signed under penalty of perjury. [620] Finally, and oddly, two of the Forms 3520 that the parties stipulate that Sam filed for transactions that occurred during the 1992 tax year used versions of IRS forms that would not have been available until 1995, despite that fact that § 6048—in 1992, 1995, and currently—requires a Form 3520 to be filed on or before the ninetieth day after a reportable event. [621] Although Sam signed these two forms under penalty of perjury, they were not dated on the signature line. [622] Notably, while the Joint Stipulations indicate that those Forms 3520 and 3520–A that are in the record as Joint Exhibits 142 through 175 were filed with the IRS, there is no stipulation that they were timely filed. [623]

Although some required Forms 3520 and 3520–A were filed for trusts that had a 457 larger role in the Wyly offshore system, those forms by no means gave a complete picture of the operation of the trusts or the extent of their holdings. For example, Sam filed a Form 3520 for the Bulldog IOM Trust, which indicated that the trust had been created and that $100.00 of property was transferred into it. [624] Charles filed a similar, single Form 3520 for the Pitkin IOM Trust indicating that it had been settled with $100.00. [625] However, no annual Forms 3520–A were filed for either the Bulldog IOM Trust or the Pitkin IOM Trust, as was required since Sam was the owner of the Bulldog IOM Trust under the Grantor Trust Rules and Charles and Dee were the owners of the Pitkin IOM Trust under the Grantor Trust Rules. [626] The failure to file the Forms 3520–A makes the earlier filed forms misleading.

From the Court's perspective, the misleadingly incomplete picture the filed forms provide of the Wyly offshore system when you consider the other forms that were required to be filed, but were not, strongly suggest that Sam and Charles acted with fraudulent intent. [627]

Finally, the IRS argues that the Wylys' tax returns were false and misleading in two ways—i.e., by (i) underreporting their offshore income, and (ii) falsely answering a question on their tax returns. The Court agrees with the IRS with respect to (i) for all tax years in which there was unreported income and agrees with the IRS with respect to (ii), at least with respect to tax years 1992 through 2002 as to Sam and 1992 through 2003 as to Charles and Dee, as explained below.

It is certainly true that the Wylys' underreported their offshore income on their tax returns, as the parties stipulated in the Computation Stipulations. In that sense, 458 the IRS is obviously correct—the Wylys' tax returns for those years in which there was unreported income were false. As found previously, for Sam that is tax years 1992 through 2003, 2005 through 2006, and 2010; while for Dee that is tax years 1992, 1994 through 2003, 2006, 2008, 2011, and 2013.

Moreover, it is true that the Wylys' checked "no" in response to the Form 1040 question "[d]uring [relevant year], did you receive a distribution from, or were you the grantor of, or transferor to, a foreign trust?" from 1992 through 2013 as to Sam and from 1993 through 2013 as to Charles and/or Dee.[628] And, in that sense, the IRS is again obviously correct—the Wylys' tax returns for those years were false given the SDNY Court's determination in the SEC Action that certain of the IOM trusts were grantor trusts as to Sam and Charles, which determination we have given collateral estoppel effect to here.

But even without the SDNY Court's grantor trust determination, checking the "no" box was misleading on their tax returns once Sam and Charles were on notice of Lubar's advice that there was a significant risk that the 1992 IOM trusts were properly characterized as grantor trusts as to them. While their 1992 tax returns were filed before they were on notice of Lubar's advice, every other return they filed that checked "no" in response to the Form 1040 question "[d]uring [relevant year], did you receive a distribution from, or were you the grantor of, or transferor to, a foreign trust?," was filed with knowledge of the significant risk that they could be found to be the grantor of a foreign trust that existed during each year from 1993 through 2013.[629]

Equally, if not more, troubling is the fact that even when Sam and Charles knew they had established trusts in the IOM that they intended to be characterized as grantor trusts as to them—i.e., all of the trusts involved in the 1996 annuity transactions (Sitting Bull IOM Trust, Tallulah IOM Trust, Arlington IOM Trust, and Crazy Horse IOM Trust as to Sam and Maroon IOM Trust, Woody International IOM Trust, and Lincoln Creek IOM Trust as to Charles)—they still checked the box "no." Again, this made their tax returns false and misleading from 1992–1996, the years in which those trusts were in existence.

But, to be fair, for tax years 2002 through 2013, Sam attached Form 8275 disclosures to his filed tax returns.[630] Similarly, 459 for tax years 2003 through 2011, Charles and Dee attached Form 8275 disclosures to their filed tax returns.[631] According to the Debtors, the attachment of the Forms 8275 to their respective tax returns should cure the false and misleading problem created by their failure to check the correct box on their tax returns—at least in the years in which those forms were filed. The Court agrees, as explained below.

The Form 8275 disclosures were substantially identical for both Debtors. Beginning with Sam's 2002 tax return, the attached Form 8275 disclosure noted that he had created a trust in a foreign country and that—although he did not regard himself as the grantor of the trust —this conclusion might run counter to certain IRS regulations issued in 2000 under 26 U.S.C. § 679, as well as certain statutory provisions of 26 U.S.C. § 674.[632] The Form 8275 disclosure attached to Charles' and Dee's 2003 tax return was substantially identical to the Form 8275 disclosure attached to Sam's 2003 tax return and which contained essentially the same information as Sam had provided the prior year.[633] In tax year 2004, most of the previously disclosed information remained in the Form 8275 disclosure, along with certain additional information. Specifically, the Form 8275 disclosures attached to Sam's and Charles and Dee's 2004 respective tax returns included information that property had been transferred to subsidiaries of the foreign trusts in exchange for private annuities, and it was admitted that there were "one or more trusts."[634] However, while the Form 8275 disclosures attached to the 2002 and 2003 tax returns estimated the amount of income tax that Sam and Charles might owe if they were in fact grantors of the IOM trusts, Form 8275 disclosures for tax years 2004 and later omitted this information.[635] The Form 8275 disclosures attached to the Wylys' 2005 and later tax returns (i) admitted that there were multiple trusts, (ii) added that the trusts were created in the IOM, (iii) began differentiating between the 1992 trusts and the 1994/1995 trusts, and (iv) stated that there were funding issues regarding the 1994/1995 trusts that the taxpayers had discovered in 2006.[636] The Form 8275 disclosure attached to the Wylys' 2007 tax returns described the 1999 Options Sales, pursuant to which Sam and Charles each sold options to subsidiaries of IOM trusts for cash.[637] The Form 8275 460 disclosure Sam attached to his 2013 tax return added brief notes about how some of his views were in opposition the SDNY Court's grantor trust determination in the SEC Action.[638]

Since all that checking the box "yes" on the tax returns would have disclosed is that Sam or Charles and Dee were the grantor of a foreign trust or had transferred property to a foreign trust in a given year, and because the Form 8275 disclosures that the Wylys attached to their tax returns in the years identified above contained that basic information, the Court agrees with the Debtors that they cured their failure to check the correct box on their tax returns, at least from tax years 2002 through 2013 as to Sam and 2003 through 2011 as to Charles and Dee.

In summary and as it relates to Sam, after examining all of the documents that were filed with the IRS that the IRS labels as false or misleading, the Court concludes that (i) Sam's tax returns were false in the years in which he underreported income (1992–2003, 2005–2006, 2010) and in the years in which no Form 8275 disclosure was attached to his tax returns (1992–2001), and (ii) the Forms 3520 and 3520–A that he filed were false and misleading, particularly in light of the Forms 3520, 3520–A, and 5471 that should have been filed and were not (1992–2013), as the IRS was never provided with an accurate portrayal of Sam's offshore system until he was forced to disclose the extent of his offshore holdings during the IRS audit. Accordingly, this badge of fraud applies to Sam.

However, this badge of fraud does not apply to Dee, as the Court is satisfied that Dee (i) did not know that the tax returns and other forms she signed that were filed with the IRS were in any way false or misleading, and (ii) did not participate in any decision to attempt to keep the extent of the offshore holdings secret through less than complete and candid reporting.

l) Failure to Cooperate with Taxing Authorities.

The evidence here is conflicting. Certainly, the IRS has pointed to instances where incomplete information was provided to them in connection with an earlier, but unrelated, audit, or where inaccurate information was provided on a tax return. Overall, however, the Court is persuaded that at least as to the 2004 audit of the offshore system, the one truly relevant here, the Wylys have cooperated with the taxing authorities.

The IRS has not established this badge of fraud by clear and convincing evidence as to either Sam or Dee.

In conclusion, the IRS has established, by clear and convincing evidence, the following badges of fraud in the following years as to Sam:

Failure to Cooperate with Taxing Authorities

As the above summary demonstrates, there are numerous badges of fraud present as to Sam each year from 1992 through 2013. And, as noted previously, while the sheer number of badges is not determinative, the significance of the badges under the facts and circumstances here have convinced the Court that the IRS has carried its burden of proof regarding Sam's liability for fraud penalties under 26 U.S.C. § 6663 for each year from 1992 through 2013. However, as explained above, the IRS has not proven, by clear and convincing evidence, the existence of any badge of fraud as to Dee, which is obviously insufficient for it to carry its burden of proof as to Dee. But, the IRS has one final argument in its arsenal that it uses to attempt to prove Dee's intentional failure to pay taxes known or believed to be owing—i.e., the doctrine of willful blindness, to which we now turn.

C. Was Dee Willfully Blind?

[40] [41] It is undisputed that the doctrine of willful blindness arose in connection with a wide range of criminal statutes. However, in Global–Tech Appliances, Inc. v. SEB S.A.,[639] the Supreme Court concluded that the willful blindness doctrine could be applied in civil lawsuits (there a patent infringement action). According to the Supreme Court, there are two basic

462 requirements of the willful blindness doctrine: "(1) the defendant must subjectively believe that there is a high probability that a fact exists and (2) the defendant must take deliberate actions to avoid learning of that fact."[640] If both elements are satisfied, "a willfully blind defendant is one who takes deliberate actions to avoid confirming a high probability of wrongdoing and who can almost be said to have actually known the critical facts."[641]

Although the tax court has applied the willful blindness doctrine in at least two tax fraud cases to satisfy the knowledge requirement, it is not entirely clear that its application is appropriate here.[642] In the first place, both of these tax court cases involved relatively sophisticated taxpayers. Specifically, one involved a tax lawyer[643] and the other involved a taxpayer who was "well-educated in the intricacies of the business world, and [was] deeply involved in that world for almost 40 years."[644] Thus, these taxpayers bear little resemblance to Dee. Secondly, one of these cases—Fiore v. C.I.R.[645]—NOtes that "[w]illful blindness is a relatively underdeveloped area of law in Tax Court jurisprudence-at least in fraud cases ... Willful-blindness fraud is more thoroughly described in criminal law."

[42] When the doctrine of willful blindness has been applied in the criminal law context, it is not always necessary to show that the defendant engaged in affirmative acts to avoid knowledge of wrongdoing to invoke the willful blindness doctrine because "in some cases the likelihood of criminal wrongdoing is so high, and the circumstance surrounding a defendant's activities and cohorts are so suspicious, that a failure to conduct further inquiry or inspection can justify the inclusion of the deliberate ignorance instruction."[646] Nevertheless, even in the criminal context, circumstances where a willful blindness instruction to a jury is appropriate are rare.[647] And, as the Fifth Circuit stated in U.S. v. Jones,[648] negligence, carelessness, or foolishness is not enough to establish willful blindness.

Assuming that the doctrine of willful blindness applies here, if Dee acted with willful blindness, this Court could find the knowledge requirement for fraud penalties satisfied. And, while a case could be made that Dee's conduct here falls more closely into the negligence, carelessness, or foolishness category, the Court will analyze willful blindness to see if it would change the outcome here. Thus, the Court must determine whether it is reasonable to find here—by clear and convincing evidence—that Dee (i) subjectively believed that there was a high probability that she (and Charles while he was alive) had (a) understated income on her (their) tax returns or (b) underpaid her (their) taxes, and (ii) then took deliberate actions to avoid learning 463 of the fact of her (their) understated income or underpaid taxes.

[43] After carefully considering the evidence, this Court concludes that there is insufficient evidence from which a reasonable fact finder could find, utilizing the clear and convincing evidence standard, that Dee subjectively believed that there was a high probability that she (and Charles while he was alive) had (i) understated income on her (their) tax returns or (ii) underpaid her (their) taxes. This is certainly true from 1992 through 2003. During those years, what did Dee know such that she could form a subjective belief of a high probability of understated income or underpaid taxes? At best, the record supports a finding that Dee knew that: (i) Charles had established a series of offshore trusts and related entities in the IOM, (ii) she had signed certain documents in connection with certain of the IOM trusts, the IOM corporations, or her annuity agreements issued by an IOM corporation, (iii) they lived a lavish lifestyle purchasing expensive jewelry, art, and home furnishings, and (iv) she had signed their joint tax returns.

However, on this record, the Court cannot find that Dee: (i) understood the offshore system—complex or not, (ii) understood any of the documents she had signed in connection with the offshore system—which she had not read and the Court is satisfied that if she had read she would not have understood to any great extent, (iii) knew that the items of expensive jewelry, art and home furnishings that Charles and she had purchased had been paid for by one or more of the IOM trusts or corporations, and (iv) understood their joint tax returns—which she had not read and the Court is satisfied that if she had read she would not have understood to any great extent. In point of fact, Dee's lifestyle did not change after the offshore system was established, which could have put her on notice that something was amiss. By 1990, Charles and she were rich by anyone's standard and she had become accustomed to a lifestyle that most would consider lavish. She made purchases and someone in the Wyly family office paid the bills. Nothing changed in that regard on or after 1992.

But, even assuming that she knew and understood that Charles had established an extremely complicated offshore system; that, standing alone, is not illegal or fraudulent. Moreover, even assuming that she had read and understood the documents she had signed—nothing in them would have put her on notice of anything that should have created a subjective belief of a high probability that Charles and she had understated their income or underpaid their taxes. Their joint tax returns were extremely complicated documents that she had no role in preparing. From her perspective, they continued to be prepared as they always had—by people within the Wyly family office whom she trusted. From this Court's perspective, there is simply insufficient evidence to find—by clear and convincing evidence—that Dee knew something that should have created a subjective belief in her that there was a high probability that Charles and she had understated their income or underpaid their taxes during those years.

Now, let's analyze the later years. An IRS audit focused on the Wyly offshore system started in 2004, the Senate began investigating the Wyly offshore system in 2005, [649] the SEC began investigating Charles and Sam for alleged securities fraud about that time and, in 2010, the SEC sued Charles and Sam, among others, 464 in the SDNY Court for alleged securities fraud. Even assuming that Dee knew all of these facts, which is not clear on this record, should knowledge of these facts have created in Dee a subjective belief of a high probability that Charles and she had understated their income or underpaid their taxes? The Court answers this question no, as to answer the question yes requires the Court to find that Dee could understand (i) the legal issues being raised by the IRS in its audit, (ii) what the Senate was investigating and what conclusions, if any, they reached, (iii) what securities fraud was, much less what Charles was alleged to have done or ultimately found to have done, and (iv) the relevance of the securities fraud allegations to the issue of understated income or underpayment of taxes.

Again, recognizing that Dee is an intelligent but financially unsophisticated woman, the Court is convinced that she has not understood the legal issues being litigated here (many of which are the same issues that were being investigated elsewhere), which strongly suggests that she would not have understood them in that context either. In short, her three years of college and her 50 plus years as a homemaker and mother did not equip her with the ability to understand the highly complicated legal issues sufficiently such that she could form a subjective belief of a high probability that Charles and she (or she after Charles' death) had understated their (her) income or underpaid their (her) taxes. And, without such a subjective belief, we do not get to the required second element of willful blindness—i.e., that Dee then took deliberate actions to avoid learning of the fact of her (their) understated income or underpaid taxes.

On this record, the IRS failed to prove—by clear and convincing evidence—that Dee was willfully blind; and thus, the IRS has failed to carry its burden of proof on the required second element of its claim for fraud penalties as to Dee for any year in which there is a stipulated underpayment of tax.

D. Is Dee Entitled to the Benefits of the Innocent Spouse Defense ?

Next, the Court must decide whether Dee is entitled to innocent spouse relief pursuant to 26 U.S.C. § 6015 with respect to her liability for any income tax deficiencies that may be determined for the years 1992 through 2011. [650] Because the tax returns for the years 2012 and 2013 are not joint returns, innocent spouse relief cannot be at issue for those years.

As noted previously and as a general rule, when married persons file a joint income tax return they become jointly and severally liable for the tax due with respect to that return. However, Congress concluded that under certain circumstances, such liability could be unfair. As relevant here, Dee seeks "innocent spouse" relief pursuant to 26 U.S.C. § 6015(b) and (c).

[44] For the reasons explained below, this Court is satisfied that Dee is entitled to innocent spouse relief under § 6015(b), which provides that relief from joint and several liability is available if: (i) a joint return was filed, (ii) there is an understatement of tax attributable to the erroneous items of one individual filing the return, (iii) the spouse requesting relief did not know, and had no reason to know, of the understatement at the time of signing the return, (iv) taking into account all the 465 facts and circumstances, it would be inequitable to hold the requesting spouse liable for the deficiency in tax resulting from the understatement, and (v) the requesting spouse asserts the innocent spouse defense within two years of the IRS commencing collection activities.[651] Dee has clearly established the first[652] and the last[653] elements for tax years 1992 through 2011. Thus, the Court's analysis will focus on the remaining elements. As discussed previously, Dee bears the burden of proof by a preponderance of the credible evidence.[654]

As just noted, § 6015(b)'s second required element is that there is an understatement of tax on the return attributable to erroneous items of the other spouse.[655] An understatement of income is defined as the excess of (i) the amount of the tax required to be shown on the return for the taxable year, over (ii) the amount of the tax that is shown on the return, reduced by any rebate.[656] An erroneous item is any item resulting in an understatement or deficiency in tax to the extent that such item is omitted from, or improperly reported (including improperly characterized) on an individual joint income tax return.[657] For example, unreported income from an investment asset resulting in an understatement or deficiency in tax is an erroneous item.[658] Similarly, ordinary income that is improperly reported as capital gain resulting in an understatement or deficiency in tax is also an erroneous item.[659] An erroneous item is also an improperly reported item that affects the liability on other returns—i.e., an improper net operating loss that is carried back to a prior year's return.[660] Penalties and interest are not erroneous items.[661] Rather, relief from penalties and interest will generally be determined based on the proportion of the total erroneous items from which the requesting spouse is relieved.[662]

[45] As noted previously, the parties have stipulated that there is understated income on Dee and Charles' joint tax returns for years 1992, 1994 through 2003, 2006, 2008, and 2011.[663] After carefully 466 considering the evidence at trial, the Court finds that all of the understated income for each of those years is attributable solely to Charles' activities.[664] Dee's uncontroverted testimony demonstrates that she had limited knowledge of, or involvement in, the establishment of the offshore trusts by Charles and Sam, had no specific knowledge of, or involvement in, the operation of the offshore trusts, and was not generally involved in the family's business and financial affairs.

Section 6015(b)'s third required element is that the requesting spouse establish that, in signing the return, she did not know and had no reason to know that there was such an understatement. A requesting spouse has knowledge or reason to know of an understatement if she actually knew of the understatement, or if a reasonable person in similar circumstances would have known of the understatement.[665] All of the facts and circumstances are considered in determining whether a spouse had knowledge or reason to know, including (i) the nature of the item relative to other items, (ii) the couple's financial position, (iii) the requesting spouse's educational background and business experience, (iv) the extent of the requesting spouse's participation in the activity at or before the time the return was signed about items that a reasonable person would question, (v) whether the requesting spouse failed to inquire, at or before the time the return was signed, about items on the return or omitted from the return that a reasonable person would question, and (vi) whether the erroneous item represented a departure from a recurring pattern reflected in prior years' returns—e.g., omitted income from an investment regularly reported on prior years' returns.[666]

Courts generally agree on the knowledge test in omitted income cases. For example, in Cheshire v. C.I.R.,[667] the Fifth Circuit stated that the proper test is whether the taxpayer knew or had reason to know about the omitted income itself, or knew or had reason to know about the income-generating transaction, referred to as the knowledge of the transaction test.[668] In Cheshire, the taxpayer took a large retirement distribution, part of which was used to pay off their mortgage.[669] The money used to pay off the mortgage was improperly deducted from the taxpayer's taxable income.[670] Without deciding whether the case presented facts of an omitted income or erroneous deduction case, the court found that the taxpayer had actual knowledge of the income generating transaction, a retirement distribution, so innocent-spouse relief was not available.[671]

However, in Braden v. C.I.R.,[672] a husband who knew that his wife had inherited 467 money from her father's estate, but did not know that some of the money was from withdrawals from her father's IRA accounts and some from interest income, did not know or have reason to know of the understatement.[673] According to the tax court, this case could be distinguished from Cheshire because there the wife had actual knowledge of the underlying transaction—a distribution from a pension plan—while the husband in its case did not know the essential facts of the transaction that defined its character for federal income tax purposes.[674] Rather, the husband thought the money emanated from his father-in-law's estate, which would not be taxable, and the tax court found no indication that the husband should have known some of the money was from IRA accounts and interest income, which are both taxable.[675]

Another example illustrating omitted income is Pietromonaco v. C.I.R.,[676] where the tax court erred in denying innocent-spouse relief to a spouse who had only a high school education, and who paid household expenses from a joint checking account, but otherwise had no access to her family's finances and had no knowledge of her husband's business activity.[677] The tax court's finding that she should have known of income understatements from a cursory review of joint returns, because she was aware of her expenditures, was erroneous; her husband controlled their bank accounts, and the couple had savings built up over their 40–year marriage that could have accounted for amounts by which expenditures exceeded their reported income.[678] The couple also lived the same lifestyle both before and after the underreporting, and the taxpayer received no gifts or other benefits from the income her husband failed to report.[679]

[46] If a spouse has actual knowledge of the underlying transaction that produced the omitted income, innocent-spouse relief will be denied, even when the spouse did not fully understand the tax significance of the transaction.[680] In Penfield v. C.I.R.,[681] an ex-husband not only knew of pension withdrawals his ex-wife made, but had been instrumental in persuading his 468 ex-wife to make those withdrawals. Therefore, the tax court properly denied the ex-husband innocent-spouse relief.[682]

With this background in mind, we return to the facts and circumstances to be considered in determining whether a spouse had knowledge or reason to know, including (i) the nature of the item relative to other items, (ii) the couple's financial position, (iii) the requesting spouse's educational background and business experience, (iv) the extent of the requesting spouse's participation in the activity at or before the time the return was signed about items that a reasonable person would question, (v) whether the requesting spouse failed to inquire, at or before the time the return was signed, about items on the return or omitted from the return that a reasonable person would question, and (vi) whether the erroneous item represented a departure from a recurring pattern reflected in prior years' returns.[683] Many of these circumstances have been discussed in connection with the Court's fraud penalties and willful blindness analysis and will not be repeated here.[684] However, in summary and as previously found, Dee's uncontroverted, credible testimony is that she was not involved in Charles' business affairs. And, while Dee signed some documents in connection with the offshore system, the Court is satisfied that she understood very little about it or the income that was being generated offshore and not reported on their joint tax returns.

After carefully considering the record and the relevant facts and circumstances, the Court is satisfied that (i) Dee did not know about the underlying transactions that produced the unreported income from the offshore system, and (ii) a reasonable person in similar circumstances would not have known about these transactions. In short, Dee did not have the educational background or sophistication in business and tax matters to know if her tax returns contained any understatements of income. And, a reasonable person with the same educational background and lack of business sophistication as Dee would not have had a different understanding. Accordingly, Dee satisfies the third element for innocent-spouse relief under § 6015(b).

[47] [48] Section 6015(b)'s fourth required element is that, when considering all of the facts and circumstances, it would be inequitable to hold a requesting spouse jointly and severally liable for an understatement.[685] One relevant factor for this purpose is whether the requesting spouse significantly benefitted, directly or indirectly, from the understatement.[686] Indeed, the Fifth Circuit has characterized this factor as "the most important factor in determining inequity."[687] A significant 469 benefit is any benefit in excess of "normal support."[688] Evidence of direct or indirect benefit may consist of transfers of property or rights to property, including transfers that may be received several years after the year of the understatement.[689] Thus, for example, if a requesting spouse receives property from the non-requesting spouse that is beyond normal support and is traceable to items omitted from gross income that are attributable to the non-requesting spouse, the requesting spouse will be considered to have received a significant benefit from those items.[690]

[49] "Normal support" is not measured absolutely; there is no dollar amount above which support is deemed out of the ordinary. Normal support is determined by comparing the couple in question's standard of living during the tax years for which there is an alleged deficiency to the years before. If a couple's standard of living during the tax years in question is beyond what the couple normally enjoyed, that can be evidence of a "significant benefit" that should have put the requesting spouse on notice. As the Fifth Circuit explained in Sanders v. U.S.,[691] "one person's luxury can be another's necessity, and the lavishness of an expense must be measured from each family's relative level of ordinary support." An illustrative case is Kistner v. C.I.R.[692] There, the tax court, citing Sanders, examined the lifestyle of a wealthy couple:

> During 1979 and 1980, petitioner clearly lived a very affluent lifestyle. However, prior to 1979, petitioner was already living in the McClure residence, with its pool, clubhouse and tennis court, during one half of the year, and in the furnished Florida condominium during the other half of the year. Petitioner also was already benefitting from the other domestic services of the Robichauds and the use of the A-frame cabin in Michigan. The extent of the personal use of Tem–Cole's airplanes prior to 1979 is unclear, but the evidence suggests that Tem–Cole did own airplanes prior to 1979 that were used by petitioner and by Mr. Weasel.
> Petitioner's standard of living during 1979 and 1980 was also not unusual in light of Mr. Weasel's wealth and level of income. As mentioned, Mr. Weasel had a net worth of approximately $8.6 million in prior years, and he received in prior years annual dividend distributions and compensation totaling over $1 million.[693]

470 The tax court concluded that because the taxpayer had enjoyed a lavish lifestyle for years, there was nothing unusual about her lifestyle that caused her to significantly benefit from the understatements of income on her tax returns.[694] The petitioner was, therefore, entitled to innocent-spouse relief.[695]

As with the petitioner in Kistner, Dee experienced no meaningful improvement to her lifestyle during the tax years at issue. As previously found, the Wylys were extremely wealthy before the offshore trusts were established, allowing Dee to enjoy what the IRS characterizes as an opulent lifestyle. And, she continued to enjoy that same lifestyle after the offshore system was established. While the IRS points to purchases of expensive art or jewelry as evidence of "significant benefit" to Dee, as the Treasury Regulations and case law makes clear, significant benefit means something above and beyond the lifestyle the taxpayer previously enjoyed. On this record, it is clear that Dee's lifestyle did not change in any meaningful way after the establishment of the offshore trusts and related corporations.

[50] In addition to whether the requesting spouse significantly benefitted from the understatement, the tax court has also held that a material factor in determining whether it would be inequitable to hold the requesting spouse liable is whether "the failure to report the correct tax liability on the joint return results from concealment, overreaching, or any other wrongdoing on the part of the nonrequesting [sic] spouse."[696] If the non-requesting spouse (here Charles) has engaged in concealment, overreaching, or wrongdoing, this factor weighs in favor of granting the requesting spouse (here Dee) innocent spouse relief.[697] For example, in Haltom v. C.I.R.,[698] the tax court noted that:

> [t]he second factor we look at is whether the failure to report resulted from wrongdoing on the part of the nonrequesting spouse. This factor weighs heavily in Linda's favor. It was, after all, Jerry who embezzled the money, not Linda, and we have already found that she had no reason to know of either the embezzlement or its omission from their return.

Thus, wrongdoing on the non-requesting spouse's part can weigh in favor of granting innocent spouse relief to the requesting spouse. This is because "[a] purpose of section

6015 relief 'is to protect one spouse from the overreaching or dishonesty of the other.' "[699]

This factor weighs in favor of Dee. This Court previously found that Dee (i) did not commit tax fraud, as none of the badges of fraud it carefully examined applied to Dee,[700] and (ii) was not willfully blind to the fact that Charles was committing tax fraud.[701] Conversely, Charles was involved in the formation of the offshore system and, like Sam, controlled the movement 471 of money and assets through the offshore system. In fact, Charles' offshore system and offshore activities largely mirrored those of his brother Sam, whom the Court has found committed tax fraud by clear and convincing evidence.[702] The failure to report the correct tax liability on Charles' and Dee's joint tax returns results from concealment, overreaching, and other wrongdoing on Charles' part, not Dee's. Thus, this inequity factor—which the tax court ranks along with the significant benefit factor as the "most heavily weighted" in the inequity analysis—favors Dee greatly.[703]

The regulations interpreting § 6015(b) indicate that there are other factors that may be taken into account when determining whether it would be inequitable under all of the facts and circumstances to hold a requesting spouse liable,[704] including "the fact that the requesting spouse has been deserted by the nonrequesting spouse, the fact that the spouses have been divorced or separated, or that the requesting spouse received benefit on the return from the understatement."[705] The first factor identified in the regulations—desertion—is inapplicable to Dee,[706] as Charles did not desert her. As to the second factor identified in the regulations—divorce or separation—the tax court has held that "[a]t worst ... widowhood may be a neutral factor, but we find it completely untenable that this factor weighs against relief."[707] This is because the inequity that this factor is attempting to measure is the inequity that occurs when a requesting spouse is left to deal with the consequences of tax liability on his or her own by virtue of the absence of their partner. As the tax court in Von Kalinowski v. C.I.R.[708] stated:

> As things presently stand, petitioner and Mr. Von Kalinowski remain married. The two have not separated, and petitioner has not been left by her husband to "face the music". Instead, petitioner continues to enjoy the lifestyle and financial security that are largely attributable to her husband's assets and income. Simply put, petitioner has not been deserted in the sense foreseen by the legislators who enacted the predecessor to the section 6015(b)(1) relief from joint liability.

Normally, it would seem a simple matter to conclude that a widow such as Dee has been left to "face the music" regarding her tax liability on her own. Although Dee still enjoys a great deal of financial security, she has been deprived of Charles' income, and many of the assets that she previously shared with him are now entangled in his probate estate. However, IRS Revenue Procedures, which are discussed further below, state that a widow or widower will be treated as no longer married for the purposes of the inequity analysis only if he or she "is not an heir to the non-requesting spouse's estate that would have 472 sufficient assets to pay the tax liability."[709] This makes sense, as a widow or widower whose deceased spouse's probate estate has sufficient assets from which the tax liability can be paid has not been left to deal with that tax liability on his or her own.

Here, although Dee is Charles' heir, it is unclear whether Charles' probate estate will have sufficient assets with which to pay the tax liability at issue here. Dee bears the burden of proof on the innocent spouse defense, and since it is unclear on this record whether Charles' probate estate will be sufficient to pay the tax liability at issue here, the Court cannot conclude that her status as a widow is equivalent to that of divorce or separation for the purposes of the Court's inequity analysis. Again, however, the tax court has pointed out that "[a]t worst ... widowhood may be a neutral factor" and that it would be completely untenable that this factor weighs against relief.[710] The Revenue Procedures come to a similar conclusion, and state that "[i]f the requesting spouse is still married to the nonrequesting spouse, this factor is neutral."[711] Thus, this factor is neutral as to Dee.

As to the third factor identified in the regulations —benefit on the return—a "benefit on the return" encompasses situations where the non-requesting spouse's understatement leads to a tax benefit for the requesting spouse, such as a refund that is higher than that to which the couple would have otherwise been entitled [712] or a deduction by one spouse that offsets income of the other spouse. [713] No party has argued that Dee received a benefit on her return as a result of the understatement at issue here; and thus, this factor will not be addressed further.

The regulations interpreting § 6015(b) also advise that "[f]or guidance concerning the criteria to be used in determining whether it is inequitable to hold a requesting spouse jointly and severally liable under this section," Revenue Procedure 2000–15 "or other guidance published by the Treasury and IRS" is relevant. [714] Revenue Procedure 2000–15 provides a list of seven factors to consider, including (i) whether the requesting spouse is separated or divorced from the nonrequesting spouse, (ii) whether the requesting spouse would suffer economic hardship by virtue of not being able to pay for basic living expenses, (iii) whether the requesting spouse was abused by the non-requesting spouse, (iv) whether the requesting spouse knew or had reason to know of the items giving rise to the deficiency, (v) whether the non-requesting spouse has a legal obligation pursuant to a divorce decree or agreement to pay the outstanding liability, (vi) whether the requesting spouse significantly benefitted from the items giving rise to the deficiency, and (vii) whether the liability for which relief is sought is solely attributable to the non-requesting spouse. [715] The most recent version of these Revenue Procedures, Revenue Procedure 2013–34, has added two additional factors to consider: (viii) whether the requesting spouse has made a good faith effort to comply with the income tax laws 473 in the taxable years following the taxable year or years to which the request for relief relates, and (ix) the mental and physical health of the requesting spouse both during the years in question and at the time relief is requested (collectively, the "Revenue Procedures Factors"). [716]

While the tax court has considered the Revenue Procedures Factors in determining whether it would be inequitable to hold the requesting spouse liable, it has concluded that they are not controlling. [717] This Court will similarly consider them.

The Court has already considered the first Revenue Procedures Factor, and agrees with the tax court that widowhood is at worst neutral in the inequity analysis. This factor is neutral as to Dee. [718]

The second factor—economic hardship—is neutral here too. While Dee can certainly pay reasonable basic living expenses even if she is held liable for the tax at issue here given her wealth, the Revenue Procedures provide that "[i]f denying relief from the joint and several liability will not cause the requesting spouse to suffer economic hardship, this factor will be neutral." [719]

The third factor asks whether Dee was abused. Nothing in the record suggests that Charles abused Dee; in fact, that thought is laughable on this record. But, again, the absence of this factor is neutral. [720]

The fourth factor is whether Dee knew or had reason to know of the items giving rise to the deficiency at issue. As the Court has already noted in its analysis of § 6015(b)(1)(C), she did not. [721] As found previously, Dee relied entirely on Charles to handle all tax and business matters throughout their marriage, [722] and was completely unaware of the workings of the offshore system Charles established. [723] Thus, this factor weighs in Dee's favor. [724]

The fifth factor asks whether the non-requesting spouse (here Charles) has a 474 legal obligation pursuant to a divorce decree or agreement to pay the outstanding liability. The tax court has noted in the case of a widowed spouse that "[c]ustomarily we find that this factor is neutral if it does not weigh in favor of relief." [725] Since Charles and Dee never divorced, but Dee is Charles' widow, this factor is neutral as to Dee.

The sixth factor is whether the requesting spouse significantly benefitted from the unpaid income tax liability or understatement. As previously found, this factor weighs in favor of relief for Dee. [726]

The seventh factor inquires whether the liability for which relief is sought is solely attributable to the non-requesting spouse. This factor does not appear in the most recent version of the Revenue Procedures Factors, and in any case was already analyzed by the Court in its discussion of 26 U.S.C. § 6015(b)(1)(B). As previously found, this factor weighs in favor of relief for Dee, but as this factor does not appear in the most current listing of Revenue Procedures Factors and is not analyzed as a Revenue Procedures Factor by those tax courts interpreting the most recent procedures, the Court will not weigh this factor in Dee's favor. [727]

The eighth factor weighs against relief if the requesting spouse has not made a good faith effort to comply with the income tax laws in the taxable years following the taxable years to which the request for relief relates. This factor weighs against Dee, as there is no evidence in the record indicating that she has "changed course" from the positions that Charles and she took on their joint returns since he passed away. For example, Dee's tax returns in 2012 and 2013 still continue to indicate that she is not the grantor of a foreign trust. [728]

Finally, the ninth factor asks whether Dee is in poor mental or physical health or was in poor mental or physical health at the time the returns were filed. There is no evidence that Dee is—or over the time period at issue ever was—in poor mental or physical health. Thus, according to the tax court and the Revenue Procedures, this factor is neutral as to Dee. [729]

After carefully considering all possible factors identified by the courts or the Revenue Procedures, and after carefully considering "all the facts and circumstances" as § 6015(b)(1)(D) instructs it to do, [730] the Court has only found one factor that weighs against Dee's request for innocent spouse relief. The other factors are either neutral or weigh decidedly in her favor. Significantly, the two most important factors, as identified by either the Fifth Circuit or the tax court, weigh decidedly in her favor. Dee experienced no meaningful change to her lifestyle as a result of the tax fraud at issue here, and this tax fraud 475 was entirely attributable to Charles. These two facts go to the heart of the two factors that courts have considered to be the most important in assessing whether it is inequitable to hold the requesting spouse liable. The one lesser factor that weighs against Dee—compliance with tax laws after the years for which relief is sought—is also mitigated by the particular circumstances of her Case. Dee's credible testimony at trial was that even after Charles' death, she continued to rely on the Wyly family office to prepare her tax returns and to handle her finances, and that she has never had any reason to suspect that the Wyly family office was deficient in their duties. [731] While Dee's lack of knowledge regarding her tax responsibilities is not commendable, her lack of knowledge also means that any noncompliance with tax laws on her part is unintentional. Thus, having carefully weighed all of the facts and circumstances, the Court finds that the fourth element of § 6015(b) is satisfied, as it would be inequitable to hold Dee liable for the deficiency in tax at issue here.

While the Court does not believe that the fifth element for innocent-spouse relief under § 6015(b) is in dispute here, it concludes that it is satisfied nonetheless. To elect the application of § 6015(b), a requesting spouse must file Form 8857 (or other similar statement under penalty of perjury containing the same information required on Form 8857) with the IRS no later than two years from the date of the first collection activity against the requesting spouse with respect to the joint tax liability. [732] Collection activity can be any of the following: an 26 U.S.C. § 6330 notice, an offset of an overpayment of the requesting spouse against a liability under 26 U.S.C. § 6402, the filing of a suit by the United States against the requesting spouse for the collection of the joint tax liability, or the filing of a claim by the United States in a court proceeding in which the requesting spouse is a party or which involves property of the requesting spouse (such as a proof of claim filed in a taxpayer's bankruptcy case). [733] Dee has asserted her right to innocent spouse relief on a timely basis.

For these reasons, the Court concludes that Dee carried her burden of proof and established each of the required elements for innocent spouse relief under 26 U.S.C. § 6015(b). Because the Court has concluded that Dee is entitled to innocent spouse relief under § 6015(b), it need not reach the parties' arguments about her entitlement to such relief under § 6015(c).

E. Did Sam Establish his Reasonable Cause Defense to the Imposition of Fraud Penalties for His Income Tax Underpayments?

1. The Defense in General

Because the IRS carried its burden of proof on its claim for fraud penalties under 26 U.S.C. § 6663 as to Sam's underpayments of income tax, we must now analyze his reasonable cause defense. As noted previously, to establish this defense, Sam must prove —by a preponderance of the 476 credible evidence —that there was "reasonable cause" for his income tax underpayments and that he acted in "good faith with respect to [the] underpayment[s]." [734] Moreover, 26 C.F.R. § 1.6664–4 provides, in relevant part, that:

> (a) In general. No penalty may be imposed under section 6662 with respect to any portion of an underpayment upon a showing by the taxpayer that there was reasonable cause for, and the taxpayer acted in good faith with respect to, such portion. Rules for determining whether the reasonable cause and good faith exception applies are set forth in paragraphs (b) through (h) of this section.
> (b) Facts and circumstances taken into account—(1) In general. The determination of whether a taxpayer acted with reasonable cause and in good faith is made on a case-by-case basis, taking into account all pertinent facts and circumstances.... Generally, the most important factor is the extent of the taxpayer's effort to assess the taxpayer's proper tax liability. Circumstances that may indicate reasonable cause and good faith include an honest misunderstanding of fact or law that is reasonable in light of all of the facts and circumstances, including the experience, knowledge, and education of the taxpayer. An isolated computational or transcriptional error generally is not inconsistent with reasonable cause and good faith. Reliance on an information return or on the advice of a professional tax advisor or an appraiser does not necessarily demonstrate reasonable cause and good faith. Similarly, reasonable cause and good faith is not necessarily indicated by reliance on facts that, unknown to the taxpayer, are incorrect. Reliance on an information return, professional advice, or other facts, however, constitutes reasonable cause and good faith if, under all the circumstances, such reliance was reasonable and the taxpayer acted in good faith. (See paragraph (c) of this section for certain rules relating to reliance on the advice of others.)
> (c) Reliance on opinion or advice—(1) Facts and circumstances; minimum requirements. All facts and circumstances must be taken into account in determining whether a taxpayer has reasonably relied in good faith on advice (including the opinion of a professional tax advisor) as to the treatment of the taxpayer (or any entity, plan, or arrangement) under Federal tax law. For example, the taxpayer's education, sophistication and business experience will be relevant in determining whether the taxpayer's reliance on tax advice was reasonable and made in good faith. In no event will a taxpayer be considered to have reasonably relied in good faith on advice (including an opinion) unless the requirements of this paragraph (c)(1) are satisfied. The fact that these requirements are satisfied, however, will not necessarily establish that the taxpayer reasonably relied on the advice (including the opinion of a tax advisor) in good faith. For example, reliance may not be reasonable or in good faith if the taxpayer knew, or reasonably should have known, that the advisor lacked knowledge in the relevant aspects of Federal tax law.
> (i) All facts and circumstances considered. The advice must be based upon all pertinent facts and circumstances and the law as it relates to those facts and circumstances. For example, the advice must take into account the taxpayer's purposes (and the relative 477 weight of such purposes) for entering into a transaction and for structuring a transaction in a particular manner. In addition, the requirements of this paragraph (c)(1) are not satisfied if the taxpayer fails to disclose a fact that it knows, or reasonably should know, to be relevant to the proper tax treatment of an item.
> (ii) No unreasonable assumptions. The advice must not be based on unreasonable factual or legal assumptions (including assumptions as to future events) and must not unreasonably rely on the representations, statements, findings, or agreements of the taxpayer or any other person. For example, the advice must not be based upon a representation or assumption which the taxpayer knows, or has reason to know, is unlikely to be true, such as an inaccurate representation or assumption as to the taxpayer's purposes for entering into a transaction or for structuring a transaction in a particular manner.
> (2) Advice defined. Advice is any communication, including the opinion of a professional tax advisor, setting forth the analysis or conclusion of a person, other than the taxpayer, provided to (or for the benefit of) the taxpayer and on which the taxpayer > relies, directly or indirectly, with respect to the imposition of the section 6662 accuracy-related penalty. Advice does not have to be in any particular form.

And, while this regulation does not expressly refer to fraud penalties under § 6663, the Court believes it has applicability here, as do the parties. Both the Debtors [735] and the IRS [736] cite to 26 C.F.R. § 1.6664–4 in connection with their reasonable cause based on reliance on the advice of counsel arguments. [737] Furthermore, tax courts have also cited to this regulation in assessing the merits of reasonable cause defenses raised by taxpayers in order to avoid fraud penalties, even though the regulation applies to "penalties imposed under section 6662"—i.e., accuracy-related penalties as opposed to fraud penalties. [738]

[51] 478 Assessing whether someone has established reasonable cause and good faith—which is what Sam must establish here in order to avoid fraud penalties—is a facts and circumstances analysis that takes into account all of the relevant variables, and that "turns on the quality and objectivity of the professional advice which they obtained." [739] The tax court has summarized the relevant considerations for establishing reasonable cause based on reliance on the advice of counsel in this way: [740]

> To establish reasonable cause through reliance on the advice of a tax adviser, the taxpayer must meet the following three-prong test, laid out in Neonatology Assocs., P.A. v. Commissioner, 115 T.C. at 98–99: (1) the adviser was a competent professional who had sufficient expertise to justify reliance, (2) the taxpayer provided necessary and accurate information to the adviser, and (3) the taxpayer relied in good faith on the adviser's judgment.

Some of the same tax courts who use the 26 C.F.R. § 1.6664–4 framework in order to analyze reasonable cause in a fraud context also utilize the Neonatology test in order to assess whether a taxpayer has established reasonable cause based on the reliance on the advice of professionals. [741] Even those courts that do not explicitly cite either § 1.6664–4 or the three-pronged Neonatology test assess the same facts and circumstances that both the regulation and the three-prong test examine. These courts explore whether the advisor the taxpayer relied on had all of the necessary facts, [742] whether the advisor was qualified to render reliable advice by virtue of expertise 479 and lack of conflicts of interest, [743] and whether the taxpayer in fact relied on the advice actually received from the advisor. [744]

[52] [53] As noted previously, the Debtors assert that their reliance on the advice of professionals not only establishes a valid reasonable cause defense, but that it also negates the Debtors' fraudulent intent and prevents the IRS from meeting its initial burden under 26 U.S.C. § 6663. [745] It is indisputable that the IRS bears the burden 480 to prove civil tax fraud by clear and convincing evidence, and that proof of civil tax fraud includes showing that the Debtors intended to avoid taxes that they knew or believed to be owing. [746] It is also true that whether a taxpayer relied on a professional in taking a tax position has bearing on that taxpayer's intent. [747] However, many courts that are faced with taxpayers who attempt to avoid fraud penalties based on reliance on the advice of counsel nevertheless treat such reliance as a defense rather than as a matter to be considered in assessing whether the IRS has met its initial burden to prove fraudulent intent. [748] Regardless, after a careful review of the record and after considering all pertinent facts and circumstances, this Court concludes that the advice Sam received neither negates his fraudulent intent nor establishes his reasonable cause and good faith defense. [749]

[54] 481 In answering the question of whether Sam reasonably relied in good faith on the advice he received from various lawyers as to the income tax treatment of his offshore system and the transactions undertaken through that system under Federal tax law, the Court must decide whether the advice Sam received was based upon all pertinent facts and circumstances and the law as it relates to those facts and circumstances, after: (i) considering why Sam entered into the transactions and structured them in a particular manner, and (ii) whether Sam disclosed any fact that he knew, or reasonably should have known, to be relevant to the proper tax treatment of an item. Moreover, the advice must not be based on unreasonable factual or legal assumptions (including assumptions as to future events) and must not unreasonably rely on the representations, statements, findings, or agreements of Sam or any other person. As the regulation itself states, the advice must not be based upon a representation or assumption which Sam knew, or had reason to know, was unlikely to be true. Finally, even if all of these requirements are satisfied, that does "not necessarily establish that the taxpayer reasonably relied on the advice ... in good faith." [750]

With this background in mind, Sam's reasonable cause and good faith defense as to his income tax underpayments fails here, as to all tax years in which there was an underpayment of income tax. In explaining its determination, the Court will first examine what advice Sam received and from whom, [751] grouping that advice when appropriate, and will then analyze Sam's reasonable cause and good faith defense in light of that advice. Some of the advice upon which Sam is alleged to have relied in good faith is contained in formal written opinions issued by various lawyers, while other advice is captured in written memorandum or emails, while still other advice was allegedly received orally. Generally, each category of advice will be discussed in chronological order, followed by the Court's findings about that advice and Sam's reasonable reliance on it in good faith. [752]

*482 2. The 1992 Private Annuity Transactions

As discussed previously, Sam entered into six complicated private annuity transactions in 1992, on which he paid no income tax at the time the transactions were undertaken. Sam received a written legal opinion from Pratter, Tedder & Graves dated February 28, 1992 "concerning the 1992 federal income tax consequences that were likely to apply to the proposed sale of 'Securities' ... in exchange for a private annuity, with such sale occurring during the 1992 taxable year." [753] Like all written opinions, it was based upon certain facts, which as the opinion letter itself cautions "assumes that the program will be implemented in a manner that is unmodified from the proposed program described herein." [754] The opinion letter further cautions that "any change or deviation from the proposed plan of action described herein might produce different tax consequences than those set forth in this opinion." [755] The factual foundation underlying this opinion letter is described, in relevant part, as follows: [756]

> It is our understanding that you are considering the sale of Securities to a domestic corporation which will issue a private annuity in exchange for the Securities....
> It is our further understanding that the domestic corporation intending to purchase the Securities in exchange for the issuance of the private annuity is wholly owned by a foreign corporation which is wholly-owned by a foreign nongrantor trust.
> We also understand that the possession and/or enjoyment of the Securities being exchanged for the private annuity will reside exclusively with the acquiring corporation, and you will not preserve or reserve any control of any kind or character over such Securities or any income therefrom that would constitute a retained interest in the possession and/or enjoyment of the Securities being exchanged for the private annuity. It is thus expressly intended that you will irrevocably surrender the enjoyment, control, ownership, and all economic benefits attributable to the ownership of the Securities which are sold in exchange for the private annuity.

The opinions that were then given by Pratter, Tedder & Graves based upon this factual predicate include, among others, an opinion that: (i) the sale of the Securities in exchange for a private annuity is not a taxable event to Sam in 1992, [757] (ii) the exchange of Securities for a private annuity of equivalent actuarial value is likely to be excluded from federal gift tax, [758] (iii) the subsequent exercise of the Securities by the obligor (the domestic corporation) will likely not generate a taxable event to 483 the annuitant (Sam), [759] and (iv) Sam's subsequent contribution of the annuity to a grantor trust of which he is the grantor-settlor will likely not cause the income tax consequences to vary from those already described. [760] The opinion letter concluded with the usual caveats that: [761]

> [s]hould there be any change in the applicable tax laws or the facts and circumstances relating to the events described herein, the opinions expressed herein necessarily require a reevaluation in the light of such changes....

> Our analysis is based on the facts and/or assumptions contained in this letter. If such facts and/or assumptions are inaccurate or incomplete, our analysis and conclusions are equally inaccurate or incomplete and might vary substantially from those contained herein.

Similarly, the six Nevada corporations acquiring the options and warrants from Sam and issuing the unsecured private annuities to him received written opinion letters dated April 2, 1992 from Pratter, Tedder & Graves. [762] These opinion letters were identical (except for the name of the entity to whom the letter is addressed). [763] For ease, only one letter—i.e., the letter addressed to East Baton Rouge Limited—will be analyzed in detail. In summary, the firm concluded, "[b]ased on the information presented to us as expressed herein that it is more likely than not that the anticipated federal tax treatment ... will be as we opine herein." [764] As relevant here, the firm provided two opinions. The first described the anticipated tax treatment to East Baton Rouge Limited of its acquisition and subsequent sale of the options and warrants it was to acquire from Sam in exchange for issuing a private annuity to Sam. The second opinion explained East Baton Rouge Limited's anticipated tax treatment if it subsequently relinquished its obligation to pay the annuity to Sam by paying the assuming party assets of a value worth the equivalent of the annuity liability being relinquished. The upshot of these two opinions was that if East Baton Rouge Limited entered into a contract with a foreign corporation (that does not and will not engage in business within the United States and has no office or agent in the United States) pursuant to which the value of the cash and/or other assets exchange by it equals the value of the annuity obligation at the time of such transactions, "it is more likely than not that there should be no federal income tax consequence to [it] as [it has] incurred no economic gain or loss." [765]

So, as relevant here, taking the February and April opinion letters together, Pratter, Tedder & Graves advised Sam that it is more likely than not that: (i) Sam's sale of options and warrants to six domestic corporations that were owned by six foreign corporations that were, in turn, owned by a foreign non-grantor trust in exchange for the issuance of a private annuity of equivalent value to him will not trigger income tax or gift tax consequences to him in 1992, and (ii) the subsequent 484 relinquishment of the options and warrants by the six domestic corporations to the six foreign corporations (who did not and will not engage in business within the United States and who had no office or agent in the United States) in exchange for the foreign corporations' assumption of the domestic corporations' annuity obligations to Sam, will not trigger income tax consequences to the domestic corporations.

There is no dispute here that (i) the domestic corporations —i.e., the six Nevada corporations Sam caused to be formed—were wholly owned by the foreign corporations —i.e., the six similarly named IOM corporations that Sam caused to be formed, (ii) the six similarly named IOM corporations were wholly owned by the Bulldog IOM Trust that Sam settled, (iii) the annuity Sam received was of equivalent value to the options and warrants he sold to the Nevada corporations, and/or (iv) the six IOM corporations did not and have not engaged in business within the United States and had no office or agent in the United States. However, another key factual and legal predicate to the 1992 opinion is that the Bulldog IOM Trust, which owned the six IOM corporations directly and the six Nevada corporations indirectly, be a foreign non-grantor trust. Surprisingly, there is no Pratter, Tedder & Graves opinion letter, or any other opinion letter, addressing this key predicate to the tax treatment of the 1992 annuity transactions undertaken by Sam. While Sam received opinion letters from Tedder, Chatzky & Berends [766] addressing the legal characterization of two other trusts he established in the IOM in December 1992 —i.e., the Lake Providence IOM Trust and the Delhi IOM Trust—those opinion letters were not received until May 19, 1993. [767] And, while Chatzky testified that he "believes" there were opinions issued for the Bulldog IOM Trust, [768] no such opinion(s) was introduced into evidence. [769]

With this background in mind, we can now evaluate Sam's reasonable cause and good faith defense surrounding the income 485 tax consequences of the 1992 annuity transactions he undertook. There are at least two insurmountable problems with Sam's defense as it relates to the 1992 annuity transactions as explained below.

[55] First, the law is clear that Sam cannot rely upon an opinion of a promoter of the tax scheme in question to support a reasonable cause and good faith defense. When the Court uses the term "promoter," it is invoking the concept that reliance on a professional "may be unreasonable when it is placed upon insiders, promoters, or their offering materials, or when the person relied upon has an inherent conflict of interest that the taxpayer knew or should have known about."[770] Reliance on a professional who stands to profit considerably from a taxpayer's participation in a transaction on which that professional advises—or who is not an independent professional—may not be reasonable.[771] This is because, in order to establish reasonable cause or to negate fraudulent intent, a taxpayer must rely on a professional in good faith.[772] The promoter status of a tax advisor goes to the heart of whether a taxpayer's reliance was in good faith. As one tax court has phrased it: "[t]he caselaw is clear on this point—promoters take the good-faith out of good-faith reliance."[773]

Tax courts have also noted "what exactly makes a tax adviser a promoter has been less than clear."[774] Some courts have defined a promoter as "an adviser who participated in structuring the transaction or is otherwise related to, has an interest in, or profits from the transaction."[775] However, these courts have also noted that this definition needs to be applied with caution because of its potential breadth, and tend to only apply it "when the transaction involved is the same tax shelter offered to numerous parties."[776] However, another tax court used the broad definition of "promoter" without similar caveats, applying this definition where the promoter in question "charged $120,000 ... set up the various 486 entities and coordinated the deal from start to finish."[777]

Many definitions of "promoter" are negative—i.e. they define what a promoter is not as opposed to what a promoter is. One tax court noted that a tax advisor is not a promotor when the advisor (i) has a long-term and continual relationship with the client, (ii) does not give unsolicited advice regarding the tax shelter, (iii) advises only within his field of expertise (and not because of his regular involvement in the transaction being scrutinized), (iv) follows his regular course of conduct in rendering his advice, and (v) has no stake in the transaction besides what he bills at his regular hourly rate."[778] The Federal Circuit has noted that "[a]dvice hardly qualifies as disinterested or objective if it comes from parties who actively promote or implement the transactions in question."[779] According to the Fifth Circuit, "taxpayers may not rely on someone with an inherent conflict of interest," i.e. a promoter.[780]

The SDNY Court found Tedder to be a promoter in the SEC Action;[781] and, as noted previously, this Court gave collateral estoppel effect to that finding here. And, while the Wylys now argue that Tedder was not a "promoter," their own documents refer to him as such. For example, IRS Exhibit 96 is an internal memorandum from Hennington and Boucher to, among others, Sam and Charles, in which they state "David Tedder, the attorney who originally promoted the 1992 trusts and annuity transactions is now in jail, having been prosecuted for various offences including fraud."[782] Moreover, that Tedder promoted, sold, or pitched the complex offshore system and related annuity transactions to Sam and Charles, and that he would tell Sam and Charles anything they wanted to hear, is clear from both Sam's direct testimony and Chatzky's testimony explaining why Tedder and he ceased practicing law together, respectively. 487 [783] As explained by Chatzky, he and Tedder are no longer law partners because Tedder "had a penchant for making statements to people that were either questionable or flatly untrue...."[784] Chatzky gave an example of a client asking Tedder if an estate planning concept had ever been tested by the IRS, has it ever been audited, and the "correct answer is 'No, it hasn't been tested ... [or] audited' [b]ut David Tedder would say, 'oh, yeah, it's been audited hundreds of time, and the IRS in each case passed it."[785] According to Chatzky, this made him uncomfortable, so their law firm dissolved and Chatzky returned to practicing law through his own firm, Chatzky & Associates.[786] Thus, this Court is satisfied that even without giving collateral estoppel effect to the SDNY Court's finding in the SEC Action, Tedder's law firm, Pratter, Tedder & Graves, promoted the offshore scheme to Sam and Charles and thus the firm's opinions cannot be relied upon by Sam in asserting his reasonable cause and good faith defense with regard to the 1992 annuity transactions.

Now, to attempt to avoid the well-settled law that he cannot rely upon the advice of a "promoter," Sam argues that Tedder did not really write the opinions that Tedder signed on behalf of Pratter, Tedder & Graves. Rather, Sam argues that Chatzky actually researched and ghost-wrote the opinions signed and issued by Tedder's firm.

Factually, that is true. Chatzky testified at trial that he wrote the opinions that Tedder's firm then issued to the Wylys. Significantly, however, when asked on direct examination why Tedder signed the opinions instead of him, Chatzky testified that "[his] understanding" was that the Wylys "engaged Pratter, Tedder & Graves to ... draft the opinions and, therefore, the opinions were submitted to David Tedder for his signature." [787] So, while Chatzky met Sam at the Malibu meeting where Tedder "pitched" [788] the offshore system and the private annuity deal to Sam and Charles, Chatzky apparently considered Tedder to be the Wylys' lawyer, not himself. Moreover, Chatzky testified that the opinion was [789] > his [Tedder's] opinion. He can change his mind or he cannot sign it or he can make adjustments or amendments, whatever. And I'm not aware of any such changes that he made. So his [Tedder's] involvement, really, was to read the opinion and either sign it or contact me for—with questions.

Ironically, Sam's own trial testimony makes clear that he was relying on the 488 advice of Pratter, Tedder & Graves, as he misunderstood who Chatzky was at the Malibu meeting. Sam clearly thought Chatzky was another lawyer at Pratter, Tedder & Graves, and that Chatzky was the more scholarly of the two attorneys. [790] But Sam was wrong—at least as to who Chatzky was. Chatzky was not a lawyer at Pratter, Tedder & Graves. Chatzky had his own law firm and, while he worked with Tedder from time to time, there is no evidence in the record that Chatzky was retained by the Wylys at this time to give advice to the Wylys. [791]

But, even assuming that Chatzky gave Sam advice in 1992 and 1993—i.e., the advice contained in the opinion letters he ghost-wrote for Pratter, Tedder & Graves to issue to the Wylys and the offshore entities they caused to be formed in those years, there is no opinion that it is more likely than not that the Bulldog IOM Trust will be construed to be a valid non-grantor trust for United States tax purposes. As noted previously, that was a key factual assumption underlying the 1992 opinions issued by Pratter, Tedder & Graves (as ghost-written by Chatzky) to Sam.

Because Tedder's law firm promoted the offshore system to Sam and Charles, the advice Sam received from Pratter, Tedder & Graves cannot be used to establish a reasonable cause and good faith defense as a matter of law. Moreover, without evidence of the receipt of advice concerning the legal characterization of the Bulldog IOM Trust as a foreign non-grantor trust, a key factual and legal assumption underlying the advice received was not established. For either of these reasons, Sam's reasonable cause and good faith defense fails as to the 1992 annuity transactions in each tax year in dispute among the parties unless Sam received advice regarding the proper legal characterization of the Bulldog IOM Trust as a foreign non-grantor trust thereafter.

Moreover, as discussed previously, French, acting as Sam's agent, learned in 1993 that Lubar had concluded that there was a "significant risk" that the 1992 IOM trusts—i.e., as relevant to Sam, Bulldog IOM Trust, Lake Providence IOM Trust, and Delhi IOM Trust—would be characterized as grantor trusts as to Sam under 26 U.S.C. § 679 because income was being accumulated for the benefit of U.S. beneficiaries. [792] Moreover, French learned that Lubar had concluded that the IOM trustee's power to add or substitute other foreign charities would cause the 1992 IOM trusts to be characterized as grantor trusts as to Sam under 26 U.S.C. § 674. For the reasons already explained, what French learned from Lubar regarding the proper 489 legal characterization of the 1992 IOM trusts is imputed to Sam, once his agent and trusted advisor French learned it. [793] And, as previously found, Sam did nothing further to investigate Lubar's conclusions thereafter until October 2003, when the Meadows Owens firm was asked to confirm Lubar's analysis—both Lubar's original analysis from 1993 and his updated analysis from mid-2003. Thus, from 1993 through September 2003, [794] Sam could not have relied in good faith on the advice he received from Pratter, Tedder & Graves—even assuming that firm was not a tax promoter and/or that Sam somehow received informal "advice" from them or someone else that the Bulldog IOM Trust was likely a valid non-grantor trust, of which there is no evidence in the record and we know that no formal written opinion was ever signed and issued to Sam to that effect—as Sam was on notice of the fact that an international tax lawyer hired on his behalf by French, Lubar, had an alternative view of the tax attributes of the 1992 IOM trusts and related transactions, which Sam ignored.

The record is silent on any other advice actually received by Sam regarding the proper legal characterization of the Bulldog IOM Trust as a foreign non-grantor trust from 1993 to October, 2003. While Meadows Owens—specifically, Owens—began representing the Wylys on tax and estate planning matters in 1998, there is no evidence in the record that Meadows Owens ever independently investigated the proper legal characterization of any of the 1992 IOM trusts as foreign grantor or non-grantor trusts during that time period. And, while Evan testified as to the topics on which Owens gave the Wylys advice at certain Wyly family meetings during this time period, and outlines of discussion topics covered by Owens at those meetings were introduced into evidence at trial, [795] the statements attributed to Owens were not admitted for their truth, [796] but rather to establish Sam's state of mind—i.e., what he understood about the trusts as it may be relevant to his fraudulent intent or lack thereof or his reasonable cause and good faith defense or lack thereof. [797]

But even considering Evan's testimony in this regard, it is not terribly helpful. For example, Evan testified regarding the topics discussed by Owens at a Wyly family meeting in approximately April 2000 as 490 delineated in IRS Ex. 110. [798] For the most part, Evan was asked to read the topic headings contained in Owen's discussion outline, and Evan then confirmed that the topic was discussed, that advice was given by Owens on that topic and that he and his father heard the advice and to the best of Evan's knowledge, his father followed the advice given. Of course, without knowing exactly what advice, if any, was actually given by Owens, it is of no real consequence here that Sam heard it, as it is not possible to evaluate the relevance of the actual advice to Sam's reasonable cause and good faith defense. Moreover, that Sam followed the advice suffers from the same flaw plus another—i.e., the "to the best of Evan's knowledge" caveat makes the testimony of virtually no assistance to the Court's evaluation of Sam's defense, as there is nothing in the record from which the Court can conclude that Evan would have any reason to know if his father followed some particular advice given to his father by Owens or not.

Similarly, Evan testified about IRS Exhibit 111, another Owen's discussion outline dated September 7, 2000, confirming that Owens gave advice on each topic, that Sam and he heard the advice, and to the best of Evan's knowledge, his father followed that advice. This testimony was similarly unhelpful for the reasons just explained—and another, as explained below.

The Owens' outline for the September 2000 meeting discusses "Tax Characterization of 1992 Trusts, During Charitable Interest Term" and goes on to state that "[t]he 1992 Trusts are characterized as 'foreign nongrantor trusts' ['FNGT'] for so long as the Grantor is living, plus two (2) years thereafter." [799] That statement is true, as far as it goes. That is certainly what the original documents say—but that statement does not reflect any independent analysis of the proper legal characterization of the 1992 IOM trusts by Owens or his firm. Moreover, we know that the status of the 1992 IOM trusts was analyzed by Meadows Owens in October 2003, which strongly suggests that such analysis had not been done before, or the earlier memoranda from Owens' files at the firm would have been relied upon instead or simply updated.

Finally, and as alluded to previously, what is missing from Evan's testimony is any detailed understanding of what Owens actually said under each discussion topic [800] and/or, more importantly, what Owens actually did in order to give the advice that Evan testified Owens gave. Did Owens 491 independently analyze the original transactions to come to an independent opinion regarding their validity, proper legal characterization, and proper tax treatment or did he simply assume that the original Tedder and/or Chatzky opinions were correct and he then proceeded to update those opinions based upon changes in the tax laws? Did Owens ever see the earlier opinion at all? Or, did Owens just rely on French, Robertson, or later Hennington, who could have told him what had already been done and then built onto that existing structure? On this record the Court has no idea what Owens was or was not told, and/or did or did not do to independently analyze the original structures as implemented by the Wylys. And, while some Meadows Owens' memoranda were introduced into evidence at trial, those memoranda pertain to other topics, not the legal characterization of the 1992 IOM trusts or the validity of the 1992 annuity transactions and their proper tax treatment. [801]

Moreover, even assuming that Owens undertook independent research regarding the 1992 annuity transactions and their tax treatment at this time, we have no idea what facts Owens based his independent analysis and advice upon, as the IRS correctly argues. Sam did not give Owens the facts, nor did Evan. In fact, no witness could articulate the facts upon which any advice Owens gave was based. The best that anyone could do was to say that Owens appeared knowledgeable and that he was given access to anything he needed. For example, Evan testified that Owens "was very well informed on the Isle of Man trusts. We had several family meetings with him where he went into a lot of details on each of the trusts. It was very clear he had a wealth of knowledge regarding those trusts."[802] However, on cross-examination, Evan was unable to delineate what specific facts Owens' advice was based upon.[803]

From the Court's perspective, the fact that Owens appeared knowledgeable is not a sufficient predicate from which the Court can find that his opinions, assuming any relevant to these issues were actually given, were based on adequate facts to make them sound. Lawyers can often appear knowledgeable, but whether they know all the relevant facts that will enable them to give informed and reliable advice is a different question, which simply cannot be answered on this record.

That brings us to 2003. Recall that Boucher learned of Lubar's 1993 conclusions about the proper legal characterization of the 1992 IOM trusts as grantor trusts as to Sam in 2003 through a chance meeting with him in the Cayman Islands, which led to a flurry of activity as discussed supra at pp. 371–74. Recall that Hennington and Boucher met with Lubar in mid–2003 in London to discuss his conclusions regarding the 1992 IOM trusts and the private annuity transactions undertaken through them in 1992 and that their notes from that meeting are summarized in a memorandum[804] they prepared dated June 30, 2003 addressed to Sam, Charles, Evan and Donnie, as discussed supra at pp. 435–38. Finally, recall that this led to an August 2003 anonymous 492 meeting with the IRS on the Wylys' behalf as Lubar had recommended.

When this meeting with the IRS had not resolved anything by mid to late September 2003 and Sam's deadline to file his 2002 tax return was quickly approaching (October 15, 2003), Hennington testified that she turned back to Meadows Owens, who had been advising the Wylys about various aspects of the offshore system and transactions within that offshore system for a few years, for advice on what to do. Specifically, Hennington, acting as Sam's agent, asked Meadows Owens to advise them what they should do with Sam's 2002 tax return given Lubar's conclusions that: (i) the Bulldog IOM Trust "should be classified as a grantor trust because [a] the Trust should be treated as having U.S. beneficiaries and [b] the Trustee may add beneficiaries,"[805] and (ii) that the 1992 annuities could be attacked by the IRS on various grounds as summarized in the memorandum Boucher and she had prepared dated June 30, 2003.[806] Because Owens had died earlier that year, Hennington turned to two other Meadows Owens' partners—i.e., Pulman and Cousins—for this advice.

So, what advice did Pulman and Cousins give the Wylys and when was it given? First, we know that Pulman testified that they did not have a lot of time to consider the issues as Hennington came to them in late September.[807] Second, we know that Hennington met with Pulman, Cousins and two other Meadows Owens' lawyers on October 8, 2003 to discuss five options that Meadows Owens had determined could be pursued by Sam given his October 15 filing deadline for his 2002 tax return.[808] One of those options was for Sam to file a Form 8275 disclosure with his 2002 tax return, on which Sam would disclose Lubar's conclusions regarding the tax positions Sam had previously taken and was continuing to take. This was the option recommended by Meadows Owens and is the option that Sam pursued. Third, we know that in preparation for the meeting with Hennington, Pulman received a memorandum from Michelle Weinstein dated October 1, 2003, in which she stated her disagreement with Lubar's conclusions under 26 U.S.C. § 674(a).[809] Fourth, we know that on October 19, 2003, Pulman received a memorandum from David Kniffen, in which he stated his disagreement with Lubar's conclusions under 26 U.S.C. § 679, among other provisions.[810]

Based on Pulman's testimony at trial, it appears that he advised Hennington in late October 2003 that he believed the Wylys had a "reportable position"[811] that was contrary 493 to Lubar's conclusions about the grantor trust status of the 1992 IOM trusts.[812] However, Pulman never personally advised the Wylys that the 1992 IOM trusts were properly characterized as foreign non-grantor trusts.[813] Moreover, on this record it does not appear that Meadows Owens ever gave advice confirming the validity and proper legal characterization of the 1992 IOM trusts and the tax consequences flowing from transactions undertaken through those trusts.[814]

So, where does this leave us in evaluating Sam's reasonable cause and good faith defense as to the validity and proper tax treatment of the 1992 annuity transactions? We know that (i) a key assumption underlying the original Pratter, Tedder & Graves opinion to Sam about the tax treatment of those transactions was that the Bulldog IOM Trust be a valid non-grantor trust, (ii) there is no evidence that Pratter, Tedder & Graves actually issued such an opinion to Sam in 1992, 1993, or at any other time, (iii) in 1993 Lubar advised French, acting as Sam's agent, that there was a significant risk that the 1992 IOM trusts would be characterized as foreign grantor trusts as to Sam, (iv) at least with respect to the Bulldog IOM Trust, there is no advice contrary to Lubar's from 1993 to mid–2003 when Lubar is asked by Hennington and Boucher to do further research and to reanalyze the 1992 transactions, which (a) he does, (b) confirms his original conclusions that the 1992 IOM trusts are properly characterized as foreign grantor trusts as to Sam and Charles, 494 and (c) raises even further concerns about the validity of the 1992 annuity transactions for other reasons, and (v) Pulman advised Hennington, another of Sam's agents, that he disagreed with Lubar's conclusions or, at least, that Sam had a "reportable position" with regard to those issues.[815] So, in short and at best, by late 2003 Sam arguably had conflicting advice from experienced tax professionals he hired to give him that advice. From the Court's perspective, Sam cannot now pick the advice he prefers—i.e., Pulman's advice that he has a "reportable position" that the 1992 IOM trusts are non-grantor trusts as to him—and then claim to have reasonably relied upon it in connection with his reasonable cause and good faith defense.

So, for all of these reasons, Sam has failed to carry his burden of proof to establish his reasonable cause and good faith defense as to the proper legal characterization of the Bulldog IOM Trust and the tax treatment of the 1992 annuity transactions undertaken by him through domestic and foreign corporations indirectly and directly owned by the Bulldog IOM Trust from 1992 through 2013, the years at issue in the Motions and the Claim Objections.

3. The Settlement of the Bessie IOM Trust and the La Fourche IOM Trust and their Proper Characterization

That brings us to Sam's 1994 and 1995 IOM trusts —i.e., the Bessie IOM Trust and the La Fourche IOM Trust. Recall that these trusts were set up as foreign trusts settled by a non-US person—i.e., King and Cairns, respectively, and that the Court has already concluded that the settling of these trusts was highly irregular, if not fraudulent, from the outset.[816] Perhaps ironically, Lubar is the tax professional who advised the Wylys on the proper structure of these trusts and their proper tax treatment assuming that structure was implemented. As is usually the case with legal advice, Lubar's advice here was predicated on certain facts that he assumed to be true for purposes of giving his advice. Unfortunately, those facts were not true as explained below, although Lubar had no reason to know of their falsity at the time he wrote his memorandum.

Specifically, by letter dated February 16, 1994, Lubar sent a memorandum to French, as Sam's agent, on the tax consequences for U.S. beneficiaries of trusts established by a non-resident alien of the United States.[817] As the memorandum itself makes clear, Lubar was asked to "prepare a memorandum regarding the U.S. federal income tax treatment of U.S. citizen beneficiaries (the 'Taxpayers') of foreign (i.e., non-U.S.) 'grantor trusts' (the 'Trusts') established by an individual (the 'Grantor') who is a nonresident alien of the United States."[818] Lubar was told by French to assume the following facts:[819]

> 1. The Grantor, although not related to the Taxpayers, has known the Taxpay 495 ers for a considerable period of time and will establish the Trusts for the Taxpayers' benefit as an entirely gratuitous act. All moneys contributed to the Trusts, now or in the future, will belong to the Grantor, and he has not previously and will not in the future receive any consideration, reimbursement, or other benefit for, or in respect of, this act, directly or indirectly. Further, the Taxpayers have not previously made gifts to the Grantor exceeding US $10,000 in any taxable year.
> 2. The Trusts have been established in the Isle of Man as typical discretionary trusts. Under their terms, the trustee (the "Trustee") has been given broad powers to manage and dispose of the Trusts' principal and income, > subject, in most cases, to the consent of a protector (the “Protector”). Neither the Trustee nor the Protector is a beneficiary of the respective Trusts. The Trusts are irrevocable but may be modified by the Trustee in certain respects, including the naming of additional beneficiaries.

> 3. The Trusts will acquire a majority share interest in a non-U.S. corporation (“Newco”) organized to engage in, inter alia, the insurance business, exclusively outside the United States. Neither the Taxpayers nor any person related to the Taxpayers, directly, indirectly or constructively, will transfer any money or other property to Newco except on an “arm's length” basis [fn 2], and if the Taxpayers provide services to Newco as employees, independent contractors or otherwise, directly or indirectly, they will be compensated solely on an arm's length basis.
> [fn 2] For this purpose, a transfer is considered to be “arm's length” if undertaken on terms, including financial terms, that would be made between wholly unrelated persons in comparable circumstances.

Based upon these predicate facts, Lubar offers several opinions. As relevant here, Lubar opines that [820]

> Because of the broad discretionary powers afforded to the Trustee and the fact that the Grantor is also a beneficiary of the Trusts, the Trusts will be ‘grantor trusts' for all U.S. federal income tax purposes pursuant to the provisions of sections 671 et seq. for so long as the Grantor lives. As a consequence, the Grantor will be considered to be the owner of the portion of the Trusts (including the shares of Newco) attributable to the property that he transfers to the Trusts, and all items of income, deduction or credit attributable to such portion will be included in computing the Grantor's taxable income and credits for U.S. federal income tax purposes.
> However, because the Grantor is a nonresident alien as to the United States and neither the Trusts nor Newco will have any income from U.S. sources or effectively connected with the conduct of a U.S. trade or business, the Grantor will have no actual U.S. tax liability or obligation to file a U.S. income tax or information return. In the assumed circumstances, the Grantor will be the sole transferor of property to the Trusts and will, accordingly, be treated as owner of all the interests in the Trusts. Thus, all income of the Trusts will be notionally taxed to the Grantor for U.S. federal income tax purposes, and the Taxpayers, U.S. citizen beneficiaries of the Trusts, will not be subject to U.S. tax on any distributions received from the Trusts that are attributable to income realized by the Trusts during the Grantor's lifetime .... Further, because 496 the Grantor will be treated as owner of the shares of Newco held by the Trusts, the Taxpayers will not be considered to own any shares thereof for purposes of the provisions applicable to “controlled foreign corporations” (“CFC” or “foreign personal holding companies” (“FPHC”) and likely will not be considered to own any shares of Newco for purposes of the “passive foreign investment company (“PFIC”) provisions. Thus, the Taxpayers should not have any current U.S. tax liability or reporting obligations in respect of income realized by Newco during the Grantor's lifetime (other than compensation that the Taxpayers may receive from newco, directly or indirectly, for services performed on its behalf).

As previously found, certain of those predicate facts were simply not true. Neither King (the grantor of the Bessie IOM Trust) nor Cairns (the grantor of the La Fourche IOM Trust) had known Sam “for a considerable period of time.” Indeed, Evan testified that King was merely a stockbroker who did some business, but “not a lot,” with Maverick. [821] Moreover, we know that French prepared a letter for Cairns to sign stating that he was establishing the La Fourche IOM Trust “to show [his] gratitude for [Sam's] loyalty to our mutual ventures and [his] personal support and friendship,” all of which was untrue as Cairns testified. In fact, Cairns did not know Sam at all: [822]

> Q. Is there any language in [the letter] that was not provided to you by Mr. French?
> A. No, all of it was provided.
> Q. [The letter] says here, “This is to show my gratitude for your loyalty to our mutual ventures and your personal support and friendship.” Were you in fact a friend of Mr. Sam Wyly?
>
> A. No, but I was a friend of Ronnie Buchanan's.
> Q. You never talked to him, never met Mr. [Sam] Wyly?

A. No.

In addition, neither the Bessie IOM Trust nor the La Fourche IOM Trust was established as an entirely gratuitous act." Indeed, as a stockbroker dealing with Maverick, King had already earned commissions from dealings with Wyly entities (though not through a direct relationship with Sam).[823] And, soon after the trusts were established, Cairns' trust management company was hired to serve as trustee for some of the Wylys' IOM trusts, including the La Fourche IOM Trust he allegedly settled for Sam's benefit.[824]

Moreover, as found by the SDNY Court and as independently found here:[825]

> 497 There were no gratuitous transfers here. First, I am doubtful that King provided even the factual $1 towards the trusts. In a November 26, 1995 fax to French, Buchanan writes that "Keith never produced the money." Buchanan explains that the King-related trusts "were settled with a factual dollar bill" only so that "there [was] no question of the[ ] [trusts] being voidable by reason of the absence of assets" pending the Wylys' transfer of options. Even if King had contributed the $1, the premise that an unreimbursed dollar bill is sufficient to establish a tax-free foreign grantor trust cannot be taken seriously. Second, Cairns' transfer of $100 cannot be considered gratuitous because shortly after settling these trusts, he received lucrative work from the Wylys as trustee. Finally, in light of the falsified trust deeds and supporting documentation surrounding these trusts, it would be unjust to consider anyone but the Wylys to be the true grantors of these trusts.

Indeed, it appears that King's and Cairn's failure to fund the trusts was discovered as early as November 1995.[826]

As 26 C.F.R. § 1.6664–4 itself makes clèar "the advice must not be based on unreasonable factual or legal assumptions (including assumptions as to future events) and must not unreasonably rely on the representations, statements, findings, or agreements of the taxpayer or any other person."[827] Because Lubar's advice was based on unreasonable factual assumptions given to him by French, Sam's agent, Sam cannot have reasonably relied on Lubar's advice here.

For all of these reasons, Sam has failed to carry his burden of proof to establish his reasonable cause and good faith defense as to the proper legal characterization of the Bessie IOM Trust and the La Fourche IOM Trust and the tax consequences attributable to those trusts. In coming to this conclusion the Court has rejected the IRS' contention that Sam must have actually read the opinions or the memoranda containing the advice he purports to have reasonably relied upon in good faith before he is entitled to assert a reasonable cause and good faith defense. While it is true that Sam admitted that he had not read most, if not all, of those legal opinions or memoranda containing the relevant advice, he is not required to have done so. As the Debtors' Post–Trial Brief makes clear, the definition of "advice" contained in the applicable regulation allows advice to be provided "to or for the benefit of" Sam and permits Sam to rely upon that advice "directly or indirectly."[828]

However, in coming to its conclusion, the Court has also rejected Sam's argument that he did not know that the factual assumptions contained the opinions or memoranda were wrong and that somehow, his lack of understanding allows him to reasonably rely on the advice contained therein 498 —even though it was based on erroneous facts and assumptions. The fallacy of this argument is apparent on the face of the same regulation that defines "advice" favorably to Sam—i.e., 26 C.F.R. § 1.6664–4, which simply provides that "the advice must not be based on unreasonable factual or legal assumptions (including assumptions as to future events) and must not unreasonably rely on the representations, statements, findings, or agreements of the taxpayer or any other person."[829] Nowhere does the regulation state that the taxpayer must know of the unreasonable factual assumptions. It is an objective test; the factual assumptions must be reasonable. Here they were not. Moreover, the advice itself conditions its efficacy on the accuracy of the factual assumptions expressly stated in the memorandum. Here, those assumptions were inaccurate, and therefore the advice is of no force and Sam cannot have reasonably relied upon it.

4. The 1996 Private Annuity Transactions

We next turn to the six complicated private annuity transactions Sam entered into in 1996, on which he paid no income tax at the time the transactions were undertaken. Recall that those transactions were structured differently from the 1992 annuity transactions. For example, in 1996 Sam assigned 650,000 options to purchase stock of Sterling Software to Crazy Horse IOM Trust, a foreign trust he settled in 1995, which trust immediately assigned the options to Locke Limited (IOM), an entity wholly owned by Bulldog IOM Trust, in exchange for an unsecured private annuity payable to Crazy Horse IOM Trust. Crazy Horse IOM Trust was then liquidated, the effect of which was to put the right to receive the annuity payments to Sam, who as just noted, was the grantor of the now-liquidated Crazy Horse IOM Trust. Sam undertook five more similarly structured annuity transactions in 1996.

We will group the transactions by the IOM trust that owned the IOM entity issuing the private annuity. So, that means that Sam's two assignments of options to Crazy Horse IOM Trust, which options were then assigned to Locke Limited (IOM) and Moberly Limited (IOM) in exchange for two unsecured private annuities payable to Crazy Horse IOM Trust will be analyzed together, as Locke Limited (IOM) and Moberly Limited (IOM) are both wholly owned by Bulldog IOM Trust. Then, we will analyze Sam's assignment of options to Arlington IOM Trust, which options were then assigned to Sarnia Investments Limited (IOM) in exchange for an unsecured private annuity payable to Arlington IOM Trust, as Sarnia Investments Limited (IOM) is wholly owned by Lake Providence IOM Trust. Followed by an analysis of Sam's two assignments of options to Tallulah IOM Trust, which options were then assigned to Audubon Asset Limited (IOM) and Yurta Faf Limited (IOM) in exchange for two unsecured private annuities payable to Tallulah IOM Trust, as Audubon Asset Limited (IOM) and Yurta Faf Limited (IOM) are wholly owned by Bessie IOM Trust. Finally, we will analyze Sam's assignment of options to Sitting Bull IOM Trust, which options were then assigned to Devotion Limited (IOM) in exchange for an unsecured private annuity payable to Sitting Bull IOM Trust, as it is wholly owned by La Fourche IOM Trust.

Returning to Sam's two assignments of options to the Crazy Horse IOM Trust, the 499 Crazy Horse IOM Trust received a written opinion letter from Chatzky and Associates [830] dated February 22, 1996. [831] The opinion letter notes that

> [y]ou have requested the law firm of Chatzky and Associates, a Law Corporation to review and comment on the proposed sale of compensatory "Nonqualified Options"... in exchange for a private annuity, with such sale to occur during the 1996 taxable year for United States income tax purposes and United States income withholding tax purposes. [832]
> Our opinions are based on the correctness of the facts and circumstances set forth herein, and our understanding that the factual scenario set forth hereinbelow is complete, accurate, true, and correct. [833]
> It is our view based on the information presented to us as expressed herein that it is more likely than not that the anticipated federal United States tax treatment relating to the matters discussed herein will be as we opine herein. [834]

Then, Chatzky sets forth the facts that the firm is relying upon. Several of those facts are relevant here, including

> 4. Sam Wyly transferred these options to The Crazy Horse Trust, a foreign situs grantor trust that is recognized as a "grantor trust" for United States income tax purposes. [835]
> 5. You anticipate that The Crazy Horse Trust will transfer the non-statutory options to an underlying foreign corporation that is wholly owned by a foreign situs non-grantor trust. [836]
> 6. It is anticipated that the wholly owned underlying foreign corporation of a foreign non-grantor trust will issue a private annuity to The Crazy Horse Trust in exchange for the receipt of non-statutory options of an equivalent value. [837]

Based upon these facts, among others, Chatzky and Associates provides the following opinions

> A. Pursuant to the general federal income tax treatment of property exchanged for a private annuity the sale of non-statutory options to a foreign corporation in exchange for The Crazy Horse Trust's receipt of a > deferred private annuity of equivalent value is not a taxable event in the year 1996.[838]

> * * *
> B. The private annuity is not intended to contain a gift or bargain sale element, 500 and the exchange of non-statutory options for a private annuity of equivalent actuarial value is likely to be excluded from federal gift tax.[839]
>
> C. The annuity payments must be unsecured to avoid immediate taxation of The Crazy Horse Trust in 1996 with respect to the disposition of the non-statutory options in exchange for an annuity of an equivalent value.[840]
>
> E. The disposition of compensatory non-statutory options by The Crazy Horse Trust, a grantor trust, in an arm's length transaction under which non-statutory options are transferred in exchange for the receipt by The Crazy Horse Trust of a substantially nonvested private annuity of an equivalent value issued by the obligor corporation is not a taxable event in the year 1996.[841]
>
> F. The subsequent exercise of the non-statutory options by the obligor will not likely generate a taxable event to The Crazy Horse Trust because the compensation element will remain opened [sic] until the year The Crazy Horse Trust receives its annuity payments.[842]
>
> * * *
> G. The private annuity contract is likely to be treated as being held by a natural person.[843]

There is no dispute here that: (i) the Crazy Horse IOM Trust is a foreign situs grantor trust (to Sam), (ii) Locke Limited (IOM) and Moberly Limited (IOM) issued private annuities to the Crazy Horse IOM Trust in exchange for their receipt of the options, and (iii) the annuity was of equivalent value to the options. However, as with the 1992 annuity transactions analyzed supra at pp. 482–94, a key factual predicate to Chatzky's legal opinion is that the Bulldog IOM Trust, which owned Locke Limited (IOM) and Moberly Limited (IOM), the two corporations issuing annuities to the Crazy Horse IOM Trust, be a foreign non-grantor trust. As discussed at length above, Sam never received any advice that the Bulldog IOM Trust is properly characterized as a foreign non-grantor trust on which he can reasonably rely. As a result, and for the same reasons set forth above in connection with the 1992 annuity transactions, Sam's reasonable cause and good faith defense fails with respect to these two annuity transactions throughout the tax years in question here.

Turning to Sam's assignment of options to Arlington IOM Trust, who then assigned those options to Sarnia Investments Limited (IOM) in exchange for an unsecured private annuity payable to Arlington IOM Trust, Arlington IOM Trust also received a written opinion letter from Chatzky and Associates[844] dated February 22, 1996.[845] The opinion letter issued to the Arlington IOM Trust is identical to the opinion letter received by the Crazy Horse IOM Trust quoted above except that all 501 references to the Crazy Horse IOM Trust are changed to Arlington IOM Trust. There is no dispute here that: (i) Arlington IOM Trust is a foreign situs grantor trust (to Sam), (ii) Sarnia Investments Limited (IOM) issued a private annuity to Arlington IOM Trust in exchange for its receipt of the options, and (iii) the annuity was of equivalent value to the options.

However, a key factual predicate to Chatzky's legal opinion is that Lake Providence IOM Trust, which owned Sarnia Investments Limited (IOM), the entity issuing the annuity to Arlington IOM Trust, be a foreign non-grantor trust. And, of possible significance to his reasonable cause and good faith defense, on May 19, 1993, Sam received a written opinion letter from Tedder, Chatzky & Berends in which the firm opines that:[846]

> [w]e have reviewed this Trust Agreement [for Lake Providence Trust] and have determined that it is more likely than not that the trust will be construed to constitute a valid non-grantor trust for United States taxation purposes provided that the trust operates in accordance with the terms and > provisions contained in the Trust Agreement.

So, if this advice is not tainted by Tedder's status as a promoter of the offshore system to the Wylys, the advice that was missing from the Court's analysis of the 1992 annuity transactions undertaken through corporations wholly owned by the Bulldog IOM Trust has been supplied. In other words, a key factual predicate in the Chatzky and Associates' 1996 opinion that the entity issuing the annuity to Arlington IOM Trust be wholly owned by a foreign non-grantor trust may now be satisfied.

But, as already found,[847] Tedder's firm, Pratter, Tedder & Graves promoted the offshore system and the annuity transactions to the Wylys in late 1991 and 1992. That the firm name changed when Chatzky joined Tedder's firm and then issued the May 19, 1993 opinion letter just discussed does not change the firm's status as the promoter of the offshore system and the annuity transactions. Accordingly, and for the reasons already explained, Sam cannot rely upon the May 19, 1993 opinion of Tedder, Chatzky & Berends as part of his reasonable cause and good faith defense.

And, without an ability to rely on the May 19, 1993 opinion of Tedder, Chatzky & Berends, the analysis of this transaction and Sam's reasonable cause and good faith defense is the same as the analysis of the 1992 annuity transactions and Sam's reasonable cause and good faith defense. As a result, and for the same reasons set forth above in connection with the 1992 annuity transactions, Sam's reasonable cause and good faith defense fails with respect to this annuity transaction throughout the tax years in question here.

As noted previously, we will analyze Sam's two assignments of options to Tallulah IOM Trust together, as those options were assigned to two IOM corporations—Audubon Asset Limited (IOM) and Yurta Faf Limited (IOM)—that are wholly owned by Bessie IOM Trust. Like the other 1996 annuity transactions just discussed, Tallulah IOM Trust received a written opinion letter from Chatzky and Associates dated February 22, 1996 that is identical to the opinion letter received by the Crazy Horse IOM Trust quoted above except that all references to the Crazy Horse IOM Trust are changed to Tallulah IOM Trust.[848] There is no dispute here 502 that: (i) Tallulah IOM Trust is a foreign situs grantor trust (to Sam), (ii) Audubon Asset Limited (IOM) and Yurta Faf Limited (IOM) each issued a private annuity to Tallulah IOM Trust in exchange for its receipt of the options, and (iii) each annuity was of equivalent value to the options.

However, a key factual predicate to Chatzky's legal opinion is that the Bessie IOM Trust, which owned Audubon Asset Limited (IOM) and Yurta Faf Limited (IOM), the corporations issuing the annuities to Tallulah IOM Trust, be a foreign non-grantor trust. Of course, as discussed above, we know that the Bessie IOM Trust was not a foreign non-grantor trust; it was established as a foreign grantor trust (to King) under 26 U.S.C. §§ 671–679.[849] Once again, a key factual predicate to Chatzky's opinion is not satisfied, preventing Sam from relying on that opinion in good faith. Moreover, Sam offered no evidence of any other advice he received in connection with these private annuity transactions. For these reasons, Sam's reasonable cause and good faith defense fails with respect to these annuity transactions throughout the tax years in question here.

Finally, we analyze Sam's assignment of options to Sitting Bull IOM Trust, which assigned the options to Devotion Limited (IOM) in exchange for a private annuity. Devotion Limited (IOM) was wholly owned by La Fourche IOM Trust. Like the other 1996 annuity transactions just discussed, Sitting Bull IOM Trust received a written opinion letter from Chatzky and Associates dated February 22, 1996 that is identical to the opinion letter received by the Crazy Horse IOM Trust quoted above except that all references to the Crazy Horse IOM Trust are changed to Sitting Bull IOM Trust.[850] There is no dispute here that: (i) Sitting Bull IOM Trust is a foreign situs grantor trust (to Sam), (ii) Devotion Limited (IOM) issued a private annuity to Sitting Bull IOM Trust in exchange for its receipt of the options, and (iii) the annuity was of equivalent value to the options.

However, a key factual predicate to Chatzky's legal opinion is that La Fourche IOM Trust, which owned Devotion Limited (IOM), the entity issuing the annuity to Sitting Bull IOM Trust, be a foreign non-grantor trust. Of course, as discussed above, we know that La Fourche IOM Trust was not a foreign non-grantor trust; it was established as a foreign grantor trust (to Cairns) under 26 U.S.C. §§ 671–679.[851] Once again, a key factual predicate to Chatzky's opinion is not satisfied, preventing 503 Sam from relying on that opinion in good faith. Moreover, Sam offered no evidence of any other advice he received in connection with this private annuity transaction. For these reasons, Sam's reasonable cause and good faith defense fails with respect to this annuity transaction throughout the tax years in question here.[852]

5. Alleged Reliance on French

The Debtors assert that they reasonably relied on French, their longtime attorney and advisor, for tax advice regarding the offshore system. The Court disagrees for two reasons. First, the Court finds that French—who is admittedly not a tax lawyer—was not qualified to give tax advice to the Wylys regarding the offshore system. Second, the Court finds that French did not actually give any tax advice of his own to the Wylys regarding the offshore system. Instead, at the Wylys' request, he acted as a middleman, relaying to them the tax advice of actual tax lawyers he consulted with on their behalf.

That French was acting in a dual capacity here—i.e., (i) as the Wylys' lawyer on issues he was competent to advise on, and (ii) as the Wylys' trusted agent, empowered to hire other expert advisors with respect to those issues on which he was not, bears brief emphasis. As previously found, French was charged by Sam and Charles, his principals, with the responsibility to oversee the implementation of the Wyly offshore system from a legal perspective. That French was a trusted advisor to the Wylys when the offshore system was initially established and transactions began to be undertaken through it is beyond dispute on this record. However, the Wylys recognized that French did not have the required legal expertise himself to address all of the relevant legal issues that the implementation of the offshore system would require (recall that French was a securities lawyer), so French was authorized to hire, on the Wylys' behalf, whomever French believed necessary to implement the offshore system in such a way as to accomplish the Wylys' goals. And, while French obviously gave some legal advice along the way himself, he was much more than a lawyer here—he served as Sam's and Charles' agent, charged with the responsibility to implement the Wyly offshore system. It is in this middleman or agent role that French received tax advice on the Wylys' behalf from experienced international tax professional(s), but French gave Sam and Charles no tax advice of his own, as he himself acknowledged when he testified that he acted as "basically a business adviser,"[853] and not as a tax lawyer —"I'm 504 not the tax lawyer. I'll take that disclaimer again, okay."[854]

[56] With French's middleman or agent role firmly in mind, we turn to the first reason that the Wylys' cannot rely upon French's purported tax advice—i.e., French was not qualified to give tax advice on the offshore system. Whether a particular professional is qualified enough to give tax advice that a taxpayer can reasonably rely upon is a fact sensitive inquiry, but that a professional must be at least minimally qualified is beyond question. In certain situations, it will not be enough that the advisor was a lawyer or a certified public accountant.[855] Indeed, a lawyer's choice to consult with an undisputed tax expert on a matter may be an implicit acknowledgment that he is not competent to give tax advice about a particular matter.[856] While the Fifth Circuit has stated in dicta that "[i]t cannot be a requirement ... that a lawyer or accountant must be shown in fact to be a 'tax expert' before reliance on his advice is reasonable,"[857] it has also acknowledged that a taxpayer must rely on a competent professional,[858] and that "[r]eliance on the advice of a professional tax adviser does not necessarily demonstrate reasonable cause and good faith; rather, the validity of this reliance turns on the 'quality and objectivity of the professional advice.' "[859] Although there are no bright line tests regarding competence of tax professionals to which the Court can turn, an examination of the case law allows us to glean some helpful standards.

Neonatology Associates, P.A. v. C.I.R.[860] is a leading tax court case discussing when—for purposes of a reasonable cause defense—a taxpayer may reasonably rely on the advice of a professional in order to escape penalty liability. The taxpayers there argued that they should not be liable for penalties because they had established reasonable cause via their reliance on professionals.[861] The Neonatology court laid out the following test for establishing reasonable cause based on reliance on professional tax advice:

> for a taxpayer to rely reasonably upon advice so as possibly to negate a section 6662(a) accuracy-related penalty determined by the > Commissioner, the taxpayer must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the taxpayer meets each requirement of the following three-prong test: (1) the adviser was a competent professional who had sufficient expertise 505 to justify reliance, (2) the taxpayer provided necessary and accurate information to the adviser, and (3) the taxpayer actually relied in good faith on the adviser's judgment. [862]

The Neonatology court further noted that it may not be reasonable to rely on a professional's advice when the taxpayer knew, or should have known, that the professional lacked "the requisite expertise to opine on the tax treatment of the disputed item." [863] Specifically, the Neonatology court found that the taxpayers there had not established reasonable cause based on reliance on the advice of professionals in part because the only professional on whom the taxpayers could prove they actually relied was an insurance agent who was not, and had never held himself out as, a tax professional. [864] This insurance agent also stood to gain financially from the sale of the insurance products at issue to the taxpayers. [865] Although the taxpayers alleged that they had also relied on the advice of other, more qualified professionals, the taxpayers were ultimately unable to prove that they actually relied on the advice of any other professionals besides the insurance agent. [866]

As a lawyer French is obviously more qualified to give tax advice than an insurance agent who alleged no tax expertise and was not a lawyer. However, this does not necessarily mean that the Wylys could reasonably rely on French's tax advice, assuming he gave them any. CNT Investors, LLC v. C.I.R. [867] demonstrates why. CNT Investors involved a taxpayer who was a funeral home owner with a mortuary science degree ("Carroll") who "[a]lthough ... an astute and successful businessman, he understood only basic tax principles and lacked sophistication in various stock and bond type financial matters. Hence he sought counsel and assistance from professional advisers on legal and accounting issues relating to the funeral home." [868] One of these professionals was J. Roger Myers ("Myers"), "the funeral home's de facto general counsel." [869] Myers' tax expertise was summed up in this way:

> As of 1999 Mr. Myers had practiced law for almost 30 years, most of them spent in a business-oriented private practice involving some civil litigation. Although he did not hold himself out as a tax lawyer and typically referred clients to specialists for complicated income tax advice, Mr. Myers had taken basic Federal income and estate tax courses in law school, had previously prepared estate tax returns, and had advised Mr. Carroll on general tax law principles. [870]

Carroll ran into tax problems when he was contemplating retiring and selling his funeral home. [871] Myers and Carroll's CPA determined that it would not be possible for Carroll to sell his funeral home without triggering significant taxable gain. [872] One day, however, Myers stumbled across a potential solution to this problem:

> In 1999 Mr. Myers encountered a potential solution. Over lunch with a longtime acquaintance, local financial adviser 506 Ross Hoffman, Mr. Myers described Mr. Carroll's problem in general terms, explaining that he had a client who needed to transfer appreciated assets out of a corporation for estate planning purposes. Mr. Hoffman advised Mr. Myers that he knew of a strategy that might work.
> Earlier in the year Mr. Hoffman had attended a Las Vegas conference sponsored by Fortress Financial, a New York-based tax planning firm. Erwin Mayer, an attorney with the law firm Jenkens & Gilchrist, gave a seminar at the conference on a strategy he called a "basis boost" that could allegedly increase the tax basis of low-basis assets. The basis boost strategy Mr. Mayer presented was, in substance, a Son–of–BOSS transaction. [873]

Hoffman was not a lawyer and admitted that he did not completely understand the basis boost transaction. [874] However, he put Myers in touch with another attorney who gave him a "memorandum prepared by Jenkens & Gilchrist describing and analyzing the transaction.

Myers reviewed the memorandum and consulted some of the legal authorities cited therein, albeit not in extreme detail." [875] Hoffman thereafter presented that basis boost transaction to Carroll and his wife at a meeting Myers attended. [876] Carroll decided to go forward with the basis boost. [877]

As it turned out, the basis boost transaction was not a legitimate way for Carroll to save taxes, and Carroll found himself in tax court facing significant penalties. [878] The CNT Investors court used the Neonatology court's three-part test for assessing whether Carroll had demonstrated reasonable cause based on reliance on the advice of counsel, [879] finding that the question of whether Myers' had sufficient expertise on which Carroll could justifiably rely posed a difficult question, in part because the law regarding what constitutes sufficient expertise does not lay out a bright line test:

> Rather than set a specific standard, the regulations under section 6664(c) outline certain baseline competency requirements. First, rather than mandate that the adviser possess knowledge of relevant aspects of Federal tax law, the regulations stipulate only that "reliance may not be reasonable or in good faith if the taxpayer knew, or reasonably should have known, that the advisor lacked" such knowledge. Sec. 1.6664–4(c)(1), Income Tax Regs. Second, the adviser must base his or her advice on "all pertinent facts and circumstances and the law as it relates" to them. Id. subpara. (1)(i). Third, the adviser must not himself or herself "unreasonably rely on the representations, statements, findings, or agreements of the taxpayer or any other person." Id. subpara. (1)(ii) (emphasis added).
> In applying these general guidelines, this Court has not articulated a uniform standard of competence that an adviser must satisfy but has instead demanded 507 expertise commensurate with the factual circumstances of each case. [880]

In the end, the tax court concluded that Carrol could rely on Myers for two reasons. First, Carroll was unsophisticated in financial matters and "had never before invested in even garden-variety mutual funds and securities" and "understood only basic tax principles." [881] Second, the record demonstrated that Myers had independently analyzed the basis boost transaction and came to his own conclusions regarding its validity:

> Mr. Myers performed due diligence. After Mr. Hoffman pitched the Son–of–BOSS transaction to him, in an effort to better understand the proposal Mr. Myers held a conference call with Mr. Mayer. This conversation left Mr. Myers unsatisfied with his grasp of how the transaction would work, so he requested, and Mr. Mayer sent, a memorandum and an article from a tax publication describing and analyzing the transaction and citing various legal authorities. Mr. Myers reviewed Mr. Mayer's memorandum and consulted some of the legal authorities cited therein, albeit not in extreme detail. He also researched Jenkens & Gilchrist. During the implementation phase, he spoke by telephone with Mr. Mayer several times.
> Mr. Myers believed that he had a good grasp of how the Son–of–BOSS transaction would work and of the legal theories behind it. Although Mr. Myers did not know all of the details of the transaction, the record does not indicate that he shared this fact with Mr. Carroll. Rather, Mr. Myers formed the opinion that the transaction was "legitimate [and] proper", and he did share this opinion with Mr. Carroll. He advised Mr. Carroll that the transaction looked like a viable way to resolve CCFH's low basis dilemma. [882]

For these reasons, the CNT Investors court concluded that "[t]o Mr. Carroll, a tax and financial layperson, Mr. Myers would have appeared ideal, not simply competent, to advise him on the feasibility and implications of the basis boost transaction." [883]

Here, however, Sam's and Charles' purported reliance on French presents a situation entirely different from that of CNT Investors. French's clients, Sam and Charles, were enormously sophisticated businessmen who knew that French was not qualified to give them tax advice on their highly complex offshore system. Moreover, the evidence unquestionably establishes that French did not believe himself qualified to advise the Wylys on the complicated tax issues raised by their offshore system—that is why he chose to consult actual tax specialists on the Wylys' behalf in order to insure that the tax aspects of their offshore system were properly analyzed and competent advice was given.

As just noted, whether Sam and Charles (and Dee derivatively) could reasonably rely on French's alleged advice about the offshore system comes down to a facts and circumstances analysis of their situations. And, as found at the outset of this section of the opinion, after considering those facts and circumstances, the Court finds that Sam and Charles (and Dee derivatively) could not rely on French's alleged tax advice because: (i) French was not competent to give them such advice as he did not have sufficient tax expertise for them to 508 reasonably rely on him, and (ii) French did not give them any tax advice of his own—his alleged tax advice was entirely derivative of the tax advice provided by Tedder, Chatzky, and/or Lubar. [884]

Returning to the issue of French's competence, the Court finds that French was not competent to give the Wylys' tax advice upon which they could reasonably rely for several reasons. First, French was not a tax lawyer; he was a securities lawyer, as Evan, Sam, and he testified. [885] In French's own words, his role in relation to the Wylys was "basically a business adviser," [886] and was certainly not that of a tax lawyer—"I'm not the tax lawyer. I'll take that disclaimer again, okay." [887] In Sam's words: "I don't recall [French] being concerned about tax things. He was a securities lawyer, basically. He was concerned about disclosures to the SEC and things like that, I think, were his primary mission." [888]

Second, the sheer complexity of the Wylys' offshore system made it necessary for French to consult with true tax experts as opposed to attempting to engage in his own tax analysis of the offshore system. That French was not competent to give the Wylys tax advice on the offshore system is corroborated by what he did when faced with uncertainties about the tax consequences associated with the 1992 IOM trusts and the annuity transactions undertaken offshore—i.e., he sought a second opinion from Lubar, a highly credentialed international tax lawyer, both in 1993 and in 1997. [889] This is exactly what the Wylys 509 expected French—who Sam described as "sort of the coordinator or the commander of the lawyers"—to do; find the best in the business in order to get the job done. [890] As the Court previously found, French's decision to seek a second opinion from Lubar confirms that: (i) French had lingering concerns about Tedder's legal opinion (ghostwritten by Chatzky) concerning the tax consequences to the Wylys of the 1992 annuity transactions undertaken by Sam and Charles through the Bulldog IOM Trust and the Pitkin IOM Trust, respectively, [891] and (ii) French had no specialized tax knowledge with which to evaluate the proper status of the offshore trusts and the tax consequences flowing from the Wylys' 1992 annuity transactions.

Third, by the time the offshore system was established, both Sam and Charles had many years of experience engaging in highly sophisticated financial transactions. The idea that businessmen as sophisticated as the Wyly brothers could think it was reasonable to rely on a securities lawyer for tax advice regarding their labyrinthine offshore system is not credible. Sam and Charles trusted French as their general counsel, but they knew he was no tax lawyer, as Sam testified: "I don't recall [French] being concerned about tax things. He was a securities lawyer, basically. He was concerned about disclosures to the SEC and things like that, I think, were his primary mission." [892] Both Sam and Charles understood that any alleged tax advice they got from French was a distillation of what actual, experienced tax lawyers had told him, and nothing more. As French described himself when asked to confirm that he was not a tax lawyer, he stated: "[t]hat's right, but I knew what the tax lawyers said we needed to do." [893]

[57] This brings us to the second reason that the Court finds that Sam and Charles (and Dee derivatively) cannot rely on French in order to establish reasonable cause or a lack of fraudulent intent—i.e., the record does not show that French actually gave any independent tax advice to the Wylys regarding the tax treatment of their offshore system, or at least any independent tax advice upon which they actually relied. The evidence in the record is that most independent investigations into the offshore system French undertook were related to securities law issues, not tax law issues. [894] French's role regarding the offshore system was akin to that of a 510 general counsel. [895] In the Wylys' eyes French took the lead on legal matters; but, the Wylys also recognized that "taking the lead" more often than not involved bringing in specialist lawyers who knew more about a given area of the law than French. [896] True to this form, French's "tax advice" about the offshore system consisted of relaying the opinions of Tedder, Chatzky, and/or Lubar to Sam and Charles. As the CNT Investors court pointed out, whether an advisor evaluates a transaction himself and forms his own opinion independent of representations of promoters is very important in determining whether a taxpayer can rely upon that advice.[897] Here, it is clear that (i) the initial tax analysis of the 1992 IOM trusts and annuity transactions originated with Tedder and Chatzky, not French,[898] (ii) Lubar provided a second, and very different, opinion regarding the tax consequences of the 1992 IOM trusts from that provided by Tedder and Chatzky, and (iii) Lubar was the real architect of the 1994 and 1995 generations of trusts,[899] although Lubar had no way of knowing that the facts he was told by French to assume were true for purposes of his advice were not true.

Although Evan testified that French worked "as kind of a double-check on the 511 other attorneys that worked on the project as well and, you know, wrote trusts and wrote annuities,"[900] and that French—far from warning Sam and Evan that there were problems with the 1992 IOM trusts in fact recommended that the Wylys create them—this testimony means less than it might seem to at first glance.[901] First, Evan is not a disinterested witness.[902] Second, as already found, French's "double-checking" consisted of (i) conferring with Bean, one of his tax partners at Jackson Walker who said that while it was aggressive, Tedder's annuity scheme "might work" but that Jackson Walker would not issue such a legal opinion —obviously not a rousing endorsement of the scheme,[903] and (ii) conferring with Lubar, an expert international tax attorney who disagreed with Tedder's and Chatzky's advice, after the 1992 IOM trusts were already established.

Regarding the 1994 and 1995 IOM trusts, it is even clearer that French did not independently bless or double-check those structures. In fact, French's conduct with respect to the establishment of these trusts is highly suspect. French told Lubar to assume certain facts as true that he knew were not true; and then, when Lubar issued advice to the Wylys on how to structure the 1994 and 1995 IOM trusts as foreign grantor trusts to King and Cairns (non-resident aliens of the United States) rather than Sam and Charles based upon those erroneous facts, French proceeded to try to "paper" the transactions in a way that these trusts would "fit the mold" Lubar described, through the drafting of false documents and not insuring that these trusts were actually funded 512 by the purported grantors, King and Cairns, as the trust documents required.[904]

After a close examination of the record, the Court was only able to uncover one piece of arguably independent tax advice that French gave to the Wylys regarding the offshore system—i.e., that their use of the IOM trusts and corporations as their personal piggy bank could lead to grave tax consequences. French testified repeatedly during the trial in the SEC Action that he told the Wylys—and especially Sam—that controlling the offshore system, for example by using it to purchase assets for use by members of the Wyly family, could have adverse tax consequences.[905] As French testified during the SEC Action, his warnings regarding exercising control over the offshore trusts and corporations did not change Sam's or Charles' behavior at all.[906] Thus, Sam and Charles chose to not follow the one piece of arguably independent tax advice that French may have given them. In the end, however, the Court finds that even this advice was not French's independent advice, as he himself admitted:

> Q. You're not a tax lawyer, right?
> A. That's right, but I knew what the tax lawyers said we needed to do.[907]

As French himself admitted, he was not a tax lawyer, and the Wylys cannot credibly claim that they viewed him as such.

For all of these reasons, the Debtors cannot reasonably rely upon any alleged tax advice they claim French gave them with regard to the offshore system as part of their reasonable cause defenses.

F. Were Gifts Made to the Wylys' Children?

The parties have stipulated to the transactions that are alleged to constitute gifts here. As to Sam:[908]

> Sam Wyly and the IRS stipulate and agree that the property transferred for which the IRS claims gift, tax liability for each of the 2000 through 2005 calendar years is [1] the cash used for the purchase, maintenance, improvement and upkeep of the Cottonwood I and Cottonwood II > real estate properties, and [2] the cash and other assets that were transferred into the Cayman LLCs.

As to Dee: [909]

> [Dee] & Charles and the IRS stipulate and agree that the property transferred for which the IRS claims gift, tax liability [1] for each of the 2001 through 2005 calendar years is cash used for the purchase, maintenance, improvement and upkeep of the Stargate Sport Horse and the Little Woody (LL Ranch) real estate properties, and [2] for the 2010 calendar year the discharge of a promissory note due to Caroline Dee Wyly from the Caroline D. Wyly Irrevocable Trust.

With these stipulations in mind, the Court will discuss the relevant standards it must 513 use to determine whether a gift, was made, before analyzing Sam's alleged gifts and then Dee's alleged gifts.

1. The Relevant Standards

a) Defining a Gift

[58] As initial support for its gift theory, the IRS argues, and this Court agrees, that the term "gift" is to be broadly construed to cover all transactions in which property or property rights are gratuitously bestowed upon another by whatever means effected. [910] As explained in the Treasury Regulations, gifts need not be wholly gratuitous, but may also include other transfers: [911]

> Transfers reached by the gift tax are not confined to those only which, being without a valuable consideration, accord with the common law concept of gifts, but embrace as well sales, exchanges, and other dispositions of property for a consideration to the extent that the value of the property transferred by the donor exceeds the value in money or money's worth of the consideration given therefor. However, a sale, exchange, or other transfer of property made in the ordinary course of business (a transaction which is bona fide, at arm's length, and free from any donative intent), will be considered as made for an adequate and full consideration in money or money's worth. A consideration not reducible to a value in money or money's worth, as love and affection, promise of marriage, etc., is to be wholly disregarded, and the entire value of the property transferred constitutes the amount of the gift.

[59] Moreover, transactions within a family group are subject to special scrutiny, including a presumption that a transfer between family members is a gift. [912] In Kimbell v. U.S., [913] the Fifth Circuit held, in the context of an intra-family asset sale, that:

> In Wheeler, [914] the government argued that the requirement that a sale be "bona fide" takes on heightened significance in intrafamily transfers and this court agreed. Based on this heightened scrutiny, we concluded that a court should inquire beyond the form of a transaction between family members to determine whether the substance justified the claimed tax treatment. However, we made it clear that just because a transaction takes place between family members does not impose an additional requirement not set forth in the statute to establish that it is bona fide. A transaction that is a bona fide sale between strangers must also be bona fide between members of the same family. In addition, the absence of negotiations between family members over price or terms is not a compelling factor in the determination as to whether a sale is bona fide, particularly when the exchange value is set by objective factors. In summary, the Wheeler case directs us to examine whether "the sale ... was, in 514 fact a bona fide sale or was instead a disguised gift or a sham transaction."

The Court finds that the heightened scrutiny standard in Kimbell and Wheeler is applicable to the transactions at hand, as each entity and individual involved in the transactions is Wyly affiliated and/or Wyly controlled.

On the other hand, the Debtors argue that there are seven factors that must be satisfied before a gift can be found to have been made: (i) a donor is competent to make the gift, (ii) a donee is capable of accepting the gift, (iii) there is a clear and unmistakable intention on the part of the donor to absolutely and irrevocably divest himself of the title, dominion, and control of the subject matter of the gift in praesenti, (iv) there is an irrevocable transfer of the present legal title and of the dominion and control of the entire gift to the donee, so that the donor can exercise no further act of dominion or control over it, (v) there is a delivery by the donor to the donee of the subject of the gift or of the most effectual means of commanding the dominion of it, (vi) there is acceptance of the gift by the donee, and (vii) the donor did not receive full and adequate consideration for the transfer of the property.[915] Although they will be addressed in detail below, the Debtors generally argue that (i) they lacked the legal capacity to gift assets that are owned by the various IOM or domestic entities, (ii) they did not intend to make gifts of the assets, and (iii) the children never understood the assets to be gifts.

b) Determining the Underlying Substance of the Transaction

[60] In furtherance of its argument, the IRS also relies upon the general tax principal that the incidence of taxation depends upon the substance of a transaction, rather than its form,[916] as embodied in the judicial doctrines of economic substance, substance over form, and step-transaction, which the Court will explain in turn.

(1) The Economic Substance Doctrine

In Klamath Strategic Inv. Fund ex rel. St. Croix Ventures v. U.S.,[917] the Fifth Circuit delineated a three-part test for determining whether a transaction has sufficient economic substance to be respected for tax purposes. Specifically, whether the transaction: (i) has economic substance compelled by business or regulatory realities, (ii) is imbued with tax-independent considerations, and (iii) is not shaped totally by tax-avoidance features.[918] As explained by the Fifth Circuit in Southgate Master Fund, L.L.C.,[919]

> [61] In other words, the transaction must exhibit objective economic reality, a subjectively genuine business purpose, and some motivation other than tax avoidance. While these factors are phrased in the conjunctive, meaning that the absence of any one of them will render the transaction void for tax purposes, there is near-total overlap between the latter two factors.

[62] Overall, "[t]he economic substance doctrine seeks to distinguish between 515 structuring a real transaction in a particular way to obtain a tax benefit, which is legitimate, and creating a transaction to generate a tax benefit, which is illegitimate."[920]

[63] As to the first Klamath factor, transactions lack objective economic reality if they do not vary, control, or change the flow of economic benefits.[921] This is an objective inquiry into whether the transaction either caused real dollars to meaningfully change hands or created a realistic possibility that they would do so.[922] That inquiry must be conducted from the vantage point of the taxpayer at the time the transaction occurred, rather than with the benefit of hindsight.[923] As to the remaining factors, the Fifth Circuit explained in Southgate Master Fund, L.L.C.[924] that:

> [t]he latter two Klamath factors ask whether the transaction was motivated solely by tax-avoidance considerations or was imbued with some genuine business purpose. These factors undertake a subjective inquiry into whether the taxpayer was motivated by profit to participate in the transaction. Tax-avoidance considerations are not wholly prohibited; taxpayers who act with mixed motives, seeking both tax benefits and profits for their > businesses, can satisfy the business-purpose test.

(2) The Substance Over Form Doctrine

[64] The substance over form doctrine provides that the tax consequences of a transaction are determined based on the underlying substance of the transaction rather than its legal form. As explained by the Fifth Circuit in Southgate Master Fund, L.L.C.:[925]

> [65] [66] [67] Where, as here, we confront taxpayers who have taken a circuitous route to reach an end more easily accessible by a straightforward path, we look to substance over form and tax the transactions for what realistically they are. A court is not bound to accept a taxpayer's formal characterization of a transaction, even a transaction that has economic reality and substance. The major purpose of the substance-over-form doctrine is to recharacterize transactions in accordance with their true nature.

(3) The Step Transaction Doctrine

[68] Similar to the doctrines of economic substance and substance over form, the step-transaction doctrine permits a court to collapse various steps in a transaction to determine its true purpose. As explained by the Fifth Circuit in Security Indus. Ins. Co. v. U.S.,[926]

> [69] [70] [71] Under the step transaction doctrine, the tax consequences of an interrelated series of transactions are not to be determined by viewing each of them in isolation but by considering them together as component parts of an overall plan. When considered individually, each step in the series may well escape taxation. The individual tax significance of each step is irrelevant, however, if the steps when viewed as a 516 whole amount to a single taxable transaction. Taxpayers cannot compel a court to characterize the transaction solely upon the basis of a concentration on one facet of it when the totality of circumstances determines its tax status.

Courts in the Fifth Circuit utilize two tests when determining whether to apply the step-transaction doctrine—the "end results" test and the "interdependence" test.[927] As further explained by the Fifth Circuit in Security Indus. Ins.:[928]

> [72] [73] The test most often invoked in connection with the application of the step transaction doctrine is the "end result" test. Under this test, purportedly separate transactions will be amalgamated into a single transaction when it appears that they were really component parts of a single transaction intended from the outset to be taken for the purpose of reaching the ultimate result. As the Fifth Circuit has noted, when cases involve a series of transactions designed and executed as parts of a unitary plan to achieve an intended result, the plans will be viewed as a whole regardless of whether the effect of doing so is imposition of or relief from taxation.
> [74] [75] A second test for determining whether the step transaction doctrine applies is labeled the "interdependence" test. This test focuses on whether the steps were so interdependent that the legal relations created by one transaction would have been fruitless without a completion of the series. When it is unlikely that any one step would have been undertaken except in contemplation of the other integrating acts, step transaction treatment may be deemed appropriate.

With these standards in mind, the Court will now focus on the alleged gifts made by Sam to his children, before turning to Dee's alleged gifts.

2. Understanding the Transactions Alleged to be Gifts by Sam to His Children

An overview of the transactions that allegedly resulted in gifts from Sam to his children are discussed above, see pp. 396–98, 406–07, 425–28, supra. However, due to the complexity of the transactions, certain of those facts are discussed again below for ease of reference.

a) Formation and Funding of the Cayman LLCs

On June 1, 2001, six Cayman Island Exempted Corporations were formed and were wholly-owned by the Bessie IOM Trust—Orange L.L.C. ("Orange"), FloFlo L.L.C. ("FloFlo"), Bubba L.L.C. ("Bubba"), Pops L.L.C. ("Pops"), Balch L.L.C ("Balch"), and Katy L.L.C. ("Katy" and collectively the "Cayman LLCs").[929] According to Evan and Hennington, the Cayman LLCs were established so that Sam's six children could each track a portion of Bessie IOM Trust's assets for educational purposes.[930] The Cayman LLC's were funded via loans of cash and assets from 517 Security Capital, which Security Capital had to borrow from other Wyly IOM corporations.[931] Specifically, in June 2001, East Baton Rouge Limited (IOM), East Carroll Limited (IOM), Moberly Limited (IOM), and Yurta Faf Limited (IOM),[932] transferred a number of financial assets to Greenbriar Limited (IOM),[933] which, in turn, loaned the assets it received, together with additional financial assets of its own, to Security Capital in return for a promissory note from Security Capital to pay Greenbriar Limited (IOM) $55,815,672.03.[934] Then, once it had liquidity, Security Capital immediately loaned approximately $8,300,000 to FloFlo and $9,500,000 to each of Balch, Bubba, Katy, Pops, and Orange.[935] Between June 2001 and December 2004, Security Capital made subsequent loans to each of the six Cayman LLCs such that, by the end of 2004, FloFlo owed approximately $9,700,000 to Security Capital, and each of Balch, Bubba, Katy, Pops, and Orange owed approximately $11,100,000 to Security Capital.[936] The "loans" were comprised of various assets consisting of cash, stocks, and investments.[937]

Boucher described the structure of the Cayman LLC's to Sam in a fax dated May 8, 2001:[938]

> The sub-funds will be Cayman LLC's [sic] as subsidiaries of the IOM Trusts. They will not be formal appointments out of the overall trust and will be revocable. They exist as a sub-fund via an informal understanding with the trustee whereby we account for these entities separately and liaise with particular family members regarding the underlying assets.

> Note that Laurie and Kelly both end up with relatively low liquidity. On a fairly short term basis, Kelly will need liquidity to fund construction costs of their home on Two Mile Ranch [n/k/a Rosemary Circle R Ranch]. Laurie also will need near term liquidity for renovation/reconstructions of the Mi Casa property in Dallas. I suggest either reducing or eliminating allocations of particular investments to them now, or leaving the allocations as is, requiring Laurie and Kelly to decide what to sell when the liquidity needs arise. I don't see a problem with them selling assets back to the overall trust, or in the market when the need arises.

The Cayman LLCs were subsequently formed and one share of each was issued to John Dennis Hunter,[939] although the record does not reflect who Mr. Hunter is or his relationship to the Wylys. Assets were then transferred to the Cayman 518 LLC's, but were "allocated" to Sam's children, who were ultimately in charge of managing the assets contained in the Cayman LLC associated with him or her via the procedure described by Boucher and/or direct ownership of certain entities, as will be discussed below.

A list of the Cayman LLCs, each associated child, and a general overview of the assets transferred to the applicable Cayman LLCs follows.

Cayman LLC	Associated Child	Assets Held/Allocated
Orange	Evan	• Percentage of Spitting Lion Limited (IOM) (which indirectly owned 99% of a home in University Park, Texas purchased for Rosemary Acton). • Percentage of Cottonwood Ventures II Limited (IOM) (which indirectly owned condos and office space on 2nd Floor of Paragon Building, Aspen). • Percentage of Rosemary Circle R Ranch Limited (IOM) (which indirectly owned approximately 98% of the Wyly family ranch near Aspen called Rosemary Circle R Ranch f/k/a Two Mile Ranch). • Varying interests in cash, investments funds, and securities.
Pops	Lisa	• Percentage of Spitting Lion Limited (IOM) (which indirectly owned 99% of a home in University Park, Texas purchased for Rosemary Acton). • Percentage of Cottonwood Ventures II Limited (IOM) (which indirectly owned condos and office space on 2nd Floor of Paragon Building, Aspen). • Percentage of Rosemary Circle R Ranch Limited (IOM) (which indirectly owned approximately 98% of the Wyly family ranch near Aspen called Rosemary Circle R Ranch f/k/a Two Mile Ranch). • Varying interests in cash, investments funds, and securities.
FloFlo	Laurie	• Percentage of Mi Casa Limited (IOM) (which indirectly owned 99% of a residence in Dallas, Texas in which Laurie lives with her family). • Percentage of Spitting Lion Limited (IOM) (which indirectly owned 99% of a home in University Park, Texas purchased for Rosemary Acton). • Percentage of Cottonwood Ventures II Limited (IOM) (which indirectly owned condos and office space on 2nd Floor of Paragon Building, Aspen). • Percentage of Rosemary Circle R Ranch Limited (IOM) (which indirectly owned approximately 98% of the Wyly family ranch near Aspen called Rosemary Circle R Ranch f/k/a Two Mile Ranch). • Varying interests in cash, investments funds, and securities.
Bubba	Kelly	• Percentage of Cottonwood I Limited (IOM) (which indirectly owned approximately 90% of the first floor of the Paragon Building in Aspen, where Kelly runs an art gallery). • Percentage of Spitting Lion Limited (IOM) (which indirectly owned 99% of a home in University Park, Texas purchased for Rosemary Acton). • Percentage of Cottonwood Ventures II Limited (IOM) (which indirectly owned condos and office space on 2nd Floor of Paragon Building, Aspen). • Varying interests in investments funds and securities.
Balch	Andrew	• Percentage of Cottonwood Ventures II Limited (IOM) (which indirectly owned condos and office space on 2nd Floor of Paragon Building, Aspen). • Percentage of Rosemary Circle R Ranch Limited (IOM) (which indirectly owned approximately 98% of the Wyly family ranch near Aspen called Rosemary Circle R Ranch f/k/a Two Mile Ranch). • Varying interests in cash, investments funds, and securities.

b) The Real Estate Holdings

As shown by the above chart, ownership interests in companies that held interests in real estate were a substantial asset of 520 each Cayman LLC.[940] These interests were generally held as follows (for property that was to be used personally by a Wyly family member): Bessie IOM Trust established and wholly owned an IOM entity. Then, the IOM entity and one or more members of the Wyly family (usually in a 97–99% to 1–3% ratio of the asset purchase price, respectively) would settle the domestic management trust. The domestic management trust would then form a domestic LLC that would (i) be managed by one or more members of the Wyly family, and (ii) purchase and hold title to the real estate.[941] In 2001, shares in the IOM entity were transferred from Bessie IOM Trust to the relevant Cayman LLC and the assets were allocated to the associated child.[942]

The structure used for investment in business use property was slightly different.[943] In that instance, the domestic management trust was replaced with a domestic corporation and an S corporation over which a Wyly family member was president. The domestic corporation would own a large percentage of a domestic LLC managed by a Wyly family member, with the remaining percentage being owned by a Texas S corporation with a Wyly family member as president.[944]

At trial, Pulman, a Meadows Owens partner involved in the structuring of the real estate transactions, explained the premise for this highly complex ownership structure.[945] As Pulman testified, a disadvantage of a foreign grantor (such as King in the case of the Bessie IOM Trust and the Tyler IOM Trust) owning property in the U.S. is that if that grantor dies, the interest in the U.S. property becomes subject to U.S. estate taxes.[946] To avoid this happening, the foreigner sets up a foreign corporation, and the foreign corporation makes the investment in U.S. real estate; therefore, when the foreigner dies, the property is not subject to U.S. estate tax.[947] This explains the involvement of the IOM entity in the real estate transactions.

According to Pulman, the issue then became, since the IOM trust does not own the property directly, but through a foreign corporation, there could be imputation 521 of income as a constructive dividend.[948] To avoid this, a Wyly family member would become a 1% grantor in the domestic grantor trust. Pulman testified that this would make the Wyly family member and the foreign corporation joint-tenants under state law, entitling both to full use of the property without the underlying tax implications.[949] According to Pulman, the management trusts were structured to expressly permit each co-grantor the right to use the real estate.[950]

Several pieces of real estate were purchased under the personal use structure, including (i) the residence in Dallas, Texas, where Laurie and her family live, which is owned by Mi Casa LLC (Texas), (ii) the residence in University Park, Texas, where Rosemary Acton lived, which is owned by Spitting Lion LLC (Texas),[951] (iii) the home(s) on Rosemary Circle R Ranch outside Aspen occupied by Lisa, Laurie, and Kelly,[952] and (iv) the second floor of the Paragon Building in Aspen Colorado, which is owned by Cottonwood Ventures II LLC (Colorado). In each instance, the ownership and management structure resulted in a Wyly family member having control, at least initially, over how the property was occupied.

For example, Laurie wished to purchase a home in Dallas using the structure she used to build a second home on Rosemary Circle R Ranch, again utilizing offshore funds.[953] As noted previously, Laurie did not ask any IOM trustee if he thought an IOM trust would be interested in investing in a home for her family to occupy, but instead asked her Dad if it was ok to use the Colorado structure in Dallas to acquire property and then build a home for her family to live in using offshore funds.[954] Once Sam approved the concept, Laurie began communicating with the Wyly family office, but never spoke to anyone offshore.[955] Under the Meadow Owens structure, Laurie contributed $10,000 for a 1% share of the Mi Casa Management Trust (US).[956] In return, she picked a property, razed the existing structure, and hired architects 522 and contractors to build the home her family would occupy.[957] Nearly $1 million in offshore funds were initially used on the project.[958] After FloFlo was formed in June 2001, the Mi Casa property was "allocated" to Laurie.[959] Although the testimony showed that some portion of Mi Casa Limited (IOM) was then transferred from Bessie IOM Trust to FloFlo, there is no evidence of when in 2001 the transfer occurred or what percentage was transferred.[960] Laurie serves as the trustee of the Mi Casa Management Trust (US) and as the manager of Mi Casa LLC (Texas).[961]

A similar series of events resulted when Evan, Laurie, Lisa, and Kelly wished to use offshore funds to purchase a home for their mother to live in.[962] The facts underlying this transaction are discussed in detail above, see pp. 425–28, supra, and will not be repeated here. But, in short, in return for a $9,000 contribution for a 1% share of the Spitting Lion Management Trust (US), Ms. Acton was permitted to live in the home purchased by Spitting Lion LLC (Texas) for the remainder of her life, despite the fact that she was not a beneficiary of the Bessie IOM Trust.[963] As of June 1, 2001, Spitting Lion Limited (IOM) was owned by Orange, Pops, FloFlo, and Bubba,[964] and allocated to each of Evan, Lisa, Laurie, and Kelly (Sam and Rosemary's children).[965] Ms. Acton and Lisa served as co-trustees of the Spitting Lion Management Trust (US), as well as the managers of Spitting Lion LLC.[966] Ms. Acton has since passed away.[967] On January 1, 2013, Evan's daughter McCary was added as a 1% co-grantor of the Spitting Lion Management Trust (US) and now lives in the home under the same rent-free structure her grandmother had enjoyed.[968]

This structure was also used in connection with the Rosemary Circle R Ranch 523 property near Aspen Colorado, when Laurie, Lisa, and Kelly built homes on the Sam Wyly family ranch using offshore funds.[969] As of June 1, 2001, Rosemary Circle R Ranch Limited (IOM) was owned by Orange, Pops, FloFlo, Bubba, Balch, Katy, and Bessie IOM Trust, and allocated equally among Sam's six children.[970]

The "Cottonwood Ventures" properties consist of a set of condominium units on two floors of a commercial office building in downtown Aspen, Colorado, known as the Paragon Building. The first floor condominium unit (Unit 1), which is referred to by the parties as "Cottonwood Ventures I," is used by Kelly to operate two art galleries. The second floor condominium units (Units 4 and 7), referred to by the parties as "Cottonwood Ventures II," are used as an apartment and an office.[971] The Cottonwood Ventures properties differ from the Mi Casa, Spitting Lion, and Rosemary Circle R Ranch properties in that the record reflects substantial offshore funds were invested in the Cottonwood Ventures properties after their initial purchase.

Cottonwood I Limited (IOM) was established on July 14, 2000 and was wholly owned by the Bessie IOM Trust.[972] Cottonwood Ventures I LLC (Colorado) was formed in July 2000,[973] and it purchased the Cottonwood Ventures I property on August 14, 2000.[974] Cottonwood Ventures I LLC (Colorado) is owned by Cottonwood Gallery Inc. (Nevada) (89.3%) and Wyly Works (10.7%), a Texas S Corporation wholly-owned by Kelly.[975] As of June 1, 2002, Cottonwood I Limited (IOM) was owned by Bubba and the Bessie IOM Trust and allocated to Kelly.[976] If the Court finds that Sam made gifts of cash related to the Cottonwood Ventures I property, Sam and the IRS stipulate that the amount of the gift totals $2,855,000.[977]

Cottonwood II Limited (IOM) was established on July 14, 2000 and was wholly owned by Bessie IOM Trust.[978] Cottonwood Ventures II, LLC (Colorado) was formed in July 2000,[979] and it purchased the Cottonwood Ventures II property on August 14, 2000.[980] As of June 1, 2001, Cottonwood II Limited (IOM) was owned by Orange, Pops, FloFlo, Bubba, Balch, Katy, and Bessie IOM Trust,[981] and allocated 524 equally to Sam's six children.[982] Sam and Kelly served as the co-managing members of Cottonwood Ventures II LLC (Colorado).[983] If the Court finds that Sam made gifts of cash related to the Cottonwood Ventures II property, Sam and the IRS stipulate that the amount of the gift, totals $10,961,000.[984]

c) Liquidation of the Cayman LLCs

Moving forward, the Cayman LLC's were placed into voluntary liquidation in 2006. Sam's children (Evan, Lisa, Laurie, Kelly, Andrew, and Christiana) did not receive any proceeds from the liquidation of the Cayman LLCs,[985] and it appears that the only substantive effect liquidation had on the ownership structure for the domestic real estate was that the shares of the various IOM corporations that were formerly owned by the Cayman LLCs were returned to the Bessie IOM Trust.[986] Sam's children, however, retained full use and enjoyment of the real estate both pre-and post-liquidation of the Cayman LLCs, as they continued to own interests in the domestic entities each acquired with personal funds. The only evidence in the record regarding the other assets in the Cayman LLCs (cash, stocks, and investments) is that they were used to repay the loan to the applicable Cayman LLC from Security Capital.[987]

3. Analysis of Alleged Gifts Made by Sam

The IRS' arguments regarding the nature of the alleged gifts from Sam to his children are set forth in §§ 2–3 of its Pre–Trial Brief. From this briefing, the Court had difficulty understanding precisely what the gifts were. And, once the Computation Stipulations were filed shortly before closing argument, it became clear that the IRS was very troubled by the transfers of offshore (i) cash that was used to purchase, improve, and maintain the Cottonwood Ventures I and II properties, and (ii) cash and other assets into the Cayman LLCs. However, the precise legal theory or theories through which the IRS was attacking these transfers as "gifts" from Sam to one or more of his children was not crisply delineated.

Because the Court was unsure that it fully understood the IRS' theories as to Sam's alleged gifts, and it obviously felt the need to understand those theories before attempting to decide the legal issue of whether Sam made any "gift" on which he would owe gift, tax, it pressed the IRS for more precision during closing arguments. At that time, the IRS clarified that, with respect to the transfers of cash used for the purchase, maintenance, improvement, and upkeep of the Cottonwood Ventures I property, gifts from Sam to Kelly allegedly occurred when funds were transferred to Cottonwood Ventures I, LLC.[988] For the 525 Cottonwood Ventures II property, gifts from Sam to all six of his children allegedly occurred when the funds were transferred to Cottonwood Ventures II LLC.[989] With respect to Sam's alleged gifts to the Cayman LLCs, the IRS clarified during closing argument that the "gift" occurred when the Cayman LLCs were funded in June 2001.[990]

The Court will now analyze the "gifts" as clarified at closing by the IRS.

a) Cash Used to Purchase, Improve, and Maintain the Cottonwood Ventures I and II Properties

[76] As shown by the parties' stipulations, multiple millions of dollars were transferred from various IOM corporations to purchase, improve, and maintain the Cottonwood Ventures I and II properties.[991] The issue the Court must decide is if the transfers of cash from offshore for these purposes constitutes a "gift" from Sam to Kelly, in the case of the Cottonwood Ventures I property, or from Sam to each of his children, in the case of the Cottonwood Ventures II property.

In response to the IRS' gift arguments, Sam directs the Court to the factors it is to consider to determine if a gift occurred, including whether: (i) a donor is competent to make the gift, (ii) a donee is capable of accepting the gift, (iii) there is a clear and unmistakable intention on the part of the donor to absolutely and irrevocably divest himself of the title, dominion, and control of the subject matter of the gift in praesenti, (iv) there is an irrevocable transfer of the present legal title and of the dominion and control of the entire gift to the donee, so that the donor can exercise no further act of dominion or control over it, (v) there is a delivery by the donor to the donee of the subject of the gift or of the most effectual means of commanding the dominion of it, (vi) there is acceptance of the gift by the donee, and (vii) the donor did not receive full and adequate consideration for the transfer of the property.[992]

In this regard, Sam argues that factors (i), (iii), and (iv), which require Sam to be a "donor" who intended to and did irrevocably transfer present legal title, cannot be met because Sam did not own the assets he purportedly gifted.[993] In support of this argument, Sam cites to Short v. C.I.R.,[994] in which the tax court faced the issue of whether Short had made a charitable contribution of land to the State of 526 Delaware.[995] Citing to the general requirements for a gift detailed above, the tax court found that "[a]n objective inquiry must be made into the nature of the transaction to determine whether that which is labeled as a gift is in substance a gift."[996] Ultimately, the tax court found that Short was not entitled to a charitable contribution deduction because he failed to satisfy his burden of proving he possessed good legal title to the land he purportedly gifted.[997]

Using this rationale, Sam argues that he could not make a gift of the funds transferred from the IOM corporations because he never held legal title to the funds, as he had divested himself of dominion and control. Instead, according to Sam, the funds were held by various IOM corporations and domestic entities, which were, in turn, wholly owned or almost wholly owned, directly or indirectly, by the Bessie IOM Trust, over which the IOM trustee exercised dominion and control.

Thus, to determine whether Sam made a gift to his children, we must first examine whether Sam retained sufficient "dominion and control" over the offshore cash, and ultimately the property purchased, improved, and maintained with that cash; and, if so, did he sufficiently relinquish that dominion and control in order to make a gift, before moving on to the other factors (if necessary). As explained in the Treasury Regulations:[998]

> As to any property, or part thereof or interest therein, of which the donor has so parted with dominion and control as to leave in him no power to change its disposition, whether for his own benefit or for the benefit of another, the gift is complete. But if upon a transfer of property (whether in trust or otherwise) the donor reserves any power over its disposition, the gift may be wholly incomplete, or may be partially complete and partially incomplete, depending upon all the facts in the particular case. Accordingly, in every case of a transfer of property subject to a reserved power, the terms of the power must be examined and its scope determined.

As this Court previously found in analyzing the various badges of fraud related to Sam's underpayment of income taxes,[999] Sam never really gave up dominion and control over the assets held in the offshore system. Although IOM trustees were in place and held legal title to the offshore assets, those trustees never exercised independent judgment in administering the trust assets, instead taking every "wish" Sam expressed to heart and faithfully executing it as directed. Indeed, the real estate transactions detailed above are but a few examples of Sam exercising effective control over the offshore funds in such a way that he and his children could use and enjoy real property, and improvements to that real property, paid for with offshore funds on a rent-free basis to them and a tax-free basis to him.

As we have discussed previously, when Laurie wanted to purchase a home for her family to occupy in Dallas using offshore funds, she did not contact an IOM trustee, she asked Sam. Once Sam approved the transaction, the Meadows Owens structure was put in place with Hennington's and 527 Boucher's assistance, and apparently without a whimper from the trustee of the Bessie IOM Trust. The same is true when Evan, Laurie, Lisa, and Kelly wanted to purchase a home for their mother, Sam's first wife, using offshore funds. Everyone simply assumed that the trustee of the Bessie IOM Trust would go along once Sam's approval was received. And, of course, the IOM trustee did go along. For these reasons and those set forth on pp. 423–31, supra, the Court finds Sam's argument that he did not have sufficient dominion and control over the cash in the offshore system to gift it to his children wholly unpersuasive.

However, based on our record, and largely for the same reason, the Court cannot find that Sam made a gift of the cash used for the purchase, maintenance, improvement, and upkeep of the (i) Cottonwood Ventures I property to Kelly, or (ii) Cottonwood Ventures II property to each of his children. In short, while Sam may have let go of the cash from the offshore system so that the Cottonwood Ventures I and II properties could be purchased, improved, and maintained, he received an asset worth equivalent value back through (i) his control over the Bessie IOM Trust, which indirectly owns the majority interest in those properties, (ii) his control over Cottonwood I Limited (IOM), which is the sole shareholder of Cottonwood Gallery Inc. (Nevada), as it relates to the Cottonwood Ventures I property, and (iii) his status as Co–Manager of Cottonwood Ventures II, LLC (Colorado) as it relates to the Cottonwood Ventures II property, all of which will be explained more fully below.

[77] According to Treasury Regulation § 25.2511–2(b), a gift is complete only when the donor has "parted with dominion and control as to leave in him no power to change its disposition, whether for his own benefit or for the benefit of another." [1000] And, as explained above, a gift occurs only where, among other things, there is "a clear and unmistakable intention on the part of the donor to absolutely and irrevocably divest himself of the title, dominion, and control of the subject matter of the gift in praesenti" and an "irrevocable transfer of the present legal title and of the dominion and control of the entire gift to the donee, so that the donor can exercise no further act of dominion or control over it." [1001]

It is undisputed that cash from offshore was used to purchase the overwhelming majority interests in the Cottonwood Ventures I and II properties, along with the cash and other assets Kelly and Sam contributed. [1002] And, while Kelly and her siblings may have rent-free access to the Cottonwood Ventures properties, the simple truth is that they do not hold legal title to those properties and do not have the right to sell them and retain the proceeds upon a sale, except in accordance with the various LLC and trust agreements, which would entitle Kelly to a recovery of her investment upon liquidation and her percentage share of any profit. [1003]

528 First, the Court will examine the relevant governing documents as they relate to each of the Cottonwood Ventures I and II properties to determine whether Sam remains in control of those properties, starting with the Cottonwood Ventures I property owned by Cottonwood Ventures I LLC (Colorado). [1004] Cottonwood Ventures I LLC (Colorado) is managed by Kelly, [1005] and has Wyly Works (a Texas S corporation owned by Kelly) and Cottonwood Gallery Inc. (Nevada) as members. [1006] As manager of Cottonwood Ventures I LLC (Colorado), Kelly has the power to sell property of Cottonwood Ventures I LLC (Colorado), [1007] but needs the approval "of two-thirds (2/3)-in interest of the Members" in order to sell "all or substantially all of the Company's business, property and assets (with or without good will), other than in the usual and regular course of the Company's business." [1008] Importantly, Kelly can be replaced as manager by "Members holding a majority of the issued and outstanding Membership Interests entitled to vote." [1009] Wyly Works has a 10.7% membership interest in Cottonwood Ventures I LLC (Colorado) and Cottonwood Gallery Inc. (Nevada) has an 89.3% membership interest in Cottonwood Ventures I LLC (Colorado). [1010] Thus, by virtue of the size of its membership interest, Kelly cannot sell all or substantially all of Cottonwood Ventures I LLC (Colorado)'s assets outside of the normal course of business without the consent of Cottonwood Gallery Inc. (Nevada) and can be replaced as manager with or without cause by Cottonwood Gallery Inc. (Nevada). [1011] And, although Kelly is the president of Cottonwood Gallery Inc. (Nevada), she can be removed and replaced as president at any time by the board of directors. [1012] In turn, the directors can be removed and replaced at any time by the shareholders of Cottonwood Gallery Inc. (Nevada). [1013] The sole shareholder of Cottonwood Gallery Inc. (Nevada) is Cottonwood I Limited (IOM). [1014] Although there are no regulations or bylaws for Cottonwood I

Limited (IOM) in the record, what the record does show is that Cottonwood I Limited (IOM) is wholly owned by the Bessie IOM Trust, which is of course completely 529 controlled by Sam.[1015] Thus, in the end, Sam has total control over Cottonwood I Limited (IOM), which has total control over the directors of Cottonwood Gallery Inc. (Nevada), who in turn have total control over the management of Cottonwood Gallery Inc. (Nevada), which in turn has total control over the management of Cottonwood Ventures I LLC (Colorado), which owns the Cottonwood Ventures I property.

An even simpler analysis demonstrates Sam's continuing control over the Cottonwood Ventures II property after his alleged gift of cash was made to Cottonwood Ventures II LLC (Colorado), which used the cash (in conjunction with other funds) to buy the Cottonwood Ventures II property.[1016] Cottonwood Ventures II LLC (Colorado) is managed by Kelly and Sam, as co-managers,[1017] and has the Cottonwood II Management Trust (US) as its sole member.[1018] As co-managers, Sam and Kelly have the power to sell the property of Cottonwood Ventures II LLC (Colorado),[1019] but need the approval of its Member—Cottonwood II Management Trust (US)—to sell "all or substantially all the Company's property and assets (with or without good will), other than in the usual and regular course of the Company's business, without complying with the applicable procedures set forth in the [Colorado Limited Liability Company] Act."[1020] Sam and/or Kelly could be replaced as managers by Cottonwood II Management Trust (US).[1021] The initial trustee of Cottonwood Management Trust (US) was the Highland Trust Company.[1022] However, "SAM and/or KELLY if either is living and competent, and the Corporation" could remove and replace the Trustee.[1023] The "Corporation" in question was Cottonwood II Limited (IOM).[1024] Although there are no regulations or bylaws for Cottonwood II Limited (IOM) in the record, what the record does show is that Cottonwood II Limited (IOM) is wholly owned by the Bessie IOM Trust, which is of course completely controlled by Sam.[1025] Thus, Sam, 530 together with Cottonwood II Limited (IOM) (which he controls via Bessie IOM Trust), can unilaterally replace Highland Trust Company with a new trustee.[1026] This means that, in the end, Sam has total control over Cottonwood II Limited (IOM), which in turn has total control over who the trustee of the Cottonwood II Management Trust (US) is, and that trustee has total control over the management of Cottonwood Ventures II LLC (Colorado), which in turn has control over the Cottonwood Ventures II property.

Under these facts, the Court cannot find that Sam made a gift of cash to his children here. While the Cottonwood Ventures I and II properties were purchased using mostly offshore funds, Sam has never given up control over those properties after their purchase. While Kelly has been permitted by Sam to exercise control over those properties day-to-day, Sam can remove her at any time. Moreover, the fact that Kelly and her siblings may use the properties does not make them, or the cash used to purchase, improve, and maintain them, a gift. The Bessie IOM Trust still owns the overwhelming majority of the Cottonwood Ventures I and II properties, albeit indirectly.

[78] [79] The various judicial doctrines espoused by the IRS do not change this determination. As explained by the Fifth Circuit in Klamath,[1027] this Court must consider whether these transactions: (i) had economic substance compelled by business or regulatory realities, (ii) are imbued with tax-independent considerations, and (iii) are not shaped totally by tax-avoidance features. These factors are phrased in the conjunctive, meaning that the absence of any one of them will render the transaction disregarded for tax purposes.[1028] "Thus, if a transaction lacks economic substance compelled by business or regulatory realities, the transaction must be disregarded even if the taxpayers profess a genuine business purpose without tax-avoidance motivations."[1029]

[80] As to the first factor, the Court must make an objective inquiry from the taxpayer's vantage point at the time the transaction occurred as to whether the transaction either caused real dollars to meaningfully change hands or created a realistic possibility they would do so.[1030] Here, real money changed hands when the real estate was purchased from third parties. Although the record clearly reflects that Sam used the offshore system as his personal piggy bank, and the Court questions whether the various "loans" among the IOM corporations related to the Cottonwood Ventures I and II properties will 531 be repaid; in the end, these transactions resulted in the Bessie IOM Trust investing, albeit indirectly, in U.S. real estate, a transaction that has economic substance.

The remaining Klamath factors, which are a subjective inquiry into whether the parties to the transaction were motivated by any legitimate, non-tax business purpose,[1031] are met for similar reasons. Here, the motivation behind the transaction was to purchase real estate chosen and to be used by certain of Sam's children, which occurred through a structure devised by Meadows Owens.[1032] Granted, investing in U.S. real estate via the Meadows Owens structure may not be the most profitable of its investments, but in the end, the Bessie IOM Trust indirectly owns valuable real estate, controls the ultimate disposition of that real estate, and the direct and indirect owners of that real estate will share proportionally in the gains or losses in accordance with the governing documents. Although the Meadows Owens structure may have been implemented to minimize taxes to the beneficiaries or avoid taxation should the foreign grantor die, there is simply nothing in the record indicating that the investment lacked a business motivation or was made solely for tax avoidance purposes.

Despite this, the IRS asks the Court to sham the transaction on the general allegation that Sam's children were allowed to use the properties so they must have received a gift. The Court is simply not willing to so find based on the record before it. From this Court's perspective, the issue returns to whether Sam exercised sufficient dominion and control over the offshore system and its funds to make a gift, which he did, and whether he completed such a gift, which he did not.

The Court further finds that, in substance, the transactions were not Sam making a gift of cash to Kelly (or any other child). As explained above, while Sam may have given up control over the funds long enough that they could be used to purchase the Cottonwood Ventures I and II properties, he did not give those funds to his children nor did he give up control over the properties purchased, improved and maintained with those funds —i.e., the Cottonwood Ventures I and II properties. In essence, the funds were used to purchase a substitute asset still owned today by the Bessie IOM Trust, albeit indirectly. And, although Sam permits Kelly to use and manage the Cottonwood Ventures I and II properties day-to-day, and all of his children to use the Cottonwood Ventures II property, there is simply no evidence in the record supporting an inference that he gave his children the cash so they could buy the properties and hold legal title to them (indeed, no child has ever held legal property to either property). In short, none of Sam's children may individually or collectively dispose of the properties or direct the Bessie IOM Trust to dispose of the properties, and if the properties were sold, only Kelly would be entitled to a portion of the sale proceeds commensurate with her ownership interests. And, while offshore funds were also used to improve and maintain 532 the Cottonwood Ventures I and II properties, that does not make those funds a gift either, as the Bessie IOM Trust remains the overwhelming majority owner of the Cottonwood Ventures I and II properties, albeit indirectly, and owners normally spend money to improve and maintain their property.

A step-transaction analysis leads to a similar result. When the transactions are considered together as component parts of an overall plan, the non-gratuitous nature of the transaction becomes apparent. Sam controlled the offshore funds and, at his direction, those funds were used, along with monies contributed by Kelly in accordance with her percentage of ownership, to purchase the Cottonwood Ventures I and II properties, which properties Kelly (predominately) uses rent-free. But, even if the transactions were collapsed to a direct purchase of real estate by the Bessie IOM Trust and Kelly (as to the Cottonwood Ventures I property on a roughly 90% to 10% ratio and as to the Cottonwood Ventures II property on a roughly 98% to 2% ratio), the record still does not reflect that Sam parted with his ability to exercise dominion and control over the assets largely purchased with the offshore cash. In fact, it demonstrates that Sam still maintains control over the assets.

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, the Court finds and concludes that the cash used for the purchase, maintenance, improvement, and upkeep of the Cottonwood Ventures I and II properties was not a gift, by Sam to Kelly or any other of his children.

b) Cash and Other Assets that were Transferred Into the Cayman LLCs

[81] The second category of alleged gifts, "cash and other assets transferred into the Cayman LLCs," are comprised of transfers of (i) ownership interests in the IOM corporations that indirectly own U.S. real estate—Mi Casa Limited (IOM), Spitting Lion Limited (IOM), Rosemary Circle R Ranch Limited (IOM), Cottonwood I Limited (IOM), and Cottonwood II Limited (IOM) (collectively, the "IOM Real Estate Companies")—from Bessie IOM Trust to one or more of the Cayman LLCs, and (ii) cash, investments, and other financial assets to the Cayman LLCs. As alleged by the IRS, these gifts occurred when the "cash and other assets" were transferred into the Cayman LLCs in 2001.

(1) The Interests in IOM Real Estate Companies

Before June 2001, the Bessie IOM Trust owned 100% of the interests in the IOM Real Estate Companies, other than Rosemary Circle R Ranch (IOM) that was owned by both Bessie IOM Trust and Orange. [1033] In June 2001, the Cayman LLCs were formed and were wholly owned by the Bessie IOM Trust. [1034] Thereafter, but still in 2001, Bessie IOM Trust transferred some or all of its ownership interests in the IOM Real Estate Companies to one or more of the Cayman LLCs. Specifically, Bessie IOM Trust transferred: (i) its ownership of Spitting Lion Limited (IOM) to four of the Cayman LLCs —Orange, 533 Pops, FloFlo, and Bubba, [1035] (ii) a portion of its ownership of Cottonwood I Limited (IOM) to one Cayman LLC—Bubba, while retaining an ownership interest, [1036] (iii) a portion of its ownership of Cottonwood II Limited (IOM) to all six of the Cayman LLCs, while retaining an ownership interest, [1037] (iv) a portion of its ownership interests in Rosemary Circle R Ranch Limited (IOM) to all six of the Cayman LLCs, while retaining an ownership interest, [1038] and (v) an unknown portion of its ownership of Mi Casa Limited (IOM) to one Cayman LLC—FloFlo. [1039]

According to the IRS, Bessie IOM Trust's transfer of these ownership interests in the IOM Real Estate Companies to the Cayman LLCs identified above resulted in a gift from Sam, as grantor of the Bessie IOM Trust, [1040] to his children, for whose benefit the Cayman LLCs were established. The IRS argues that donative intent is shown because (i) although the Cayman LLC's were liquidated in 2006 and ownership of the IOM Real Estate Companies was returned to the Bessie IOM Trust, Sam's children still enjoy unfettered access to the underlying real estate, and (ii) both the interests in the IOM Real Estate Companies and the loans underlying those interests were transferred to the Cayman LLCs (in effect, cancelling each other out).

As an initial matter, the Court notes that the transfer of interests in the IOM Real Estate Companies did not involve multiple steps or loans among the various IOM corporations, but was instead a transfer directly from the Bessie IOM Trust to one or more of the Cayman LLCs. [1041] As a result, the step-transaction doctrine does not apply. The Court will, however, consider whether the transfers had economic substance or were, in substance, a gift. The Court answers both these inquiries in the negative, as it will now explain.

534 The Court finds that the transfers of ownership interests in the IOM Real Estate Companies from the Bessie IOM Trust to one or more of the Cayman LLCs lacked economic substance. It appears that the interests were merely moved from the Bessie IOM Trust to one or more of the Cayman LLCs in 2001, and then back to the Bessie IOM Trust in 2006 when the Cayman LLCs were liquidated, with no real discernable effect on anyone—business, tax, or otherwise. Simply put, the Court is unable to tell why this transfer occurred and what material effect, if any, it had on anyone or anything.

But, it is also true that there was no gift here to any of Sam's children. Even if this Court steps back and considers the overall substance of the 2001 ownership interest transfers in the IOM Real Estate Companies, the IOM Real Estate Companies were still owned by the Bessie IOM Trust at all times—either directly in part and indirectly in part or entirely indirectly. [1042] And, although Sam's children had unfettered access to the underlying real estate both before and after the Cayman LLCs were liquidated, this access was a result of the indirect ownership interests purchased by the respective Wyly family member(s), which was unaffected by the existence of the Cayman LLCs.

The Court is also not persuaded by the IRS' argument that Sam's donative intent is shown by the Cayman LLCs allegedly receiving both the ownership interests in the IOM Real Estate Companies and the account receivable related to the transfer of those interests. [1043] Although the IRS' argument is difficult to follow, the Court interprets the argument to be that, because the Cayman LLCs received both the ownership interests in the IOM Real Estate Companies and the alleged loan incurred to obtain the ownership interests, the transactions cancel each other out, resulting in a gift. The Court, however, disagrees. As explained above, the record simply does not support a finding that the Cayman LLCs received their ownership interests in the IOM Real Estate Companies via a loan from Security Capital. To the contrary, the interests were via a direct transfer from the Bessie IOM Trust. Thus, the IRS' argument on this point fails.

As alleged by the IRS, the gift here is the transfer of ownership interests in the IOM Real Estate Companies from Bessie IOM Trust to one or more of the Cayman LLCs in 2001. While those transfers occurred, the transfers were not a gift to one or more of Sam's children. As was the 535 case with the Cottonwood Ventures I and II properties, while Sam's children may have unfettered use of the real estate "allocated" to them, they (i) did not own an interest in any Cayman LLC (all of which were liquidated in 2006), and (ii) do not hold legal title to the underlying real property that they use and enjoy. The Bessie IOM Trust always owned the Cayman LLCs and has always owned the IOM Real Estate Companies since their formation, either directly or indirectly.[1044] On this record, the IRS has failed in its proof.

(2) Cash and Other Financial Assets Transferred to the Cayman LLCs

The second type of alleged gift is the cash and other financial assets that were transferred into the Cayman LLCs in 2001. As stipulated by the parties, it appears that the scope of these alleged gifts is comprised primarily, if not exclusively, of the assets loaned by Security Capital to the Cayman LLCs in June 2001.[1045] As stipulated by the parties, if the Court determines that Sam made gifts of the cash and other assets transferred in 2001, the amount of such gifts to each of the Cayman LLCs is as follows: (i) Orange, $10,753,278; (ii) Pops, $10,756,981; (iii) FloFlo, $9,045,676; (iv) Bubba, $7,944,666; (v) Balch, $10,758,263; and (vi) Katy, $10,758,217.[1046]

With respect to these transfers, the IRS urges this Court to find that the various "loans" among the IOM corporations, as well as the formation of the Cayman LLCs and the foreign and domestic trusts, were all sham transactions in furtherance of Sam's scheme to avoid taxes.[1047] With respect to the loans, the IRS cites to Miller v. C.I.R.,[1048] which held that the determination of whether a transfer was made with a real expectation of repayment or was a sham depends on all the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction, including whether: (i) there was a promissory note or other evidence of indebtedness, (ii) interest was charged, (iii) there was any security or collateral, (iv) there was a fixed maturity date, (v) a demand for repayment was made, (vi) any actual repayment was made, (vii) the transferee had the ability to repay, (viii) any records maintained by the transferor and/or the transferee reflected the transaction as a loan, and (ix) the manner in which the transaction was reported for Federal tax purposes is consistent with a loan.[1049] Unfortunately, after identifying the relevant facts to be considered, the IRS does not analyze them to any extent, but merely states:[1050]

> Here, there is no evidence to show that any of the obligations were paid and the notes have open maturity dates. There 536 is no indication that any interest was charged or paid. No demand for repayment was ever made. Finally, the ability to repay the loans is also questionable because the majority of the alleged loans were used to develop and maintain real estate, and therefore, there is no cash readily available to make payments on these alleged obligations. Instead, these appear to be nothing more than entries listed on the family financials balance sheet that served to paper over the gifts.

This quote was taken from the IRS' Amended Proposed Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law, which the Court directed be filed after the evidentiary record was closed so that all relevant record cites could be included for the Court's review. However, no supporting record cites were provided by the IRS for these proposed findings. The lack of record cites may be because there is nothing to cite to, as no testimony, promissory notes, or other documents detailing the alleged terms of the loans are found in the record. As noted previously, the IRS bears the burden to prove that Sam made a gift. If the record is deficient, it is the IRS' problem, not Sam's.

However, even assuming its proposed findings are supported by the evidence, the IRS still failed to show that the cash and other assets loaned to the Cayman LLCs by Security Capital were gifts by Sam to his children. In fact, there is nothing in the record indicating that Sam relinquished his dominion and control over the assets transferred to the Cayman LLCs, which is particularly apparent with Sam's two youngest children, Andrew (Balch) and Christiana (Katy). These children did not use offshore funds from the IOM corporations, the Cayman LLCs, or otherwise to purchase homes or other assets, and they are only mentioned in passing in the IRS' arguments. Overall, there is no credible evidence in the record demonstrating that any child exercised any control over the Cayman LLC "allocated" to him/her or the cash and other assets held by the Cayman LLCs.

While the Court is cognizant of the IRS' argument that the Cayman LLCs were only liquidated and their assets returned because Sam was under investigation by the SEC and audit by the IRS and had no other choice, the legal impact of that argument makes little sense here. As it relates to the Cayman LLCs, there was nothing for the children "to return" to the offshore system, as they never owned anything and nothing ever "left" the offshore system. The Bessie IOM Trust always owned the Cayman LLCs and it always owned the cash and other assets held in the Cayman LLCs, albeit indirectly.

For all of these reasons, the IRS has failed in its proof that any of the transfers they alleged constituted gifts were actually gifts from Sam to one or more of his children. Because the Court determines that Sam made no gifts as alleged by the IRS, the IRS' argument that Sam fraudulently failed to file gift tax returns related to these "gifts" is unavailing.

4. Understanding the Transactions Alleged to be Gifts by Dee to Her Children

With respect to Dee, the parties have stipulated that the alleged gifts are: (i) for each of the 2001 through 2005 calendar years, the cash used for the purchase, maintenance, improvement, and upkeep of the Stargate Horse Farm and Little Woody (LL Ranch) real estate properties, and (ii) for the 2010 calendar year, the discharge of a promissory note due to Dee from the Caroline D. Wyly Irrevocable 537 Trust."[1051] The Court will address these in turn.

c) Stargate Horse Farm

"Stargate Horse Farm" is a 95–acre property located in a rural area of Denton County, Texas, near the Dallas–Fort Worth metroplex, on which a state-of-the-art equestrian facility was built and operated to import, breed, train, and show internationally competitive sport horses.[1052] The background underlying Stargate Horse Farm is described in an October 16, 2000 memo from Boucher to Robertson and French:[1053]

> Charles is looking at establishing a breeding and equestrian training facility with Emily's involvement. A business plan has been presented, involving the acquisition of approximately 140 acres of land just north of DFW airport. Only 50 acres will be used for the business venture and it is likely that the remaining land will be subsequently sold. Keeley [Hennington] and I are consulting Rodney [Owens] to see if we can use a structure similar to that which was used for the gallery in Aspen, thus utilizing foreign assets for the cash injection and contributing Emily's horses in the same way Kelly contributed the gallery's inventory stocks. * * * I have not seen it yet, but understand the business plan indicates the business will not likely cash flow for the first few years, and will need ongoing capital. The anticipated initial commitment will be a minimum of $3 Million.

Meadows Owens set up the following ownership structure for Stargate Horse Farm.[1054] Tyler IOM Trust established and owned 100% of Stargate Farms Limited

(IOM), [1055] which in turn established and owned 100% of Stargate Horse Properties, Inc. (Nevada). [1056] According to the Joint Stipulations, Stargate Sport Horses, LP (Texas) was then owned by two partners: (i) Stargate Horse Properties, Inc. (Nevada), as the 98% limited partner, and (ii) Stargate Sport Horses Management LLC (Texas), which was wholly-owned by Emily, as the 2% general partner. [1057] Stargate Sport Horses, LP (Texas) purchased the underlying real estate, [1058] was the owner of record for the real estate and improvements, and also operated the equestrian facility located on the property. [1059]

As stipulated by the parties, from 2001 through 2005 Stargate Horse Properties, Inc. (Nevada) contributed approximately 98% of the funds required to acquire, construct, and operate Stargate Horse Farm, while Stargate Sport Horse Management LLC (Texas) contributed the remaining 538 2%. [1060] The funds contributed by Stargate Horse Properties, Inc. (Nevada) were transferred from Elysium Limited (IOM) and Soulieana Limited (IOM) to Stargate Horse Properties, Inc. (Nevada), which then transferred the funds to Stargate Sport Horses, LP (Texas). [1061] If the Court determines that Dee (and Charles) made gifts of cash related to the purchase, maintenance, improvement, and upkeep of Stargate Horse Farm, the aggregate value of those gifts is $12,715,000, as the parties stipulated. [1062]

When additional funds were needed to operate Stargate Horse Farm, the partners of Stargate Sport Horses, LP (Texas) contributed funds in accordance with the operating agreement. [1063] After the Senate investigation began, however, Stargate Horse Properties, Inc. (Nevada) failed to fund ongoing operations, which resulted in Emily making loans to Stargate Sport Horses, LP (Texas). [1064] When Stargate Horse Farm was sold in 2009, the sale proceeds were distributed in accordance with the operating agreement—creditors were paid in full, including the loans made by Emily, then the proceeds were split between the partners. [1065] In the end, the bulk of the net proceeds, approximately 91%, were returned to Stargate Farms Limited (IOM) through its ownership of Stargate Horse Properties, Inc. (Nevada). [1066]

As noted previously, the IRS alleges that Dee (and Charles) made gifts to Emily of all the cash used for the purchase, maintenance, improvement, and upkeep of Stargate Horse Farm, with the gift being complete when the funds were transferred to Stargate Sport Horses, LP (Texas), the entity controlled by Emily. [1067]

d) Little Woody (LL Ranch)

"LL Ranch," also known as Little Woody, is a 26–acre property with a residence near Aspen, Colorado that was initially acquired and owned by Little Woody, Ltd., a Texas limited partnership ("Little Woody, Ltd. (Texas)"). [1068] Little Woody, LLC (Colorado) was formed on October 22, 1999 [1069] and was initially wholly owned by Little Woody Creek Road Limited (IOM). [1070] In November 1999, the Little 539 Woody Management Trust (US) was established, with Emily contributing assets equating to a 1% share, Jennifer contributing assets equating to a 1% share, and Little Woody Creek Road Limited (IOM) contributing assets equating to a 98% share. [1071] In November 1999, Little Woody Creek Road Limited (IOM) contributed 100% of the membership interests in Little Woody, LLC (Colorado) to Little Woody Management Trust (US). [1072] Then, in March 2001, Little Woody, Ltd. (Texas) sold LL Ranch to Little Woody LLC (Colorado). [1073] Emily and Jennifer share a home built on the LL Ranch property. [1074]

From 2001 through 2004, Little Woody Creek Road Limited (IOM) contributed 98% of the funds transferred to Little Woody Management Trust (US), while Emily and Jennifer contributed 1% each of the funds transferred to Little Wood Management Trust (US). [1075] As stipulated by the parties, between 2001 and 2004, approximately $6.2 million was transferred from Little Woody Creek Road Limited (IOM) to Little Woody Management Trust (US), and then from Little Woody Management Trust (US) to Little Woody LLC (Colorado). [1076]

The IRS alleges that Dee (and Charles) made gifts to Emily and Jennifer of all the cash used for the purchase, maintenance, improvement, and upkeep of LL Ranch, with the gifts being complete when the funds were transferred to Little Woody LLC (Colorado).[1077] The aggregate value of those alleged gifts is $6,205,000.[1078]

5. Analysis of the Alleged Gifts Made by Dee

a) Cash Used for the Purchase, Maintenance, Improvement, and Upkeep of the Stargate Horse Farm and Little Woody (LL Ranch) Real Estate Properties

[82] As did Sam, Dee argues that the IRS failed to prove the necessary elements of a gift,[1079] including factors (i), (iii), and (iv), which require Dee to be a "donor" who intended to and did irrevocably transfer present legal title to the cash or the real property purchased, improved, and maintained with that cash. Pointing to the IOM trustees, Dee argues that she did not have legal title over the cash and assets held in the offshore system and, as such, did not have the legal capacity to make a gift of the funds to her daughters. The Court finds this argument far more persuasive coming from Dee than it did coming from Sam.

540 Although the record is replete with instances where Charles exercised dominion and control over the funds in the offshore system through his control over the IOM trustees[1080] that is simply not the case with Dee. The record is clear that, even though Dee purchased items that were paid for with offshore funds, she did not know that was happening. Charles had always provided very well for her and their family, and Highland Stargate generally paid the bills. As explained above, pp. 368, 407–08, 446 n. 573, supra, Dee did not discuss business with Charles, much less the complex offshore system he and Sam established in the IOM. Although Dee may have known there were offshore entities involved in the Wyly holdings, this Court is convinced that she never exercised control over those entities or would even know how to exercise control if she had wanted to do so. While Charles clearly had the ability to control the flow of funds and assets via "wishes" that were obeyed by the IOM trustees without question, there is nothing in the record to indicate that Dee held a similar power or even knew such a power existed. Based upon the record before it, the Court cannot find that Dee exercised sufficient dominion and control over the offshore funds so that she could gift them to her children.

Further, even if Dee could have gifted the assets, the record clearly shows that she did not, as the assets (whether in the form of cash or real estate) remained within the Wyly offshore system. It is undisputed that offshore cash was used to purchase the overwhelming majority interest in Stargate Horse Farm and the LL Ranch property, along with the cash and other assets that Emily contributed in the case of Stargate Horse Farm and the cash that Jennifer and Emily contributed in the case of LL Ranch. And, while Emily may have enjoyed day-to-day control over Stargate Horse Farm, the record clearly establishes that Charles retained control over the farm as a legal matter from the day it was purchased until it was sold[1081] and, upon its sale, the overwhelming majority of the net sale proceeds (approximately 91%) were distributed to Stargate Farms Limited (IOM).[1082] Moreover, while Jennifer and Emily may have rent-free access to the LL Ranch property and the home they built on that property, the simple truth is that they do not hold legal title to it and do not have the right to sell it and retain the proceeds upon a sale, except in accordance 541 with the Little Woody Management Trust (US) agreement.[1083]

Granted, while investing in U.S. real estate using the structure set up by Meadows Owens may not be the best business decision of the trustee of the Tyler IOM Trust (as controlled by Charles), it does not change the fact that, in the end, the trust owned the overwhelming majority of Stargate Horse Farm until it was sold and still owns the overwhelming majority of the LL Ranch property and the improvements made to it, albeit indirectly.

That the alleged recipients of the gifts did not/do not hold legal title to the real estate and did not/do not have the right to retain the proceeds upon a sale (except in accordance with their written agreements) is amply demonstrated by the sale of Stargate Horse Farm in 2009, which, as noted previously, resulted in the distribution of net sale proceeds in accordance with the various operating agreements, with approximately 91% of the funds returning to the IOM offshore system. Under these facts, the Court is hard-pressed to see how Dee could have made a gift to Emily, when the funds were returned to the IOM system in proportion to the parties' respective investments when Stargate Horse Farm was sold.[1084]

This same reasoning applies to Charles. Although the record shows that Charles exercised sufficient dominion and control over the offshore funds and assets to gift them, the Court finds that no such gift occurred. Simply put, there is nothing in the record showing that Charles parted with his dominion and control over the offshore funds and assets to make a gift of them to Emily, in the case of Stargate Horse Farm, and Jennifer and Emily, in the case of LL Ranch. In fact, as previously found with regard to Stargate Horse Farm, Charles retained control over the farm through his ability to control Stargate Horse Farms Limited (IOM) through his control over the trustee of the Tyler IOM Trust, which had total control over the appointment of directors of Stargate Horse Properties Inc. (Nevada), and these directors in turn had total control over the management of Stargate Horse Properties Inc. (Nevada), which in turn had total control over the management of Stargate Sport Horses LP (Texas), which in turn had control over the management of Stargate Horse Farm.[1085]

Similarly, Charles exercised total control over the LL Ranch property when the gift of cash, as alleged by the IRS, was made. To reiterate, according to the IRS, the gift here was the transfer of approximately $6.2 million of offshore funds to Little Woody LLC (Colorado), which used the cash to purchase, improve, and maintain the LL Ranch property. Little Woody Creek Road Limited (IOM) contributed that cash to Little Woody Management Trust (US) beginning in March 2001 and concluding in November 2004, which then transferred the cash, plus amounts contributed by Emily and Jennifer, to Little Woody LLC (Colorado).[1086] Little Woody Management Trust (US) owned 100% of Little Woody LLC (Colorado)[1087] and, 542 throughout that time period, Charles was the Manager of Little Woody LLC (Colorado),[1088] which owned the LL Ranch property.[1089] Moreover, Robertson and French were the initial Trustees of Little Woody Management Trust (US) when it was formed in March 1999[1090] and the Court reasonably infers that Robertson remained as Trustee when French's relationship with the Wylys ended in early 2001.[1091] So, throughout the period of time that the IRS' alleged gift was made by Charles to Emily and Jennifer, Charles remained in complete control of the cash initially and then the LL Ranch property and improvements made to that property by virtue of his complete control over the trustee of the Tyler IOM Trust, which controlled Little Woody Creek Road Limited (IOM), which in turn was the 98% grantor of the Little Woody Management Trust (US), whose trustee, Robertson, Charles controlled.

As noted previously, according to Treasury Regulation § 25.2511–2(b), a gift is complete only when the donor has "parted with dominion and control as to leave in him no power to change its disposition, whether for his own benefit or for the benefit of another."[1092] And, as explained above, a gift occurs only where, among other things, there is "a clear and unmistakable intention on the part of the donor to absolutely and irrevocably divest himself of the title, dominion, and control of the subject matter of the gift in praesenti" and an "irrevocable transfer of the present legal title and of the dominion and control of the entire gift to the donee, so that the donor can exercise no further act of dominion or control over it."[1093] That never occurred here with respect to either Stargate Horse Farm or the LL Ranch property.

Further, as was the case with Sam, the various judicial doctrines espoused by the IRS do not change these findings—as to either Dee or Charles. Even with the application of the substance over form, economic substance, and step-transaction doctrines, this Court must still make an independent assessment of whether the legal elements of a gift exist, which they do not. Because Dee did not have the legal capacity to make a gift of the offshore funds to her daughters, the Court need not consider whether the transaction had economic substance because, fundamentally, a person cannot gift what they do not own (whether via legal title or, in the case of Sam and Charles, de facto control).

Thus, for the foregoing reasons, the Court finds and concludes that Dee did not make a gift to (i) Emily of the funds used for the purchase, maintenance, improvement, and upkeep of Stargate Horse Farm, and (ii) Emily and Jennifer of the 543 funds used for the purchase, maintenance, improvement, and upkeep of the LL Ranch property. The IRS has failed in its proof.

b) The Promissory Note Due to Dee from the Caroline D. Wyly Irrevocable Trust

(1) Overview of the Transaction

Stargate, Ltd. ("SGL"), a Texas limited partnership, was formed effective as of December 15, 1992 under the name Brush Creek, Ltd.[1094] Bush Creek, Ltd.'s Partnership Agreement was subsequently amended to (i) change the entity's name from Brush Creek, Ltd. to SGL, and (ii) reflect Dee's and Charles' additional contributions of various assets, including options in Michaels Stores and Sterling Software and a life insurance policy.[1095] The new contributions were valued at $44,343,615.[1096] Prior to September 30, 1999, SGL's general partners were Dee and Charles (1.02668%), and its limited partners were Dee (47.37276%), Charles (46.16672%), and Dee and Charles' children and grandchildren and trusts set up for their respective benefits (aggregating 5.43384%).[1097]

Between 1993 and 2007, varying amounts were loaned by SGL to Dee and Charles on an unsecured basis.[1098] As reflected on Dee's bankruptcy schedules (Schedule F), $28,080,127.92 was outstanding on this loan to Charles and her as of the date she filed her Case (the "Unsecured Loan").[1099] The note receivable related to the Unsecured Loan was reflected in SGL's financial statements, and the note payable was reflected on Dee and Charles' personal balance sheet.[1100]

Near the end of 1999, Dee and Charles implemented a multi-step estate planning program involving their limited partnership interests in SGL (the "Estate Planning Transactions"). On October 21, 1999, Dee and Charles executed a Marital Agreement dated effective September 30, 1999, pursuant to which they partitioned the community ownership of their limited partnership interests in SGL.[1101] Also effective September 30, 1999, Dee sold her now-separate property limited partnership interests in SGL to a newly created trust—The Caroline D. Wyly Irrevocable Trust (the "CDW Irrevocable Trust").[1102] 544 In return, the CDW Irrevocable Trust issued to Dee a Secured and Partially Guaranteed Promissory Note in the amount of $26,054,111.00 (the "CDW Irrevocable Note").[1103] Also in connection with this transaction, Dee's children executed a Specific Guarantee Agreement,[1104] pursuant to which they guaranteed repayment of specified amounts of the CDW Irrevocable Note in exchange for a yearly fee, and the CDW Irrevocable Trust executed a Pledge Agreement whereby it pledged to Dee its newly-acquired limited partnership interest in SGL.[1105]

At this same time, Charles entered into substantially similar transactions, transferring his now-separate property limited partnership interests in SGL to The Charles J. Wyly Irrevocable Trust (the "CJW Irrevocable Trust" and, together with the CDW Irrevocable Trust, the "Irrevocable Trusts") in exchange for a promissory note in the amount of $25,487,656 (the "CJW Irrevocable Note" and, together with the CDW Irrevocable Note, the "Irrevocable Notes").[1106] After the sale, Dee and Charles remained SGL's general partners (1.01854%) and the CDW Irrevocable Trust (46.99734%), the CJW Irrevocable Trust (45.97945%), and Dee and Charles' children and grandchildren and various trust established for their benefit (6.00467%) were the limited partners.[1107]

Stargate Investments (Texas) was formed on October 15, 1999.[1108] The Charles J. Wyly, Jr. Family Trust and The Caroline D. Wyly Family Trust (together, the "Revocable Trusts") served as both general partners (each holding 1%) and limited partners (each holding 49%) of Stargate Investments (Texas).[1109] As reflected in the partnership agreement for Stargate Investments (Texas), Dee and Charles contributed assets valued at $98,424,589[1110] to it, including their right to receive future payments under (i) all annuity agreements[1111] between each of them 545 and the various IOM corporations, (ii) the CDW Irrevocable Note, and (iii) the CJW Irrevocable Note.[1112]

Generally under this structure, Dee and Charles would make payments to SGL on account of the Unsecured Loan.[1113] SGL would use those funds to make a distribution to its partners, including the Irrevocable Trusts.[1114] The Irrevocable Trusts would then use those funds to make payments to Stargate Investments (Texas) on account of the Irrevocable Notes.[1115] In turn, Stargate Investments (Texas) would make distributions to Dee and Charles via a deposit into their community property bank account.[1116]

According to the Debtors, the Irrevocable Notes were paid in full on October 25, 2010 utilizing the above payment structure, as indicated by the hand-written notation on each note.[1117] In this regard, Hennington testified that payments on the Irrevocable Notes were made either in cash or by book entries that tracked the payables and receivables of each individual and entity.[1118] Wyly Exhibit PA is a letter composed by Hennington and sent to Christina Pfiffner, the internal revenue agent auditing certain aspects of the Wyly offshore structure and transactions. According to Hennington, the letter provides all documents necessary to show payment in full of the Irrevocable Notes, including a schedule tracking all cash and book entry payments made on the Irrevocable Notes and supporting bank statements and record entries.[1119]

The IRS is not convinced that the Irrevocable Notes were repaid, arguing instead that the circular nature of the payments merely masked the fact that no actual value changed hands, resulting in a gift by Dee to the CDW Irrevocable Trust on October 25, 2010 when the CDW Irrevocable Note was allegedly discharged, but not really repaid.[1120] According to the IRS, the Irrevocable Trusts' ability to repay the Irrevocable Notes was wholly dependent upon Dee and Charles making payments on the Unsecured Loan, which payments would then circulate to the Irrevocable Trusts and be used to pay the Irrevocable Notes, ultimately returning to Dee and Charles. According to the IRS, the true nature of this transaction is driven home by the fact that Dee is unable to show an increase in her assets corresponding to the amounts allegedly repaid on the CDW Irrevocable Note. The IRS does not challenge the Estate Planning Transactions generally, just the fact that there 546 was no true repayment of the CDW Irrevocable Note.

A chart prepared by the parties depicting the ownership structure and the Charles and Dee Wyly Estate Planning Transactions, is attached to this Memorandum Opinion as Exhibit K.

(2) Analysis of the Alleged Gift Made by Dee

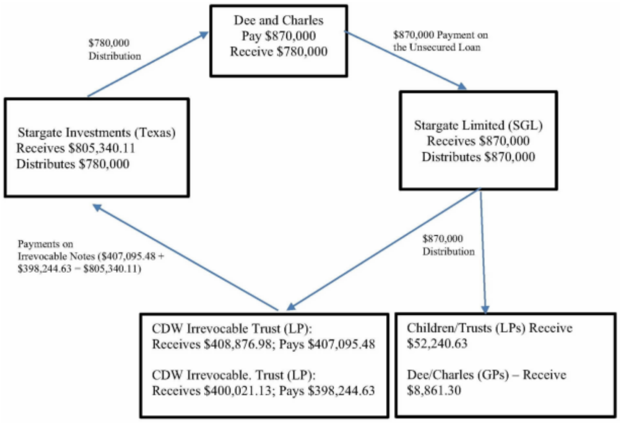
The Court initially struggled to understand the true implications of the circular transactions, as each step facially appears proper. Indeed, the IRS does not allege that (i) the Unsecured Loan was not owed by Dee and Charles to SGL, (ii) Dee sold her limited partnership interests in SGL for insufficient value, or (iii) the CDW Irrevocable Note was not a valid promissory note. Thus, the circular flow of funds seems appropriate, until one steps back to consider the overall effect.

Normally, when a person sells an asset, as Dee purported to do here—i.e., her limited partnership interests in SGL —the purchaser pays for what it bought with its own assets. But, that did not happen here. As the record shows (and as described below), the funds used to pay the CDW Irrevocable Note, which Dee received in exchange for her limited partnership interests in SGL, were funds Dee was entitled to receive from other sources prior to the Estate Planning Transactions. Thus, in repayment, Dee received no new value and the res of the CDW Irrevocable Trust was untouched. What did occur was that Dee "sold" her valuable limited partnership interests in SGL to the CDW Irrevocable Trust, which was established for the benefit of her children and grandchildren, without any corresponding benefit to her or tax being paid. These overriding facts must be kept in mind as we wade through the complexity of these transactions and whether they had economic substance as judged under the Klamath factors.

As to the first Klamath factor, the Court must make an objective inquiry from the taxpayer's vantage point at the time the transaction occurred as to whether the transaction either caused real dollars to meaningfully change hands or created a realistic possibility they would do so.[1121] Here, the record clearly reflects that the CDW Irrevocable Trust's ability to repay the CDW Irrevocable Note was wholly dependent on Dee and Charles making a payment on the Unsecured Loan, which was owed by them well before they undertook the Estate Planning Transactions. In fact, the CDW Irrevocable Trust bank account that was used to repay the CDW Irrevocable Note had a zero balance prior to the trust receiving its first distribution from SGL in January 2000.[1122] And, once a distribution was made, it flowed through the system, both paying down the Unsecured Loan and paying off the CDW Irrevocable Note.

To illustrate, the Court will trace the first payment made on the Irrevocable Notes through the record. Sometime on or before January 11, 2000, Dee and Charles made an $870,000 payment to SGL on the Unsecured Loan.[1123] SGL then allocated all of those funds among its partners,[1124] and on January 11, 2000, distributed $408,876.98 to the CDW Irrevocable Trust and $400,021.13 to the CJW Irrevocable 547

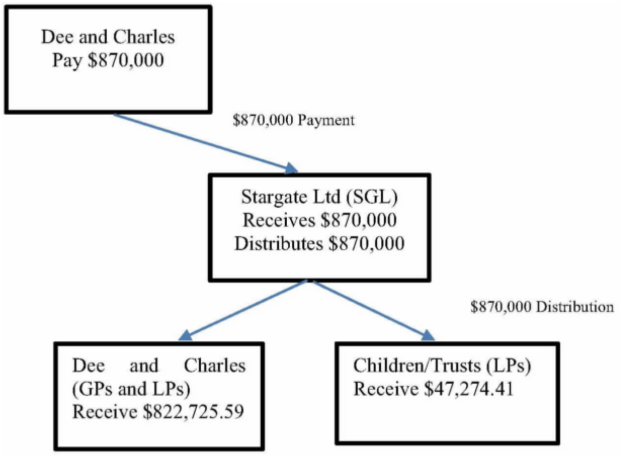
Trust[1125] (each account having a prior zero balance). That same day, the CDW Irrevocable Trust made a $407,095.48 payment to Stargate Investments (Texas) on the CDW Irrevocable Note, retaining $1,781.50,[1126] and the CJW Irrevocable Trust made a $398,244.63 payment to Stargate Investments (Texas) on the CJW Irrevocable Note, retaining $1,777.05.[1127] Then, on January 25, 2000, Stargate Investments (Texas) made a $780,000 distribution to Dee and Charles via a deposit into their community property bank account.[1128] Of the $81,138.70 that was not returned to Dee and Charles, $52,240.63 was distributed to the other limited partners of SGL, who are comprised mainly of the beneficiaries of the Irrevocable Trusts—i.e., Dee and Charles' children and grandchildren. The chart below depicts this flow of funds:



Dee and Charles
Pay $870,000
Receive $780,000
$780,000 Distribution
$870,000 Payment on the Unsecured Loan
Stargate Investments (Texas)
Receives $805,340.11
Distributes $780,000
Stargate Limited (SGL)
Receives $870,000
Distributes $870,000
Payments on Irrevocable Notes ($407,095.48 + $398,244.63 – $805,340.11)
$870,000 Distribution
CDW Irrevocable Trust (LP):
Receives $408,876.98; Pays $407,095.48
CDW Irrevocable. Trust (LP):
Receives $400,021.13; Pays $398,244.63
Children/Trusts (LPs) Receive $52,240.63
Dee/Charles (GPs) – Receive $8,861.30

This circular payment arrangement, with all funds used to repay the Irrevocable Notes originating with Dee and Charles (and mostly returning to Dee and Charles), can be traced consistently through the remaining 17 payments made on the CDW Irrevocable Note.[1129] Thus, 548 although the CDW Irrevocable Trust "repaid" a $26,054,111 note (through the circulation of funds originating from Dee and Charles), the corpus of the trust was unaffected and all value was preserved for its beneficiaries.

It bears noting how the $870,000 payment on the Unsecured Loan would have flowed before the Estate Planning Transactions. In that instance, Dee and Charles would make a payment to SGL on account of the Unsecured Loan. In turn, SGL would allocate the funds among its partners and make a distribution, with the bulk of the funds returning to Dee and Charles as SGL's general partners and majority limited partners.[1130]



Dee and Charles
Pay $870,000
$870,000 Payment
Stargate Ltd (SGL)
Receives $870,000
Distributes $870,000
$870,000 Distribution
Dee and Charles
(GPs and LPs)
Receive $822,725.59
Children/Trusts (LPs)
Receive $47,274.41

The ultimate outcome (money returning to Dee and Charles) is unchanged under either scenario (although more money is returned to Dee and Charles under the pre-Estate Planning Transaction structure), with the difference being ownership of Dee's (now former) limited partnership interests in SGL having been "sold" to the CDW Irrevocable Trust for the benefit of her children and grandchildren.

The Court understands that, due to Dee's and Charles' affiliation with all of these entities, these are "captive" transactions where money flows back and forth. That, standing alone, does not trouble the Court. What troubles the Court is that the captive system was gamed to get the best of both worlds—Dee's limited partnership interests were "sold" to the CDW Irrevocable Trust in exchange for the CDW Irrevocable Note; however, the CDW Irrevocable Trust's assets were not diminished in repayment of that note. Tellingly, the record shows that, after the Irrevocable Notes were marked paid in full on October 25, 2010, Dee and Charles did not make any further payments on the Unsecured Loan through at least December 549 31, 2011 (the last date shown on Wyly Exhibit PD, tracking the Unsecured Loan).[1131] Indeed the only post-October 2010 payment reflected in the record is a $20,000 payment on September 4, 2014.[1132]

[83] Simply put, there is nothing in the record objectively indicating that the payment transactions had any economic substance. The transactions did not materially vary control or change the flow of economic benefits[1133]—money merely took a more circuitous route when coming to/from Dee and Charles so that the CDW Irrevocable Note could be "repaid" without affecting the corpus of the CDW Irrevocable Trust.[1134] The Court finds that this outcome was a goal of the Estate Planning Transactions from the outset.

The remaining Klamath factors, which are a subjective inquiry into whether the parties to the transaction were motivated by any legitimate, non-tax business purpose,[1135] are also not met. Indeed, the Court cannot divine (nor does the record reflect), the business purpose behind Dee selling her limited partnership interests in SGL in return for funds she was already entitled to receive. Although parties are free to engage in estate planning, Dee's estate planning took the form of a sale for value,[1136] but that value was never truly paid by the purchaser.

Accordingly, the Court finds that the alleged payment of the CDW Irrevocable Note lacked economic substance and should be disregarded for tax purposes, resulting in a gift by Dee in an amount not greater than $50,756,841[1137] when the CDW Irrevocable Note was "discharged" on October 25, 2010.

Alternatively, the Court finds that the alleged repayment of the CDW Irrevocable Note should be recharacterized as a gift for tax purposes under the substance over form doctrine. Although Dee "sold" her limited partnership interests in SGL in exchange for the CDW Irrevocable Note; as detailed above, that note was never actually repaid by the purchaser. Instead, the CDW Irrevocable Note was simply marked paid in full when a sufficient number of circular "payments" were passed through the system. In accordance with the parties' stipulation, Dee's gift was in an amount not greater than $50,756,841.[1138]

(3) Is Dee Liable for Fraud Penalties on her Gift?

[84] Because the Court finds that Dee made a gift when the CDW Irrevocable 550 Note was "discharged," the Court must now address the IRS' allegation that Dee is liable for fraud penalties for her failure to file a related gift tax return.[1139] Since it is undisputed that Dee did not file a gift tax return for the 2010 tax year,[1140] 26 U.S.C. § 6651, not § 6663, is the applicable provision. The two statutes, however, share the same standard.[1141]

The IRS alleges that Dee deliberately chose not to file gift tax returns because she did not wish to disclose the existence of the offshore corporations and trusts.[1142] According to the IRS, the following badges of fraud support a finding of fraud against Dee here: (i) understatement of income by failing to report the transfers on income or gift tax returns, (ii) inadequate maintenance of records, and (iii) failure to file gift tax returns.[1143] Notably, these are several of the same badges of fraud that the IRS alleged in support of its argument that Dee should be held liable for § 6663 fraud penalties on income tax underpayments. And, for the reasons these badges fail to support a finding of fraud against Dee under § 6663, see pp. 389–462, supra, they similarly fail to support a finding of fraud against Dee under § 6651.

While Dee certainly signed the relevant documents, there is simply no persuasive evidence in the record that Dee understood how these very complicated Estate Planning Transactions worked, or was aware that they would result in her making a gift for which a gift tax return would be required. During trial, Dee credibly testified that she (i) was not involved in Charles' business affairs, (ii) never discussed business with him, and (iii) trusted him such that when he asked her to sign a document she would, without question. Although she did sign documents involved in the Estate Planning Transactions, she did so without reading them and in full reliance on Charles. To be clear, even if Dee had read them, the Court is satisfied that she would not have understood them or the gift tax consequences flowing from them.

Further, the Court is hard pressed to see how inadequate records were maintained for the Estate Planning Transactions. To the contrary, it appears that the IRS was provided with ample explanation and documentation regarding the Estate Planning Transactions. For example, Wyly Exhibit PA is a letter from Hennington to an internal revenue agent that lays 551 out how the alleged payments on the Irrevocable Notes were made and how funds flowed between the various entities, which was followed by the correspondence at Wyly Exhibit PB providing even more information. And, although the IRS has alleged specific instances where they had difficulty obtaining records related to the IOM trusts and corporations, the Estate Planning Transactions involved domestic entities for which no similar allegation was made.

Thus, for the reasons set forth above, as well as those set forth on pp. 389–462, supra, the Court finds that

Dee: (i) made a gift in the 2010 calendar year from the "discharge" of the CDW Irrevocable Note due to her by the CDW Irrevocable Trust in an amount not greater than $50,756,841,[1144] and (ii) is not liable for fraud penalties under 26 U.S.C. § 6651 related to her failure to file a gift tax return for the tax year 2010.

G. Are Penalties Owing for the Failure to File Forms 3520, 3520–A, and 5471?

1. Introduction

In addition to asserting that the Debtors are liable for income tax, gift tax, interest, and fraud penalties, the IRS argues that the Debtors are liable for what are described alternately as international penalties and failure to file penalties (collectively, the "International Penalties"). Although the Court will use the term International Penalties, both descriptions are correct. The International Penalties arise because of the Debtors' alleged failures to file with the IRS information about the various foreign trusts and corporations that comprise the Wyly offshore system. If applicable here, this information must be filed with the IRS pursuant to 26 U.S.C. §§ 6038 and 6048.

The Debtors make three primary arguments in opposition to the IRS' assertion that it is entitled to recover the International Penalties: (i) that, in many instances, the reporting obligations underlying the International Penalties are not applicable to them because the actions pointed to by the IRS as giving rise to the International Penalties were not violations of §§ 6038 and 6048, (ii) that they have reasonable cause defenses for any violations of §§ 6038 and 6048 they may have committed, and (iii) that the International Penalties are excessive fines under the Eighth Amendment of the Constitution, which should be declared unconstitutional as applied to them if they are both liable for the International Penalties and their reasonable cause defenses fail.

For the reasons explained below, the Court concludes that the Debtors did, in some instances, violate §§ 6038 and 6048, although annuity payments, loans, and real estate transactions originating from the Wyly offshore system did not need to be reported as trust distributions under § 6048(c) and cash sales of options did not need to be reported as transfers into foreign trusts under § 6048(a). The Debtors' reasonable cause defense and Eight Amendment arguments are addressed in separate sections of this Memorandum Opinion.

2. Statutory Overview

Before addressing the parties' particular arguments, an overview of the statutes that govern the International Penalties, 26 U.S.C. §§ 6038, 6048, and 6677, will be helpful. Section 6038 is a statutory mechanism for monitoring the dealings between a United States person and any foreign corporation, foreign partnership, or other 552 form of foreign business entity that such person controls.[1145] It mandates that "[e]very United States person shall furnish, with respect to any foreign business entity which such person controls, such information as the Secretary may prescribe ..." related to the nature of these controlled foreign business entities, their structure, and the transactions they undertake.[1146] This information is normally filed on an IRS Form 5471.[1147] If a taxpayer fails to file information about foreign business entities that he or she controls on Form 5471, § 6038(b) provides that "such person shall pay a penalty of $10,000 for each annual accounting period with respect to which such failure exists."[1148]

In slight contrast, § 6048 is concerned with monitoring the dealings between a United States person and foreign trusts.[1149] Under §§ 6048(a) and (c) a United States person must report: (i) his creation of a foreign trust,[1150] (ii) transfers of money or property to a foreign trust,[1151] or (iii) when he "receives (directly or indirectly) ... any distribution from a foreign trust."[1152] Information about these types of events is generally filed on an IRS Form 3520.[1153] Failure to report these types of events on a Form 3520 can result in International Penalties of $10,000 or 35% of the value of the property involved in the unreported transfer or distribution, whichever is greater,[1154] as provided in 26 U.S.C. § 6677(a).

Section 6048(b) also requires anyone who is treated as the owner of a foreign trust under the rules of subpart E of part I of subchapter J of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code (better known as the grantor trust rules of 26 U.S.C. §§ 671–679) (the "Grantor Trust Rules") to annually submit "such information as the Secretary may prescribe with respect to such trust for such year." [1155] It also requires anyone treated as the owner of a foreign trust under the Grantor Trust Rules to provide all required information to the IRS, to United States owners of the trusts, and to United States persons receiving distributions from the trusts. [1156] The annual information required to be filed by grantors of grantor trusts under § 6048(b) is usually provided on an IRS Form 3520–A. [1157] Failure to file a Form 3520–A can result in International Penalties of $10,000 or 5% of the gross value of the relevant trust's assets, whichever is greater, [1158] as provided in 26 U.S.C. § 6677(b). [1159]

553 As noted previously, the SDNY Court determined in the SEC Action that, as to Sam, the Bulldog IOM Trust, the Lake Providence IOM Trust, the Delhi IOM Trust, the Bessie IOM Trust, and the La Fourche IOM Trust are grantor trusts under the applicable Grantor Trust Rules, and this Court has accorded collateral estoppel effect to that determination. These trusts will be collectively referred to in this section of the opinion as the "Sam International Penalty Trusts." Similarly, the SDNY Court determined in the SEC Action that, as to Charles, the Pitkin IOM Trust, the Castle Creek IOM Trust, the Tyler IOM Trust, and the Red Mountain IOM Trust are grantor trusts under the applicable Grantor Trust Rules and this Court has accorded collateral estoppel effect to that determination. [1160] These trusts will be collectively referred to in this section of the opinion as the "Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts."

With this background in mind, we turn to the International Penalties at issue here.

a) § 6038 and Failures to File Form 5471

For the reasons explained more fully below, the Court concludes that Sam, Charles, and Dee violated § 6038 by failing to file Forms 5471 with respect to the various IOM corporations and/or Cayman LLCs owned by the Sam International Penalty Trusts and the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts. In fact, the Debtors do not seem to dispute the effect of the SDNY Court's determination that these trusts were Wyly grantor trusts on their respective obligations to have filed Forms 5471 under § 6038. But, even if they do, an analysis of the relevant statutes and regulations confirms their respective obligations to file Forms 5471 with respect to the foreign corporations the Sam International Penalty Trusts and the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts owned (collectively, the "Foreign Corporations"). [1161] According to 26 U.S.C. § 6038(a), a Form 5471 must be filed annually by every United States taxpayer "with respect to any foreign business entity which such person controls." [1162] It is undisputed that Sam, Charles, and Dee are United States taxpayers. Moreover, the parties have stipulated that the Foreign Corporations for which the IRS asserts that Forms 5471 should have been filed are all IOM corporations or Cayman LLCs that are wholly-owned subsidiaries of one of the Sam International Penalty Trusts or one of the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts. [1163] Thus, all that is left for this Court to decide relating to the Debtors' liability for International Penalties under § 6038(a) is whether the SDNY Court's determination that the Sam International Penalty Trusts and the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts are grantor trusts necessarily means that the Debtors controlled the 554 Foreign Corporations for purposes of § 6038. The Court concludes that it does, as explained below.

Section 6038 defines "[c]ontrol of corporation" for the purpose of Form 5471 filings:

> A person is in control of a corporation if such person owns stock possessing more than 50 percent of the total combined voting power of all classes of stock entitled to vote, or more than 50 percent of the total value of shares of all classes of stock, of a corporation.... For purposes of this paragraph, the rules prescribed by section 318(a) for determining ownership of stock shall apply. [1164]

Turning to 26 U.S.C. § 318(a)(2)(B)(ii), we see why the SDNY Court's grantor trust determinations lead to a finding of control under § 6038. Section 318(a)(2)(B)(ii) states that "[s]tock owned, directly or indirectly, by or for any portion of a trust of which a person is considered the owner under [the Grantor Trust Rules] shall be considered as owned by such person." [1165] The SDNY

Court determined that the Sam International Penalty Trusts and the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts are grantor trusts to Sam and/or Charles through application of the Grantor Trust Rules.[1166] Thus, taken together, these statutes dictate that Sam and Charles owned and thus controlled the Foreign Corporations for the purposes of § 6038 and reporting on Form 5471 because they are the grantors of the Sam International Penalty Trusts and the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts, respectively, one of which trusts owns each of the Foreign Corporations.

That leaves only Dee, who is also considered to "control" the Foreign Corporations for the purpose of § 6038. Under 26 U.S.C. § 318(a)(1)(A), "[a]n individual shall be considered as owning the stock owned, directly or indirectly, by or for ... his spouse."[1167] Thus, Dee is considered to own and control the Foreign Corporations because she was Charles' spouse, at least until the time of his death, when Charles' ownership interest passed to his probate estate. Under § 318(a)(2), "[s]tock owned, directly or indirectly, by or for a partnership or estate shall be considered as owned proportionately by its partners or beneficiaries"[1168] and "[s]tock owned, directly or indirectly, by or for a trust ... shall be considered as owned by its beneficiaries in proportion to the actuarial interest of such beneficiaries in such trust."[1169] Although 555 it has been represented to this Court in earlier proceedings in her Case that Dee is "the primary beneficiary" of Charles' probate estate, there is insufficient evidence in this record for the Court to determine whether Dee controls the Foreign Corporations by virtue of her status as a beneficiary of Charles' probate estate. Thus, § 318(a)(1)(A) and the evidence requires the Court to find that Dee controlled the Foreign Corporations at all times up until Charles' death, but not after Charles' death.

However, if Dee is considered a grantor of the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts, she "controls" the Foreign Corporations through her status as grantor.[1170] And, from this Court's perspective, Dee is also a grantor of the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts because those trusts were funded with community property. Under Texas law, property possessed by either spouse during marriage is presumed to be community property unless clear and convincing evidence establishes otherwise.[1171] No party has presented evidence that Charles funded the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts with anything other than community property. And, since the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts were presumably funded with community property, Dee is the grantor of these trusts to the same extent as Charles.

Dee does not argue otherwise. Rather, Dee's arguments focus solely on her defenses to her liability for the International Penalties—i.e., reasonable cause and excessive fines under the Eighth Amendment. In fact, Debtors' counsel waived any argument that Dee was not a grantor of the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts during closing argument.[1172] At that time, the Court asked Debtors' counsel to elaborate on the Debtors' side of the argument regarding contested issue of law D from the Joint Pre–Trial Order.[1173] Contested issue of law D reads as follows:

> Whether the District Court's finding in SEC v. Wyly that the IOM Trusts are "grantor trusts" applies to years after those in the SEC litigation, i.e., 2005–2013, if, as the United State alleges, the Debtors cannot identify material factual or legal changes relating to the IOM Trusts beyond 2004 (the final year addressed in the District Court's findings)?[1174]

Debtors' counsel answered the Court's question by stating that "... this ties into 556 a later question as well ... but—the only thing that happened after 2004 that could—could impact this is that Mr. Wyly passed away. That could have an impact on whether Dee Wyly is a grantor, but I don't think we're going to pursue that, so I don't think that's a live issue." The Court then replied by sating "Okay. So it's moot. Okay."[1175] Closing arguments then proceeded on to other questions on the Court's list, including one about contested issue of law CC from the Joint Pre–Trial Order and whether the parties had briefed it.[1176] Contested issue of law CC reads as follows:

> Whether Dee has any grantor tax liability for 2011, 2012, and 2013 since she was never a grantor and they ceased to be grantor trusts on Charles' death.[1177]

Debtors' counsel responded to the Court's question regarding this contested issue of law by stating "[t]hat's the one we just talked about." [1178]

[85] Thus, it is clear based on the statements of Dee's counsel in open court that Dee was no longer attempting to argue that she should not be treated as a grantor of the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts. As the Fifth Circuit has held, "a district judge must be able to winnow the issues for trial. This includes reliance on statements made by counsel in open court disavowing specific claims." [1179]

[86] For these reasons, the Court concludes that Sam, Charles, and Dee controlled the Foreign Corporations and were required to file Forms 5471 in accordance with 26 U.S.C. § 6038, which they did not do. This means that, absent a viable reasonable cause defense or relief under the Eighth Amendment, the Debtors are liable for International Penalties under § 6038(b) for their respective failures to file Forms 5471. [1180]

b) § 6048(b) and Failures to File Form 3520–A

[87] The Court next examines whether the Wylys violated § 6048(b) by failing to file Forms 3520–A regarding the Sam International Penalty Trusts and the Charles 557 and Dee International Penalty Trusts. As explained below, the SDNY Court's grantor trust determinations necessarily lead to the conclusion that § 6048(b) violations occurred when Forms 3520–A were not filed regarding the Sam International Penalty Trusts and the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts.

26 U.S.C. § 6048(b) provides that "[i]f, at any time during any taxable year of a United States person, such person is treated as the owner of any portion of a foreign trust under the [Grantor Trust Rules], such person shall submit such information as the Secretary may prescribe." [1181] Given the SDNY Court's determination in the SEC Action, to which this Court has given collateral estoppel effect, Sam and Charles are treated as the owners of the Sam International Penalty Trusts and the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts, respectively. Accordingly, Sam and Charles were required to file Forms 3520–A throughout the life of the Sam International Penalty Trusts and the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts, respectively. [1182] And, as just explained above, Dee is also treated as a grantor of the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts by virtue of the fact that community property was used to create those trusts and by virtue of the fact that her counsel conceded this issue during closing arguments.

Accordingly, under 26 U.S.C. §§ 6048(b) and 6677, Sam, Charles, and Dee are liable for penalties equal to the greater of $10,000 or 5% of the gross value of the Sam International Penalty Trusts' assets and the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts' assets, respectively, for each year that they failed to file a Form 3520–A unless they can establish a right to relief under the reasonable cause provisions of § 6677 or the Eighth Amendment. [1183] Since the value of the trust assets at issue here was enormous, the penalty in all instances will be equal to 5% of the gross value of the trusts' assets. [1184]

c.) § 6048(c) and Failures to File Form 3520

(1) In General

The Court now turns to the issue of whether the Debtors violated § 6048(c) by failing to report certain trust distributions, which analysis is more complicated. The IRS asserts that the Debtors are liable for International Penalties because they failed to file Form 3520 when they were required to do so under 26 U.S.C. § 6048(c). As noted above, § 6048(c) requires a Form 3520 to be filed "[i]f any United States person receives (directly or indirectly) during any taxable year of such person any distribution from a foreign trust." [1185] "Distribution" is not defined for the purposes of 26 U.S.C. § 6048(c). Black's Law Dictionary defines a trust distribution as "[t]he cash or other property paid or credited to a trust beneficiary." [1186] IRS Notice 97–34, the only existing and still valid regulatory authority that interprets § 6048 in any depth, states that "[e]xcept as otherwise provided below, a distribution from a foreign trust includes any gratuitous 558 transfer of money or property from a foreign trust, whether or not the trust is owned by another person." [1187]

Here, there are three different types of transactions that the IRS asserts should have been reported as "distributions" on Form 3520 for the purposes of 26 U.S.C. § 6048(c): (i) certain annuity payments received by Sam, Charles, and Dee; (ii) offshore funds used to purchase domestic real estate, and (iii) certain loans made to Sam, Charles, and certain Wyly-related entities.[1188] For the reasons explained more fully below, the Court concludes that (i) Sam, Charles, and Dee did not violate § 6048(c) by failing to report annuity payments as distributions, (ii) Sam, Charles, and Dee did not violate § 6048(c) by failing to report the use of offshore funds to purchase domestic real estate as distributions, and (iii) Sam, Charles, and Dee did not violate § 6048(c) by failing to report certain loans made to them and to Wyly-related entities as distributions. The Court reaches these conclusions in part based on its rejection of the IRS' invitation to apply the doctrines of substance over form, economic substance, and step transaction to these alleged distributions, as explained below.

(2) Annuity Payments

The IRS argues that Sam, Charles, and Dee should have reported the annuity payments they received from certain of the Foreign Corporations that had issued annuities to them on Forms 3520. According to the IRS, this is because the Foreign Corporations with the annuity obligations to them are wholly owned by one of the Sam International Penalty Trusts or the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts, and that by not reporting the annuity payments Sam, Charles, and Dee violated § 6048(c).[1189] The Court disagrees, as explained below.

Normally, income received as a result of an annuity transaction entered into between a foreign corporation and a United States taxpayer would not need to be reported on Form 3520 in order to satisfy § 6048(c). This is because such a transaction would not involve a gratuitous transfer from a foreign trust.[1190] Here, however, the IRS argues that the Wylys needed to report the annuity payments they received through the offshore system on Form 3520 for three reasons. First, the IRS argues that the text of § 6048(c) makes it clear that the Court may treat these annuity payments as if they came directly from foreign trusts despite the 559 fact that they actually issued from various of the Foreign Corporations that were wholly owned by one of the Sam International Penalty Trusts or one of the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts. Second, the IRS argues that IRS regulations indicate that the non-gratuitous nature of the annuities can be disregarded under § 6048(c). Third, the IRS argues that the application of the substance over form doctrine, the economic substance doctrine, or the step transaction doctrine[1191] make it clear that the private annuity transactions entered into by the Wylys were both (i) not true annuity transactions, meaning that the annuity "payments" were in fact gratuitous transfers to the Wylys, and (ii) were actually transactions entered into directly between Sam, Charles, and Dee on the one hand and the Sam International Penalty Trusts and the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts, respectively, on the other hand.

Conversely, the Debtors argue that the annuity payments cannot be reportable distributions under the statutory language for three reasons. First, the annuity payments received from the offshore system were not made by trusts, but rather by subsidiary IOM corporations owned by the applicable trust—i.e., one of the Foreign Corporations, and so the payments are not distributions "from a foreign trust" that are reportable under § 6048(c).[1192] Second, the Debtors argue that the annuity payments are not gratuitous, and that they therefore do not need to be reported as distributions.[1193] Third, the Debtors argue that they met any reporting obligation under § 6048(c) that does exist by reporting these annuity payments on their annual income tax returns. Each of the Debtors' arguments will be addressed in turn.

Returning to the Debtors' first argument—i.e., that the annuity payments were not made by a foreign trust but were rather made by a wholly owned corporation of a foreign trust—it is fair to say that the IRS and the Debtors read § 6048(c) differently. Pointing to the statute, the IRS notes that it requires reporting "[i]f any United States person receives (directly or indirectly) ... any distribution from a foreign trust."[1194] The IRS then argues that the Debtors misread § 6048(c)'s "directly or indirectly" language as modifying only "receives" and not "from a foreign trust;" and as encompassing only situations where a distribution "starts" in a foreign trust, travels through one or more intermediaries, and then ends up in the hands of a United States person. According to the IRS, the statutory language, "directly or indirectly," modifies both "receives" and "from a foreign trust," a reading that captures situations like this one where an entity that is wholly owned by a foreign trust makes a distribution to a United States person.

In order to decide which of these two readings of the statute is better, the Court must construe the language of § 6048(c). In 2015, the Fifth Circuit laid out the following "roadmap" for the type of statutory construction in which the Court must now engage:

> 560 The starting point in discerning congressional intent is the existing statutory text. When faced with questions of statutory construction, we must first determine whether the statutory text is plain and unambiguous and, if it is, we must apply the statute according to its terms. The parties disagree on whether the plain text of the statute needs to be found ambiguous before a canon of construction, such as ejusdem generis, can be applied.... In any case, there is no doubt that legislative history can only be a guide after the application of canons of construction. Only after application of principles of statutory construction, including the canons of construction, and after a conclusion that the statute is ambiguous may the court turn to the legislative history. For the language to be considered ambiguous, however, it must be susceptible to more than one reasonable interpretation or more than one accepted meaning.[1195]

[88] [89] As the Fifth Circuit has held, for statutory language to be ambiguous, "it must be susceptible to more than one reasonable interpretation or more than one accepted meaning."[1196] When a statute is not ambiguous, "the sole function of the courts—at least where the disposition required by the text is not absurd—is to enforce it according to its terms."[1197]

[90] [91] [92] [93] Moreover, while rules of grammar are helpful in interpreting statutes, "we should not be guided by a single sentence or member of a sentence; rather, we must look to the provisions of the whole law, and to its object and policy."[1198] Statutes should be interpreted as a whole rather than by just reading one isolated clause.[1199] Courts should "consider the text holistically, accounting for the 'full text, language as well as punctuation, structure, and subject matter.' "[1200] Courts do not review statutes "as a panel of grammarians," but neither do they "regard ordinary principles of English prose as irrelevant to a construction of those enactments."[1201]

With these principles of statutory construction firmly in mind, the Court turns to the text of the statute, which provides:

> If any United States person receives (directly or indirectly) during any taxable year of such person any distribution from a foreign trust, such person shall make a return with respect to such trust for such year which includes...[1202]

Again, the Debtors argue that the parenthetical phrase "directly or indirectly" modifies only the word "receives" in § 6048(c). The IRS argues that the parenthetical phrase "directly or indirectly" also modifies "from a foreign trust."

Initially, the Court notes that for the IRS' interpretation of § 6048(c) to be correct, 561 it seems that the statute should read as follows:

> 6048(c)—If any United States person receives (directly or indirectly) during any taxable year of such person any distribution from a foreign trust (directly or indirectly), such person shall make a return with respect to such trust for such year which includes.[1203]

The addition of a second "(directly or indirectly)" immediately after "from a foreign trust," if it appeared in the statute, would unquestionably support the IRS' interpretation. However, the statute does not contain this additional phrase. The phrase "directly or indirectly" is contained within a parenthetical in only one location in the statute. Placing modifying words within parentheses indicates a limiting or cabining effect. It would be at least somewhat unnatural to read a parenthetical phrase as expansively modifying multiple clauses in a sentence as opposed to only the clause that the parenthetical phrase follows.

Thus, it seems that a plain language reading of § 6048(c) unambiguously favors the Debtors' interpretation that "directly or indirectly" modifies only "receives" in § 6048(c). However, even if § 6048(c) is "susceptible to more than one reasonable interpretation or more than one accepted meaning" such that we need to apply canons of statutory interpretation, the IRS' reading is further weakened by application of these canons.[1204]

The canon of statutory construction called the last antecedent rule (the "Last Antecedent Rule") is relevant here. The Last Antecedent Rule is described in the following way by a widely cited treatise on statutory construction:

> Referential and qualifying words and phrases, where no contrary intention appears, refer solely to the last antecedent. The last antecedent is the last word, phrase, or clause that can be made an antecedent without impairing the meaning of the sentence. Thus a proviso usually applies to the provision or clause immediately preceding it. A qualifying phrase separated from antecedents by a comma is evidence that the qualifier is supposed to apply to all the antecedents instead of only to the immediately preceding one. As with all the rules of interpretation, the last antecedent rule is merely another aid to discover legislative intent or statutory meaning, and is not inflexible and uniformly binding. In general, then, where the sense of an entire act requires that a qualifying word or phrase apply to several preceding or even succeeding sections, the qualifying word or phrase is not restricted to its immediate antecedent.[1205]

An illustration of the Last Antecedent Rule in action is helpful. If, in order to get a pilot's license, a statute requires that an applicant "undergo a physical examination, obtain a passing score on a certification test, and complete forty hours of in-flight training within six months prior to submitting an application," there is an arguable ambiguity. Does "six months prior to submitting an application" modify all of the requirements, or only the in-flight training requirement? According to the Last Antecedent Rule, the answer is that it only modifies the in-flight training requirement. An applicant could obtain a passing score on a certification test eight months prior to submitting an application and still be eligible for a pilot's license, as long as she completed her forty hours of 562 in-flight training within six months prior to submitting her application.

Although the Last Antecedent Rule is not absolute, "and can assuredly be overcome by other indicia of meaning," it is nevertheless widely used.[1206] The Supreme Court has endorsed the Last Antecedent Rule, and reversed the Third Circuit's refusal to apply the rule because to do so would lead to what was viewed by the circuit court as an undesirable result in a case.[1207] The Fifth Circuit has also cited the Last Antecedent Rule as a canon of statutory construction,[1208] and has stated that the doctrine requires that "qualifying words, phrases, and clauses are to be applied to the words or phrases immediately preceding, and are not to be construed as extending to or including others more remote."[1209]

Achieving the IRS' reading of § 6048(c) requires us to ignore the Last Antecedent Rule. The Last Antecedent Rule counsels that "directly or indirectly" should modify only the word "receives" in § 6048(c) because this is the antecedent that immediately precedes "directly or indirectly." In contrast, the IRS wants to read the qualifying words "directly or indirectly" as modifying a postcedent that appears later on in the statutory text. Such a reading runs counter to the Last Antecedent Rule.

Another principle of statutory construction supports the Debtors' reading of § 6048(c)—i.e., the canon of resolving ambiguities in tax statutes, and especially tax statutes imposing penalties, in the taxpayers' favor. As the Supreme Court stated:

> [94] In the interpretation of statutes levying taxes it is the established rule not to extend their provisions by implication, beyond the clear import of the language used, or to enlarge their operation so as to embrace matters not specifically pointed out. In case of doubt they are construed most strongly against the government, and in favor to the citizen.[1210]

[95] [96] This maxim holds particularly true in the context of tax penalties, where the Supreme Court notes "one 'is not to be subjected to a penalty unless the words of the statute plainly impose it.' "[1211] The Fifth Circuit agrees that tax penalties should "be interpreted liberally in favor of the taxpayer and strictly against the Government."[1212] Although many of the 563 strongest pronouncements that tax statutes should be construed strictly in favor of the taxpayer come from older cases, the Fifth Circuit has also very recently stated that "if the words of a tax statute are doubtful, the doubt must be resolved against the government and in favor of the taxpayer."[1213] More recent tax court decisions also confirm that the doctrine of construing tax penalties strictly in favor of the taxpayer is alive and well.[1214]

The IRS' reading of § 6048(c) violates the canon of resolving ambiguity in tax penalty statutes in favor of the taxpayer and against the government. As the Court indicated in its analysis of the grammatical structure of § 6048(c), the IRS' reading of the statute is a strained one. Imposing penalties on the Debtors in the face of such a strained reading runs counter to the canon of statutory interpretation that resolves any such ambiguities in the taxpayer's favor.

[97] Thus, the Court concludes that the Wylys did not violate § 6048(c) by not reporting annuity payments they received from certain of the Foreign Corporations on Form 3520 because these annuity payments were not distributions "from a foreign trust" within the meaning of § 6048(c). But, there is another reason why the annuity payments did not need to be reported on Form 3520—they were not gratuitous transfers, as explained below.

The Wylys argue that private annuity payments are not reportable distributions under § 6048(c) because they are payments made pursuant to a contract as opposed to gratuitous transfers.[1215] Conversely, the IRS argues that the non-gratuitous nature of the annuity transactions should be ignored under 26 C.F.R. § 1.679–4(c).[1216]

The Court disagrees[1217] with the IRS because 26 C.F.R. § 1.679–4(c) applies "[s]olely for the purposes of this section."[1218] 26 C.F.R. § 1.679–4 and the statute it interprets, 26 U.S.C. § 679, discuss when a United States person who transfers property to a foreign trust will be treated as the owner of the portion of such trust attributable to such property.[1219] Specifically, § 1.679–4(b) discusses an exception to this rule for transfers for fair market value.[1220] Section 1.679–4(c) in turn discusses exceptions to this § 1.679–4(b) exception, i.e. certain supposedly fair market value transfers that will be ignored 564 for the purposes of 26 U.S.C. § 679.[1221] The function of these overlapping statutes and regulations is to ignore certain transactions for the limited purpose of determining whether a transferor of property to a foreign trust should be treated as an owner of any part of that trust. The IRS seeks to invalidate the annuity transactions on a much broader level than the one envisioned by 26 U.S.C. § 679 and 26 C.F.R. § 1.679–4.[1222]

The Court agrees with the Debtors' argument that the annuity payments here were not gratuitous transfers. In exchange for their indirect transfers of options and warrants to one of the Foreign Corporations, Sam, Charles, and Dee received a private annuity of equivalent value, a fact that the IRS did not contest at trial. The annuity obligations are documented in private annuity agreements. The applicable Foreign Corporation was/is contractually obligated to make the annuity payments at issue here. When payments were made to Sam, Charles, and Dee, it was pursuant to those agreements. On this record, there is no basis upon which to conclude that the annuity payments were gratuitous transfers, let alone gratuitous transfers from a foreign trust.

This brings us to the IRS' last argument—i.e., that the application of one of the various judicial doctrines —substance over form, economic substance, or step transaction—can transmute the Wyly annuity payments into a different, reportable type of transaction that is both (i) gratuitous, and (ii) ignores the role of the Foreign Corporations. The Court rejects the IRS' attempts to apply these doctrines in this context for the reasons explained below.

As the Court has noted in its gift analysis, the IRS has invoked the doctrines of substance over form, economic substance, and step transaction in a haphazard manner. The IRS raised the novel argument that both the annuities and the Foreign Corporations should be disregarded under these doctrines as it relates to the imposition of International Penalties for the first time in posttrial briefing. This is troubling, because the IRS' post-trial argument that the Foreign Corporations and annuities should be disregarded runs directly counter to positions taken by the IRS in (i) its Proofs of Claim, (ii) the Computation Stipulations, and (iii) statements made by its counsel in open court. For the reasons explained below, the IRS is foreclosed from arguing that either the Foreign Corporations or the annuities should be disregarded under the doctrines of substance over form, economic substance, or step transaction as it relates to the imposition of International Penalties.

After an enormous amount of work by both parties, the IRS and the Debtors entered into the Computation Stipulations, which resolved almost all issues regarding how to calculate the Debtors' income tax, gift tax, and penalty liability. The Computation Stipulations resolved the amount that the Debtors would owe to the IRS if this Court determined that they were liable for gift taxes or penalties; and definitively resolved the question of how much income tax the Debtors owe but for a few 565 ancillary issues.[1223] For example, the Computation Stipulations state:

> The Parties agree that, due to the Memorandum Opinion and Order issued in this Section 505 proceeding (docket numbers 789 and 791) relating to collateral estoppel and the classification of the Isle of Man trusts at issue in this proceeding, the IRS is not pursuing its alternative income tax position set forth in the POC that the IOM entities are shams or its alternative gift tax position that Debtors made gifts during the 1992 and 1996 calendar years. However, should that Memorandum Opinion and Order be reversed or otherwise overturned, the United States reserves its rights to pursue any and all alternative theories in the Debtors' 505 motions, including but not limited to the tax treatment of the offshore Isle of Man trusts, and any gift tax transactions involving the Isle of Man trusts.[1224]

As the language quoted above indicates, the parties' Computation Stipulations are based on calculations in the IRS' Proofs of Claim.[1225] These calculations, in turn, are based on the premise that income from the offshore system needed to be reported as "ordinary income under Subpart F of the Internal Revenue Code."[1226] Income under Subpart F of the Internal Revenue Code is income from a controlled foreign corporation.[1227] The IRS' alternative theory, upon which the Computation Stipulations were not based, was that

> [t]he foreign entities (the foreign trusts and the foreign corporations owned by foreign trusts), have been determined to be shams. The income from these sham foreign entities was required to be reported on the Debtor's individual income tax returns (Form 1040). The character of the unreported income is ordinary income, short term capital gains and long term capital gains.[1228]

The IRS' main and alternative theories are mutually exclusive. The main theory, which is embodied in the Computation Stipulations, expressly relies on the existence of the Foreign Corporations to support the existence of Subpart F income. The alternative theory, a theory that the IRS expressly disclaims in the Computation Stipulations, relies on the non-existence of the Foreign Corporations.

Now, in the context of their attempt to recover International Penalties, the IRS argues—without using the word "sham"—that the Foreign Corporations should be disregarded. As the Debtors point out in their own post-trial briefing, in asserting that the Foreign Corporations should be disregarded for the purposes of reporting distributions under § 6048(c), the IRS fails to mention that disregarding these entities would make any § 6038 penalties inapplicable (because there would be no controlled foreign corporations for which the Debtors failed to file Forms 5471) and would result in a much lower income tax 566 liability for the Debtors.[1229] The Debtors also point out—in the context of conflicting IRS arguments regarding the nature of real estate transactions the Wylys entered into utilizing offshore system monies—that the positions taken by the IRS in its post-trial briefing directly contradict those it takes in the Computation Stipulations.[1230]

The Court notes that the Fifth Circuit has opined that, as a general rule, "parties entering into stipulations during the course of a judicial proceeding are estopped to take positions inconsistent therewith."[1231] In addition, the Fifth Circuit held in Ergo Science, Inc. v. Martin[1232] that a district court did not abuse its discretion when it prevented a party from arguing a position that its counsel had expressly disavowed at an earlier point in the proceeding. The Fifth Circuit's reasoning for this conclusion was that "faced with a burgeoning docket and with a complex commercial lawsuit at hand, a district judge must be able to winnow the issues for trial. This includes reliance on statements made by counsel in open court disavowing specific claims."[1233] The reasoning of Ergo Science is very much applicable here.

On January 6, 2016, the Court was advised by the IRS' counsel that the IRS had been authorized to enter into the Computation Stipulations by the Associate Attorney General of the United States. While it took the parties time to "tweak" the language of the Computation Stipulations, it was finalized and filed with the Court on January 26.[1234] The Computation Stipulations were based on adjustments to figures in the IRS' Proofs of Claim, which calculated income tax liability specifically on the basis that the Foreign Corporations are not shams. Moreover, the Computation Stipulations provide that "the IRS is not pursuing its alternative income tax position set forth in the POC that the IOM entities are shams."[1235] Finally, IRS counsel also stated—in open court—that it agreed that "the Isle of Man trusts are grantor trusts, and if they're grantor trusts, the corporations are controlled foreign corporations."[1236]

Now the IRS has raised—for the first time in its post-trial briefing—arguments that the Debtors have failed to report transactions under § 6048(c) that specifically rely on the Court disregarding and/or shamming the Foreign Corporations. The Court does not see how it can disregard and/or sham the Foreign Corporations for International Penalties purposes without doing so for income tax purposes, which cannot be done consistent with the Computation Stipulations. Thus, the Court concludes that the IRS is estopped from arguing that the Foreign Corporations should be disregarded.[1237]

567 The Court also refuses to apply the substance over form, economic substance, or step transaction doctrines to find that annuity payments received by the Wylys were reportable under § 6048(c) for a different reason. This is because the use of these doctrines seems particularly inappropriate in the context of the International Penalties. The parties have not cited, nor has the Court been able to locate through its own research, a single case where the IRS successfully used, or even attempted to use, one of the doctrines the IRS relies on here for the purpose of creating a reporting requirement and then assessing penalties for the taxpayer's violation of that newly-created requirement. This makes sense, as the Court believes that these doctrines were not created for this purpose.

[98] [99] [100] [101] The purpose of the economic substance doctrine is to prevent taxpayers "from reaping tax benefits from transactions lacking in economic reality."[1238] Likewise, the purpose of the substance over form doctrine—of which the step transaction doctrine is a corollary[1239]—is to ensure that "the tax consequences of a transaction are determined based on the underlying substance of the transaction rather than its legal form."[1240] These doctrines are designed to make sure that transactions are taxed properly; they are "judicial anti-abuse doctrines, which prevent taxpayers from subverting the legislative purpose of the tax code by engaging in transactions that are fictitious or lack economic reality simply to reap a tax benefit."[1241] In essence, they are judge-created doctrines that provide some common sense boundaries on the idea that it is "[t]he legal right of a taxpayer to decrease the amount of what otherwise would be his taxes, or altogether avoid them, by means which the law permits." [1242]

In this regard, the Debtors have already lost the tax benefits of their offshore system by virtue of the SDNY Court's grantor trust determinations. Now the IRS wants to go further. The IRS wants to apply the doctrines of substance over form, economic substance, and step transaction in order to make the Debtors liable for reporting penalties—after the proper tax treatment of the Debtors' transactions has already been determined and in ways that are counter to the IRS' previous positions. Applying the substance over form, economic substance, or step transaction doctrines solely to create reportable transactions 568 and to then impose failure to file penalties runs counter to the Supreme Court's mandate that "one 'is not to be subjected to a penalty unless the words of the statute plainly impose it.' " [1243] Thus, this Court declines the IRS' invitation to use these doctrines purely for the purpose of conjuring up reporting requirements for which it can then recover penalties for the Wylys' failure to report.

While no longer necessary, in the interests of completeness, the Court will rule on the Wyly's third argument as to why their annuity payments did not need to be reported on Form 3520—i.e., they did not need to report the annuity payments because those payments were reported on their tax returns as income. [1244] The Court rejects this argument. Throughout trial, the IRS has pointed to the manner in which the Wylys reported annuity income from the offshore system—on Schedule C attached to their tax return as opposed to on Line 1 or on the face of the return—as deceptive and misleading. [1245] The Debtors have explained that this reporting method was necessary in order to make sure that these annuity payments were properly subject to self-employment tax. [1246] The IRS, in turn, has countered that "[t]here is no provision under the Internal Revenue Code that imposes the self-employment tax under 26 U.S.C. § 1401(a) to annuity income, even though all or a part of the annuity income may be subject to income tax." [1247]

Regardless of whether the Wylys needed to subject their annuity payments to self-employment tax, § 6048(c)(1)(A) settles the debate as to whether reporting these annuity payments on Form 1040 also satisfied Form 3520 reporting obligations. It did not. Section 6048(c)(1)(A) requires that the name of the trust from which a distribution is received be reported in order to satisfy Form 3520 reporting requirements. This is no mere technicality, as the entire point of § 6048 is to allow the IRS to monitor the movement of funds through offshore trusts, a task that is not 569 possible without knowing which trusts are involved in particular transactions. There is no evidence in the record that the Wylys identified the trusts from which the annuity payments arguably came on their tax returns, as would be required in order to satisfy § 6048(c)(1)(A). In fact, the Wylys simply listed these payments as "ANNUITIES" without further elaboration on their tax returns. [1248] Thus, the Wylys reporting of their receipt of annuity payments on their tax returns would not relieve them of liability under § 6048(c) if there was such liability.

Nevertheless, for the reasons stated above, the Court concludes that the Wylys did not violate § 6048(c) by failing to report annuity payments received from the Wyly offshore system as distributions on Form 3520 because the annuity payments were not: (i) distributions from a foreign trust, or (ii) gratuitous.

(3) Real Estate Transactions

The second category of "distributions" that the IRS argues the Wylys were required to report pursuant to § 6048(c) are real estate transactions indirectly involving one or more of the Sam International Penalty Trusts or the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts. Specifically, the IRS argues that Sam should have reported on Form 3520 transfers of offshore funds involving the acquisition of (i) the Cottonwood Ventures I property, (ii) the Cottonwood Ventures II property, and (iii) the Rosemary's Circle R Ranch property. [1249] The IRS also argues that Charles and Dee should have reported on Form 3520 transfers of offshore funds involving the acquisition of (i) the LL Ranch property, and (ii) Stargate Horse Farm. [1250] Conversely, the Debtors argue that the real estate transactions at issue:

> were merely investments by subsidiaries of the IOM trusts in U.S. entities that themselves invested in U.S. real estate. In exchange for their investment > in the U.S. entities, the IOM subsidiaries received a pro rata interest in those entities. Accordingly, these transactions were simply investments by subsidiaries of the trusts. They were not distributions by the trusts because the trusts did not part with legal title to any trust asset.

> The IRS's inability to articulate a coherent position as to why these real estate transactions constituted gifts further illustrates that they were not reportable transactions. Furthermore, the IRS's gift theory was that the purported gift was made either to an entity or to a family member of the Debtors. Accordingly, those transactions would not be reportable by the Debtors in any event. [1251]

[102] The Court largely agrees with the Debtors. From the Court's perspective, the IRS' arguments here suffer from the same flaw in statutory construction as did its initial argument regarding the annuity payments that Sam, Charles, and Dee received from one or more of the Foreign Corporations. While it is true 570 that offshore funds were largely used to purchase domestic real estate, and the domestic entities holding title to that real estate are or were largely owned by a Foreign Corporation, albeit indirectly, none of the transfers of offshore funds that occurred here was a transfer "from a foreign trust" within the meaning of § 6048(c).

Moreover, the IRS identifies no statutory, regulatory, or case law authorities that would allow the Court to ignore the non-gratuitous nature of the real estate investments that it identifies as distributions reportable under § 6048(c). In exchange for the transfers of offshore funds, the applicable Foreign Corporation received an equivalent ownership interest in the domestic entities that hold legal title to the real estate. Under any circumstance that makes the transfers not gratuitous.

Finally, even if the prior two reasons are incorrect, the IRS seeks to recover from the wrong "recipient." Sam, Charles, and Dee did not receive the offshore funds. Rather, the applicable domestic entity did; and thus, it is the "United States person" who was obligated to report to the IRS. For all of these reasons, the Court concludes that the Debtors are not liable for violations of § 6048(c) by virtue of not reporting the transfers of offshore funds used to purchase domestic real estate as distributions on Form 3520.

Although the IRS argues that these real estate transactions can be treated as gratuitous distributions directly from the IOM trusts by ignoring (i) the existence of the Foreign Corporations and the domestic entities, and (ii) the non-gratuitous nature of the transfers via application of the doctrine of substance over form, the Court declines to do so here because, as discussed above in the context of the annuity payments: (a) the IRS is estopped from arguing that the Foreign Corporations should be disregarded, and (b) it is inappropriate to apply the doctrines of substance over form, economic substance, or step transaction purely for the purpose of creating a reportable transaction through which penalties can then be extracted from the Wylys.

(4) Security Capital Loans

The last form of "distribution" that the IRS asserts the Wylys were required to report on Form 3520 under § 6048(c) are loans received by Sam, Charles, and certain Wyly-related entities from Security Capital, who obtained the money it loaned out from one or more of the Foreign Corporations. As explained below, there are actually three sets of loans at issue. With respect to each loan, the IRS argues that it should have been reported on Form 3520 as distributions under § 6048(c) both because the text of the statute requires it and because the loans were gratuitous transfers as opposed to true loans under IRS regulations and the doctrine of substance over form. [1252]

As just noted, three sets of loans are at issue here. The first set of loans was made to Charles. These loans included a $6,000,000 loan from Security Capital to Charles made in October 2002 and an additional $25,000,000 loan from Security Capital to Charles made in March 2003. [1253] In order to make these two loans to Charles, Security Capital borrowed the money from Gorsemoor Limited (IOM), which is wholly owned by the Tyler IOM Trust. [1254] Charles is the grantor of the Tyler IOM 571 Trust by operation of the SDNY Court's grantor trust determination. [1255]

The second set of loans was made to Sam. These loans included a $10,000,000 loan to Sam from Security Capital made in July 2003. [1256] In order to make this loan to Sam, Security Capital borrowed the money from Newgale Limited (IOM), [1257] which is wholly owned by the Bessie IOM Trust.[1258] Sam is the grantor of the Bessie IOM Trust by operation of the SDNY Court's grantor trust determination.[1259] This second set of loans also included a $15,000,000 loan that Security Capital made to Sam with money borrowed from Greenbriar Limited (IOM) and Newgale Limited (IOM) in January 2002.[1260] Greenbriar Limited (IOM) is wholly owned by the Delhi International IOM Trust.[1261] Sam is the grantor of the Delhi International IOM Trust by operation of the SDNY Court's grantor trust determination.[1262]

The third set of loans was made to what are characterized by the IRS as various Wyly-related entities. These loans include $11,500,000 loaned from Security Capital to Green Mountain Energy Resources, LLC ("Green Mountain Energy") in 1998.[1263] Security Capital borrowed the money it needed to make this loan from Richland Limited (IOM), Morehouse Limited (IOM), and East Carroll Limited (IOM),[1264] each of which are wholly owned by the Bulldog IOM Trust.[1265] These loans also include a $3,000,000 loan from Security Capital to the Chief Executive Officer of Green Mountain Energy in January 1999.[1266] Security Capital borrowed the money it needed to make this loan from East Carroll Limited (IOM), another entity that is wholly owned by the Bulldog IOM Trust.[1267] These loans further include an $8,000,000 loan from Security Capital to The Sam Wyly 1978 Malibu Revocable Trust in 1999.[1268] Security Capital borrowed the money it needed to make this loan from Locke Limited (IOM) and Moberly Limited (IOM), which are each wholly owned by the Bulldog IOM Trust.[1269] This set of loans also includes a loan of financial assets valued at $55,815,672.03 from Security Capital to the various Cayman LLCs in 2001.[1270] Security 572 Capital obtained the financial assets it loaned to the Cayman LLCs from East Baton Rouge Limited (IOM), East Carroll Limited (IOM), and Moberly Limited (IOM), each of which are wholly owned by the Bulldog IOM Trust,[1271] and Yurta Faf Limited (IOM), which is wholly owned by the Bessie IOM Trust.[1272] Finally, this set of loans includes a $5,000,000 loan from Security Capital to Wrangler Trust (US).[1273] Security Capital borrowed the money it needed to make this loan from Locke Limited (IOM), which is wholly owned by the Bulldog IOM Trust.[1274] Sam is the grantor of the Bulldog IOM Trust and the Bessie IOM Trust by virtue of the SDNY Court's grantor trust determination.[1275]

[103] The Court rejects the IRS' argument that these loans are reportable distributions under § 6048(c) for three reasons. First, § 6048(c) does not require a United States person to report a loan that they receive from a foreign grantor trust; it only requires that loans from a foreign non-grantor trust be reported. That makes sense because reporting a loan from a foreign grantor trust would be like reporting a loan to yourself—completely unnecessary. But, further explanation may be helpful. Section 6048(c) does not discuss loan transactions as distributions.[1276] Although IRS Notice 97–34 discusses reporting loans from foreign trusts as distributions under § 6048(c), this discussion appears in the context of an explanation of reporting obligations under 26 U.S.C. § 643(i).[1277] 26 C.F.R. § 1.641(a)–0 indicates that § 643 has "no application to any portion of the corpus or income of a trust which is to be regarded, within the meaning of the Code, as that of the grantor or others treated as its substantial owners."[1278] In other words, § 643 and its accompanying regulations are not applicable to grantor trusts, which the trusts at issue here are.[1279] Furthermore, § 643(i) is, by its own terms, a definition that applies "[f]or purposes of subparts B, C, and D."[1280] The rules governing grantor trusts such as the ones at issue here are located in subpart E. Thus, IRS Notice 97–34's requirement to report loans from foreign trusts on Form 3520 in order to comply with § 6048(c) only applies to loans from foreign non-grantor trusts. Because the Sam International Penalty Trusts and the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts are all foreign grantor trusts, § 6048(c) is not applicable.[1281]

On this record, the Court cannot find that they were gratuitous transfers.[1283]

For example, Charles signed a note payable to Security Capital in connection with his $6,000,000 October 2002 loan.[1284] According to the note, Charles' $6,000,000 loan had a ten year term and called for annual, interest-only payments (at a rate of 4.90%) with unpaid interest and principal due on the tenth anniversary of the loan in October 2012.[1285] As the Court noted previously, Charles died in 2011 before the loan matured. Hennington testified that although interest payments were made on Charles' loans from Security Capital, that after Charles' death they "continued to be kind of hung up in the probate estate."[1286] Similarly, Charles signed a note payable to Security Capital in connection with his $25,000,000 March 2003 loan.[1287] This $25, 000,000 loan also calls for annual, interest-only payments, but has a fifteen year maturity and an interest rate of 4.80%.[1288] Thus, according to the note, all principal and unpaid interest is due on February 28, 2018.[1289] Again, Hennington's testimony suggests that Charles made interest payments on this loan until his death.[1290] Security Capital has filed a proof of claim against Dee, seeking to collect both of these loans.[1291]

Sam also signed a note payable to Security Capital in connection with his $10,000,000 July 2003 loan.[1292] This $10,000,000 loan calls for annual, interest-only payments at 4.17% per annum and matures on July 14, 2018.[1293] Hennington testified that Sam "made all annual interest 574 payments" on his Security Capital loans.[1294] Security Capital has filed a proof of claim against Sam, seeking to collect this loan.[1295]

Moreover, Sam signed a note payable to Security Capital in connection with his $15,000,000 January 2002 loan. This $15,000,000 loan[1296] calls for annual, interest-only payments at 5.5% per annum and matured on February 15, 2012.[1297] Although Sam defaulted on this loan by not repaying it then, Security Capital agreed to amend the note in 2013 and a new maturity date of July 14, 2018 was agreed upon.[1298] In exchange for this new maturity date, Sam (i) paid $1,500,000 to Security Capital, reducing his total indebtedness to $13,500,000; (ii) paid his single overdue annual interest payment, and (iii) agreed to continue paying interest at the rate of 5.5%.[1299]

The evidence in the record—as well as Security Capital's proofs of claim, of which this Court takes judicial notice —indicates that the loans that Security Capital made to Sam and Charles were in fact treated as loans by all of the parties involved. The IRS has the burden of showing that penalties such as the International Penalties are applicable in the first instance under 26 U.S.C. § 7491(c). In the absence of sufficient evidence that the loans to Sam and Charles were in fact gratuitous transfers, the Court cannot conclude that the Debtors needed to report these loans on Form 3520 under § 6048(c).

Third, as the Court has explained before in the context of its analysis of the annuity payments and the real estate transactions, the IRS misinterprets the language of § 6048(c) to attempt to capture these loans as "distributions" to Sam and Charles "from a foreign trust." All of the loans at issue here were loans from Security Capital, a Cayman Islands company setup in order to administer loan transactions made at the Wylys' direction.[1300] To facilitate its loans to Sam and Charles, Security Capital borrowed money from certain of the Foreign Corporations that were wholly owned by the Sam International Penalty Trusts or the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts.[1301] But, the loans at issue here were not made by any foreign trust.[1302] Thus, these loans were not "from a foreign trust" within the meaning of 26 U.S.C. § 6048(c).

Once again, the IRS argues that, in spite of the Court's conclusion that the text of § 6048(c) does not require reporting of these loans on Form 3520, these loans were in actuality gratuitous transfers directly from a Sam International Penalty Trust and a Charles and Dee International Penalty Trust to Sam and Charles, respectively. For the reasons explained in the context of analyzing the annuity payments and the real estate transactions, the Court 575 rejects this argument for two reasons. First, this argument relies on the Court disregarding the Foreign Corporations (along with Security Capital), and the Court has determined that the IRS may not make an argument that relies on this step based on its position in the Computation Stipulations, its Proofs of Claim, and in statements made by its counsel in open court. Second, utilizing judge-made doctrines —substance over form, economic substance, or step transaction—in order to create reporting obligations that are not clearly imposed by § 6048(c) in order to impose penalty liability on the Debtors here is improper.

(5) Sales of Options to IOM Corporations

[104] Finally, the Court must determine whether the Debtors violated § 6048(a) by failing to report the sale of options to certain of the Foreign Corporations. Section 6048(a)(3)(A)(ii) requires a United States person who transfers money or property to a foreign trust to file a Form 3520 alerting the IRS that one of these events has occurred. [1303]

As relevant here, in 1999, Charles sold stock options to Quayle Limited (IOM) and Elegance Limited (IOM) and Sam sold stock options to Greenbriar Limited (IOM) and East Carroll Limited (IOM) (collectively, the "1999 Option Sales"). [1304] Each of these entities are wholly owned by Castle Creek IOM Trust, Red Mountain IOM Trust, Delhi IOM Trust, and Bulldog IOM Trust, respectively, of which Charles or Sam is the grantor by virtue of the SDNY Court's grantor trust determination. [1305] The IRS argues that the 1999 Option Sales needed to be reported on Form 3520 under § 6048(a)(3)(A)(ii). [1306] The Court disagrees, as explained below.

The relevant text of 26 U.S.C. § 6048(a)(3)(A)(ii) reads as follows:

> The term "reportable event" means ... the transfer of any money or property (directly or indirectly) to a foreign trust by a United States person ...

Notably, the structure of § 6048(a)(3)(A)(ii) mirrors that of § 6048(c). Although in its briefing the IRS does not appear to argue that the 1999 Option Sales are reportable events under the text of § 6048(a)(3)(A)(ii) and instead relies exclusively on the doctrine of substance over form, the Court notes that the same statutory analysis that it applied to § 6048(c) applies here. The 1999 Option Sales were not sales to foreign trusts; rather, they were sales to certain of the Foreign Corporations, which are wholly owned by one of the Sam International Penalty Trusts or the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts. [1307] And, for the reasons stated above in its statutory construction of § 6048(c), the Court concludes that the 1999 Option Sales are not reportable events within the meaning of § 6048(a)(3)(A)(ii). [1308] The Court also concludes that, for the reasons stated above, it is inappropriate to apply the doctrines of substance over form, economic substance, or step transaction to attempt to create reportable events for which penalties can then be recovered from the Debtors.

For these reasons, the Debtors are liable for the following: (i) International Penalties under 26 U.S.C. § 6038(b) because 576 they failed to file Forms 5471 as required by 26 U.S.C. § 6038(a), and (ii) International Penalties under 26 U.S.C. § 6677 because they failed to file Forms 3520–A as required by 26 U.S.C. § 6048(b). The Debtors are not liable for any other International Penalty.

H. Did the Debtors Establish Their Reasonable Cause Defenses to the Imposition of International Penalties?

1. Introduction

Because the Court has concluded that the Debtors are liable for certain of the International Penalties, the Court must now evaluate their respective reasonable cause defenses to this liability. For the reasons explained more fully below, the Court concludes that Sam has not established his reasonable cause defenses by a preponderance of the credible evidence, but that Dee has established her reasonable cause defenses and thus, will not be held liable for the International Penalties.

a) Review of Provisions of § 6038

As just discussed, 26 U.S.C. § 6038(a)(1) requires every United States person who controls a foreign business entity to file a Form 5471. Under § 6038(a)(2) and its accompanying regulations, Forms 5471 are due at the same time as the United States person's tax return. [1309] As previously found, the Debtors failed to file Forms 5471 for the Foreign Corporations throughout the life of the offshore system, and are thus liable for penalties under 26 U.S.C. § 6038(b). The parties have stipulated to the amount of these penalties. [1310]

However, § 6038's reasonable cause provision may provide the Debtors with an avenue of relief from this liability. Specifically, § 6038(c)(4)(B) provides that "the time prescribed under paragraph (2) of subsection (a) to furnish information ... shall be treated as being not earlier than the last day on which (as shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary) reasonable cause existed for failure to furnish such information."[1311] Thus, if either Sam or Dee can establish that they had "reasonable cause" for not filing Forms 5471 for the Foreign Corporations, then they will not be liable for penalties under § 6038(b). The meaning of the phrase "reasonable cause" is discussed in greater detail below.

b) Review of Provisions of §§ 6048(b) and 6677

As just discussed, § 6048(b) requires every United States person who is treated as the owner of any portion of a foreign trust under the Grantor Trust Rules to submit 577 an annual Form 3520–A.[1312] According to the instructions to Form 3520–A, the form must be filed "by the 15th day of the 3rd month after the end of the trust's tax year."[1313] Section 6677 imposes penalties for violations of § 6048(b).[1314] As previously found, the Debtors failed to file Forms 3520–A throughout the life of the offshore system and are thus liable for penalties under § 6677. The parties have stipulated to the amount of these penalties.[1315]

However, penalties under § 6677 will not be imposed "on any failure which is shown to be due to reasonable cause and not due to willful neglect."[1316] Thus, if either Sam or Dee is able to establish that they had reasonable cause for not filing Forms 3520–A and that their failures to file Forms 3520–A were not due to willful neglect, then they will not be liable for penalties under § 6677. The meaning of the phrases "reasonable cause" and "willful neglect" are discussed in greater detail below.

2. Reasonable Cause and Lack of Willful Neglect

a) In General

[105] [106] [107] [108] Reasonable cause is determined on a case-by-case basis, taking into account all of the facts and circumstances.[1317] According to Fifth Circuit precedent, "the plaintiff bears the burden of proof on a reasonable cause defense."[1318] As the Fifth Circuit has stated in the context of avoiding accuracy-related or fraud penalties, the most important factor in evaluating a taxpayer's reasonable cause defense is "the extent of the taxpayer's effort to assess his proper liability in light of all the circumstances."[1319] A taxpayer's experience, knowledge, and education are relevant in determining whether reasonable cause has been established.[1320] In defining reasonable cause in general, many courts rely on 26 C.F.R. § 1.6664–4(b), which interprets the meaning of "reasonable cause" and "good faith" (though good faith is not a part of the Court's consideration in connection with the Debtors' liability for International Penalties) for the purposes of avoiding penalties under §§ 6662 and 6663. Treasury Regulation § 1.6664–4(b) provides:[1321]

> (b) Facts and circumstances taken into account—(1) In general. The determination of whether a taxpayer acted with reasonable cause and in good faith is made on a case-by-case basis, taking into account all pertinent facts and circumstances. (See paragraph (e) of this section for certain rules relating to a substantial understatement penalty attributable to tax shelter items of corporations.) 578 Generally, the most important factor is the extent of the taxpayer's effort to assess the taxpayer's proper tax liability. Circumstances that may indicate reasonable cause and good faith include an honest misunderstanding of fact or law that is reasonable in light of all of the facts and circumstances, including the experience, knowledge, and education of the taxpayer. An isolated computational or transcriptional error generally is not inconsistent with reasonable cause and good faith. Reliance on an information return or on the advice of a professional tax advisor or an appraiser does not > necessarily demonstrate reasonable cause and good faith. Similarly, reasonable cause and good faith is not necessarily indicated by reliance on facts that, unknown to the taxpayer, are incorrect. Reliance on an information return, professional advice, or other facts, however, constitutes reasonable cause and good faith if, under all the circumstances, such reliance was reasonable and the taxpayer acted in good faith ...

The Court must stress that, as in its analysis of the Debtors' attempted use of reliance on the advice of counsel to negate fraudulent intent under § 6663 and to establish reasonable cause for avoidance of fraud penalties under § 6664, this regulation is a helpful guide but is not controlling. This is because this regulation does not expressly apply to penalties under §§ 6663, 6038(c)(4)(B), or 6677(d), and—unlike under § 6664—the Court need not evaluate whether the Debtors here have displayed "good faith" in order to relieve them of liability for International Penalties. Rather, as relevant here, the Debtors need only establish "reasonable cause" under § 6038(c)(4)(B) and both "reasonable cause" and lack of "willful neglect" under § 6677(d).

In the context of establishing reasonable cause for failing to file a return on time, the Supreme Court stated in U.S. v. Boyle[1322] that " 'reasonable cause' is not defined in the Code, but the relevant Treasury Regulation calls on the taxpayer to demonstrate that he exercised 'ordinary business care and prudence' but nevertheless was 'unable to file the return within the prescribed time.' " Courts have adopted the Supreme Court's definition of reasonable cause in Boyle —i.e., "ordinary business care and prudence"—as the proper definition of reasonable cause throughout the Internal Revenue Code and especially in failure to file situations.[1323] The Boyle Court also defined the term "willful neglect," stating that it should be understood as "a conscious, intentional failure or reckless indifference."[1324] Again, courts have adopted Boyle's definition of willful neglect as the proper definition of the phrase as it is used throughout the Internal Revenue Code.[1325]

579 Although there are very few cases and no regulations defining "reasonable cause" or "willful neglect" within the specific contexts of §§ 6038(c)(4)(B) and 6677(d), those few cases that do exist tend to adopt Boyle's definitions of these phrases, assuming that the meanings of the phrases "reasonable cause" and "willful neglect" are the same throughout the penalty provisions of the Internal Revenue Code.[1326] This Court agrees with this approach, especially in light of the fact that there are no regulations that specifically interpret the meaning of the phrases "reasonable cause" and "willful neglect" in §§ 6038(c)(4)(B) and 6677(d).

b) Reliance on the Advice of Professionals

The Debtors rely almost exclusively on the fact that they relied on the advice of professionals in order to establish their reasonable cause defenses to their liability for International Penalties. The Court discussed the legal standards relevant to establishing reasonable cause by relying on the advice of tax professionals earlier in this opinion in its discussion of Sam's attempt to use his purported reliance on the advice of counsel to negate fraudulent intent under § 6663 and to establish reasonable cause for avoidance of fraud penalties under § 6664.[1327] The Court will briefly review these legal standards here for the sake of clarity.

[109] [110] [111] [112] To reiterate, when a professional advises a taxpayer on a matter of tax law, such as whether a liability exists or whether a return must be filed, it is reasonable for the taxpayer to rely on that advice without seeking a second opinion, even if that advice turns out to be wrong.[1328] This is because "[m]ost taxpayers are not competent to discern error in the substantive advice of an accountant or attorney."[1329] However, "reliance on the advice of a professional tax adviser does not necessarily demonstrate reasonable cause and good faith; rather, the validity of this reliance turns on the quality and objectivity of the professional advice which they obtained."[1330] To establish reasonable cause based on a professional's advice, the professional's advice must: (i) be reasonable and made in good faith, (ii) not be based on unreasonable factual or legal assumptions, and (iii) not unreasonably rely on the representations, statements, findings, or agreements of the taxpayer or any 580 other person.[1331] According to the Fifth Circuit, "[i]f a tax advisor's opinion is shown to be based on unreasonable factual or legal assumptions, that is, upon a representation or assumption which the taxpayer knows, or has reason to know, is unlikely to be true, then the taxpayer's reliance on that opinion does not constitute reasonable cause."[1332] Furthermore, if a taxpayer does not actually follow the advice that he or she receives from a tax professional, reliance on that advice cannot establish reasonable cause.[1333] The tax court has summarized the relevant considerations for establishing reasonable cause based on reliance on the advice of counsel in this way:

> To establish reasonable cause through reliance on the advice of a tax adviser, the taxpayer must meet the following three-prong test, laid out in Neonatology Assocs., P.A. v. Commissioner, 115 T.C. at 98–99: (1) the adviser was a competent professional who had sufficient expertise to justify reliance, (2) the taxpayer provided necessary and accurate information to the adviser, and (3) the taxpayer relied in good faith on the adviser's judgment.[1334]

Before proceeding to analyze whether the Debtors have met their burden of establishing their reasonable cause defenses here, one final set of legal principles must be analyzed. Specifically, can a taxpayer establish his reasonable cause defense based on an "honest difference of opinion?"

c) Honest Difference of Opinion

The Debtors assert what they characterize as a separate reasonable cause argument from their reliance on the advice of professionals argument. Specifically, the Debtors argue that there was an honest difference of opinion as to whether the Sam International Penalty Trusts and the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts were non-grantor trusts, and that this honest difference of opinion establishes reasonable cause for the Debtors' failure to file Forms 3520–A and 5471.

Throughout their Pre–Trial Brief, the Debtors maintain that reasonable cause can be established when there is an honest difference of opinion on the law.[1335] They also argue that an honest difference of opinion on the law can negate fraudulent intent.[1336] Authority does exist that supports the Debtors' argument. For example, the Debtors cite Robinson v. U.S.,[1337] a decision where "[t]he credibility of the Plaintiff's testimony regarding his belief that he was not required to file a return, the uncertainty of the existing statutory and regulatory definition of a broker, and the lack of legal force of the proposed amendments to Treasury Regulation[s]" were sufficient to establish reasonable cause, despite the fact that the taxpayer had not consulted his accountant regarding the matter at issue. The Debtors also cite Rice v. C.I.R.[1338] for the proposition that 581 "some difference of opinion" regarding a legal position is sufficient to establish reasonable cause and/or a lack of fraudulent intent. Finally, the Debtors cite Carter v. C.I.R.,[1339] a case where the court held that where there was a "complex legal issue on which there can be an honest difference of opinion," the failure of a taxpayer to reach the right conclusion on that issue was insufficient to establish negligence.

However, as applied here, this Court sees little, if any, difference between the Debtors' "honest difference of opinion" argument and their reliance on the advice of counsel argument. Indeed, the Debtors meld the two arguments in their own pleadings. For example, in the Debtors' Amended Proposed Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law dedicated to their honest difference of opinion argument, the Debtors ask the Court to find that:

> When the law is unsettled or unclear, a belief based on a review of the existing authorities establishes reasonable cause for failure to file a form ... Given the complexity and uncertainty of the law during the years at issue, it was entirely reasonable for the Wylys to rely on their professional advisors and believe their advice that the IOM trusts were indeed not grantor trusts to Sam and Charles and that they had filed all required tax returns and forms.[1340]

As this proposed finding makes clear, the Debtors' “honest difference of opinion” argument is identical to their “reliance on the advice of professionals” argument. In fact, the argument has to be the same because there is no evidence in the record that the Debtors had any “honest difference of opinion” about how to interpret the relevant tax law independent of the analyses provided to them by their tax advisors. Neither Sam nor Dee ever read any of the legal opinions that form the basis of their reliance on the advice of counsel argument, [1341] and both admitted that they did not independently analyze the relevant tax issues. [1342] As such, the Debtors' “honest 582 difference of opinion” argument and their “reliance on the advice of counsel” argument will be analyzed together as they are one and the same.

This Court's conclusion that these are not separate bases upon which to establish a reasonable cause defense here is bolstered by examining cases where courts have found that a taxpayer had reasonable cause based on an honest difference of opinion. Generally, the “honest difference of opinion” argument is used by courts to provide relief to taxpayers who did not rely on counsel or other professional advisors but made a legal mistake when confronted with a confusing provision of the tax law that they interpreted on their own. [1343] The difference here, however, is that none of the cases cited by the Debtors, and almost none of the additional cases the Court found discussing this kind of “honest difference of opinion” basis for a reasonable cause defense, involved taxpayers who relied on counsel or other advisors at all. [1344] Indeed, where taxpayers have attempted to rely on an “honest difference of opinion” argument while at the same time relying on the professional advice of a tax advisor, their “honest difference of opinion” argument has not resonated with the courts. [1345] In the few cases where taxpayers establish reasonable cause both because they relied on advisors and because they had an honest difference of opinion regarding the law, the courts tend to analyze the taxpayer's honest difference 583 of opinion as a component of his reliance on the advice of counsel, defaulting to a reliance on the advice of counsel framework in order to evaluate the taxpayer's reasonable cause. [1346]

Here, the Wylys did not analyze the law independently. They relied on their advisors to analyze the law for them. As such, the Court will treat the Debtors' “honest difference of opinion” and “reliance on counsel” reasonable cause arguments as one and the same.

d) Application to Both Debtors

In their pre-trial briefing, the Debtors sum up their reasonable cause defenses to International Penalties in this way: [1347]

> As already described above, the Wylys were continually told by their advisors that the 1992 IOM trusts were non-grantor trusts and that the 1994 and 1995 IOM trusts were grantor trusts to Messrs. King and Cairns, respectively. Consistent with this advice, the Wylys properly filed Forms 3520 for the IOM trusts for the years they created and funded such trusts, and filed the Forms 3520–A (required for grantor trusts owned by a U.S. person) annually for the IOM grantor trusts they created until they were terminated in 1996.
> No further Forms 3520 or 3520–A were filed, and no Forms 5471 were filed, because the Wylys' advisors did not tell them to make any additional filings. Based on the conclusions reached by these advisors regarding the characterization of the trusts and the nature of certain other transactions, no such additional information returns should have been filed.
> Furthermore, even after the Wylys were told in 2003 that Morgan Lewis thought there was a risk that the 1992 trusts could be treated as grantor trusts to Sam and Charles, they were not advised of any potential need to file these forms. Although the IRS continues to focus on the views of Morgan Lewis to support these penalties, Debtors reiterate that (i) other advisors (principally Messrs. Chatzky, Tedder, and French, and Meadows Owens) interpreted the same statutory provisions differently, (ii) Morgan Lewis could not (and did not) point to conclusive authority supporting its views because such authority did not exist, (iii) when the Wylys learned about Morgan Lewis' contrary views, they began disclosing the issues on their federal income tax returns, and (iv) even after being informed of Morgan Lewis' concerns, the Debtors were not advised to file these information reports. The contrary views were not resolved until the Disgorgement Opinion was issued in 2014. This is further evidence that the state of the law was unclear.

> On their advisors' counsel, the Wylys properly filed all of the tax forms their advisors told them to file, including Forms 3520 for the IOM trusts they settled and funded, Forms 3520–A each year for the trusts those advisors told them were grantor trusts to them, and other obscure forms when advised to file them, such as FBARs and Forms 8938.
> At no point during the 22–year period at issue in these Cases were Sam and Charles Wyly ever advised by any of their lawyers they engaged to file the Forms 5471, 3520 or 3520–A at issue. And, furthermore, for the first 12 years of this period (until 2003), the Wylys were not advised that there was even a meaningful risk that the trusts were 584 grantor trusts—the prerequisite finding necessary to trigger the Form 3520–A and 5471 filing requirements.

Moreover, the Debtors rely upon the Supreme Court's decision in U.S. v. Boyle[1348] for the proposition that taxpayers are not required to seek second opinions or monitor whether their counsel is giving correct advice in order to rely on that advice for reasonable cause purposes. The Debtors acknowledge that any advice they received regarding the need to file Forms 3520, 3520–A, or Form 5471 was "implicit,"[1349] and that this advice was linked to their advisors' understanding that "the 1992 IOM trusts were non-grantor trusts and that the 1994 and 1995 IOM trusts were grantor trusts to Messrs. King and Cairns, respectively."[1350] Finally, the Debtors argue that while there are IRS procedures for filing protective or conditional forms in certain instances, no such procedures exist for Forms 3520, 3520–A, or 5471.[1351]

The IRS objects to the Debtors' reasonable cause defenses on multiple grounds; specifically that: (i) Tedder and Chatzky (and at times Meadows Owens' attorneys) are promoters of the Wyly offshore system on whose advice the Wylys may not rely, (ii) the advice that Sam and Charles was given regarding the offshore system was based on facts that Sam and Charles knew to be false, (iii) the Debtors never actually heard any of the advice on which they purport to rely firsthand, and (iv) the Debtors cannot actually produce any of the advice that was supposedly given to them by Meadows Owens or substantiate what facts were given to Meadows Owens to produce that advice.[1352] Finally, the IRS argues that the Debtors' advisors gave them a great deal of advice about reporting requirements, as follows:[1353]

> In 1991, the memorandum to the Wylys included advice from Tedder stating that (1) Form 3520 must be filed when a foreign trust is formed; (2) attach a copy of the Trust Agreement to the Form 3520 for safety; and (3) file Form 3520–A annually to keep confirming that the Trust is in existence. Tedder specifically advised "Always over disclose to the IRS." Throughout the time that the Offshore System was operating, the Wylys also received additional advice as to these forms. In December 2002, Keeley Hennington, the Wylys agent, acknowledged the Form 3520 filing requirement and awareness of the same. In August 2003, Lubar, another Wyly agent, informed Keeley Hennington and Boucher, two additional Wyly agents, that Form 5471s must be filed. In October 2003, Todd Welty, then with the Meadows firm, also discussed the penalties associated with not filing a Form 3520 and 5471 with Keeley Hennington. While silence of advisors is not sufficient to establish a reasonable cause defense, the record here is clear that the Wylys were actually advised to file these forms and received this advice as early as 1991 in advance of their implementing the Offshore System.

585 As shown by the excerpted arguments above, the Debtors' arguments as to why they are not liable for International Penalties are the same arguments they made with respect to their liability for fraud penalties—i.e., that they were given advice from many professionals that the IOM trusts were non-grantor trusts as to Sam and Charles, and that their reliance on that advice was reasonable despite the fact that it was wrong. Since the Debtors' arguments regarding their reasonable cause defense to the International Penalties are the same as their arguments with respect to their reasonable cause defense to fraud penalties, the Court's earlier analysis with respect to Sam is equally applicable here, as discussed below.

(1) As to Sam

[113] As to Sam, the IRS asserts International Penalties beginning in 1996.[1354] So, what advice did Sam get that is relevant here? For context, Sam argues that he was consistently advised that the Sam International Penalty Trusts were either non-grantor trusts as to him (Bulldog IOM Trust, Lake Providence IOM Trust, and Delhi IOM Trust) or foreign grantor trusts as to King and Cairns (Bessie IOM Trust and La Fourche IOM Trust, respectively). However, the credible evidence at trial does not support Sam's argument, as explained below.

As previously found, Sam never received an opinion that the Bulldog IOM Trust was a non-grantor trust as to him.[1355] The legal opinions that Sam received in 1992 when the Bulldog IOM Trust was settled and the initial annuity transactions were undertaken from Pratter, Tedder & Graves addressed the tax consequences of the annuity transactions, assumed that the annuity transactions would be undertaken through entities wholly owned by a foreign non-grantor trust, but did not address the issue of the proper legal characterization of that trust —i.e., the Bulldog IOM Trust—as a grantor or non-grantor trust.

Sam next argues that French told him that the Bulldog IOM Trust was a non-grantor trust. But, there are numerous problems with Sam relying on any tax advice French allegedly gave him, as discussed supra at pp. 501–13. First, French was not competent to give Sam advice regarding the proper legal characterization of the Bulldog IOM Trust as he was a securities lawyer, not a tax lawyer. That French was not competent to give such advice is demonstrated by the fact that the Wylys hired expert tax lawyers to advise them—i.e., Lubar, Owens, Pulman, Chamberlain Hrdlicka, DeCastro West, and arguably Tedder and Chatzky. Further, that Larry Bean, a tax lawyer at French's law firm (Jackson Walker), reviewed the offshore system as proposed by Tedder early on and advised French that it "might work," after stating that their firm, Jackson Walker,[1356] would not issue any such legal opinion to the Wylys, is of little comfort to the reasonableness of Sam's reliance on the advice of counsel defense here. 586 Finally, that French himself realized that he was not competent to advise the Wylys about the tax consequences of their offshore system is amply demonstrated by what French did—i.e., after the Wylys received "advice" from Tedder, Chatzky, and Bean, French remained concerned about the legal characterization of the 1992 IOM trusts, so, in 1993, French sought out an extremely well credentialed international tax expert, Lubar, to get another opinion about the tax consequences flowing from the 1992 annuity transactions as discussed below. In short, Sam never received advice upon which he can reasonably rely regarding the proper characterization of the Bulldog IOM Trust as a non-grantor trust when that trust was first settled.

As previously found, on May 19, 1993, Sam did receive opinion letters from Tedder, Chatzky & Berends[1357] addressing the proper legal characterization of two other trusts Sam settled in December 1992—i.e., the Lake Providence IOM Trust and the Delhi IOM Trust. The letters are identical and, based on the factual assumptions contained in the letters, the firm opined that "it is more likely than not that the trust will be construed to constitute a valid non-grantor trust for United States taxation purposes provided that the trust operates in accordance with the terms and provisions contained in the Trust Agreement." However, as previously held, Sam cannot rely upon these opinions for his reasonable cause defense because that advice was provided by the firm that promoted the offshore system to the Wylys.[1358]

As previously found, in 1993 Sam's trusted advisor and agent, French, sought and received an opinion regarding the proper legal characterization of the 1992 IOM trusts that Sam had settled—i.e., Bulldog IOM Trust, Lake Providence IOM Trust, and Delhi IOM Trust. French was concerned about the conclusions reached by Tedder and Chatzky and so French went to an international tax specialist, Lubar, for advice on the Wylys' behalf.[1359] As previously found, Lubar advised French that there was a "significant risk" that the 1992 IOM trusts were properly characterized as grantor trusts to Sam, which would dramatically change the tax consequences of the 1992 annuity transactions and the reporting requirements imposed under U.S. tax laws.[1360] And, as previously found, French was authorized to seek such advice by the Wylys.[1361] As one of French's principals, Sam is charged with knowledge of the facts French learned from Lubar, including the fact that Lubar believed that the 1992 IOM trusts were properly characterized as grantor trusts as to Sam.[1362]

587 That brings us to the settling of the IOM trusts in 1994 and 1995. As previously found, the settling of these trusts was highly irregular from the outset. Lubar advised French, as the Wylys' agent, on the settling of the 1994 and 1995 IOM trusts.[1363] But, Lubar's advice was predicated on three significant facts that French told Lubar to assume were true.[1364] Although Lubar did not know it, those facts were not true; they were lies.[1365] Because the factual predicate underlying Lubar's advice about the proper legal characterization of the Bessie IOM Trust and the La Fourche IOM Trust was incorrect, Lubar's advice cannot be relied upon here to support a reasonable cause defense by Sam.[1366]

As previously found, Sam turned to Owens for legal advice on tax issues beginning around 1998. However, as previously found, there is no credible evidence in the record that Owens' firm, Meadows Owens, independently analyzed the proper legal characterization of the Sam International Penalty Trusts until late October 2003.[1367] And, as previously found, the Meadows Owens analysis was precipitated by Lubar's more comprehensive review of the Wyly offshore system in mid–2003, which reconfirmed Lubar's original views that the 1992 IOM trusts were properly characterized as grantor trusts as to Sam.[1368] As previously found, Pulman of Meadows Owens concluded that Sam had a "reportable position" that the 1992 IOM trusts were foreign non-grantor trusts—a position inconsistent with Lubar's conclusions.[1369] So, in short and at best, by late 2003 Sam had received conflicting advice from experienced tax professionals regarding whether the 1992 IOM trusts were grantor or non-grantor trusts as to him—in essence, dueling opinions from respected tax lawyers that he hired to give him that advice. From the Court's perspective, Sam cannot now pick the advice he prefers—i.e., Pulman's advice—and then claim to have reasonably relied upon it in connection with his reasonable cause defense to his liability for International Penalties.

As discussed above, Sam's liability for International Penalties flows from the characterization of the Sam International Penalty Trusts as grantor trusts to Sam. For the reasons just explained, Sam failed to prove that he received advice on which he can reasonably rely that characterizes the Sam International Penalty Trusts as non-grantor trusts as to him and his reasonable cause defense fails.

For the sake of completeness, one final argument will be addressed—i.e., Sam's argument that his professionals never advised him to file Forms 3520–A and 5471 and that he relied upon this failure in concluding that he had filed all required forms. As the Debtors' note in their briefing, the failure of Sam's professionals to advise him to file Forms 3520–A and 5471 was "[b]ased on the conclusions reached by these advisors regarding the characterization 588 of the trusts."[1370] The implicit advice not to file Forms 3520–A and 5471—if it had in fact been explicit—would have boiled down to this: you do not need to file Forms 3520–A and 5471 because you are not the grantor of the Sam International Penalty Trusts.[1371]

The Court takes no issue with the Debtors' contention that an advisor's failure to mention that a form must be filed can constitute advice that the form does not need to be filed.[1372] A tax advisor does not need to go through every possible IRS form and mention specifically that it does not have to be filed in order for a taxpayer to have received advice that he has met all of his filing requirements. A normal W–2 wage earner with no foreign dealings can rest easy despite the fact that his accountant does not discuss with him whether he needs to file a Form 3520–A or a Form 5471. The problem here, however, is that the implicit advice Sam received not to file these forms flows directly from the advice that the Court has concluded Sam could not reasonably rely on. If Sam cannot reasonably rely on the alleged explicit advice that the 1992 IOM trusts are non-grantor trusts as to him and the 1994 and 1995 IOM trusts are foreign grantor trusts as to King and Cairns, then it follows that Sam cannot rely on implicit advice that flowed from this alleged explicit advice.

What is more, Sam was aware that there were reporting requirements whose applicability depended upon the proper legal characterization of the Wyly offshore trusts as non-grantor trusts as to Sam or as foreign grantor trusts as to King and Cairns. As Sam's counsel noted, Sam filed Forms 3520–A for offshore trusts that he was advised were grantor trusts as to him—i.e., certain of the offshore trusts involved in the 1996 private annuity transactions.[1373] Moreover, acting on Sam's behalf, Hennington and Boucher received a memo dated May 15, 2001 from Owens stating that "foreign grantor trusts [Bessie IOM Trust and La Fourche IOM Trust] are exempt from all U.S. taxation as well as all U.S. reporting requirements so long as such trusts are characterized as foreign grantor trusts [as to King and Cairns, non-resident aliens of the U.S.]," and Hennington's and Boucher's knowledge is imputed to Sam based on agency principles.[1374] In addition, the memorandum presented to Hennington by Pulman and Cousins of Meadows Owens in October 2003 regarding what actions Sam should take in light of Lubar's conclusions regarding the proper legal characterization of the 1992 IOM Trusts as grantor trusts to Sam noted that (i) there were penalties associated with not filing Forms 3520 and 5471, and (ii) "the biggest penalty risk is under § 6677, which provides for a penalty of 5% of the gross asset of the trust at the end of the 589 year."[1375] Perhaps most telling of all, on June 12, 1991, Robertson sent Sam, Charles, Evan, and French notes that she took at one of Tedder's seminars.[1376] At the very top of this section, there is a note that says "[w]hen in doubt file a form even if you have to make up the form."[1377] From the very beginning, Sam was aware of these forms and their importance.

Thus, the evidence shows that Sam was aware—at least to some extent—of the reporting requirements that flowed from his status as a U.S. citizen grantor of foreign trusts. More importantly, Sam was aware that all of the advice he was given about tax consequences and reporting requirements regarding the Wyly offshore system depended on the fact that he was not the grantor of the Sam International Penalty Trusts. And, for the reasons discussed above and in the Court's analysis of Sam's reasonable cause defense to the imposition of fraud penalties, Sam had no advice on which he could reasonably rely that established this crucial fact. For all of these reasons, Sam has not established his reasonable cause defense under either § 6038(c)(4)(B) or § 6677(d).

Although Sam's lack of reasonable cause is enough to make him liable for International Penalties under both §§ 6038(c)(4)(B) and 6677(d), the Court also finds that Sam displayed willful neglect in failing to file Forms 3520–A and 5471 in relation to the Foreign Corporations. Sam's failure to file these forms was due to "a conscious, intentional failure or reckless indifference."[1378]

As with Sam's tax fraud, there is little direct evidence that Sam intentionally failed to file Forms 3520–A and 5471. This is unsurprising. It would be unrealistic to expect Sam —in a Perry Mason moment—to confess that he knew all along that he needed to file these forms but did not. The evidence does show, however, that Sam was aware that the decisions he was making regarding the offshore system were not based on a foundation of uniform, reliable tax advice. For the reasons explained below, this fact, among others, establishes that Sam's decisions to not file Forms 3520–A and 5471 regarding the Foreign Corporations for over two decades was a product of at least reckless indifference.

Sam was aware from the outset of his offshore system that the tax positions he was taking regarding the 1992 IOM trusts and the annuity transactions he undertook through them were aggressive.[1379] Sam was also aware that Tedder had advised early on to over report to the IRS about the offshore system.[1380] Moreover, Sam 590 was aware as early as July 1993 that there was a significant risk that the 1992 IOM trusts he settled would be characterized as grantor trusts as to him when his agent, French, sought a second opinion on his behalf regarding the proper legal characterization of the 1992 IOM trusts and the tax consequences flowing from the annuity transactions undertaken through those trusts from an international tax expert, Lubar.[1381] In addition, Sam was aware that the factual foundation upon which Lubar based his advice that King and Cairns—rather than Sam—were the grantors of the Bessie IOM Trust and the La Fourche IOM Trust was false.[1382] Finally, Sam was aware from the inception of the offshore system that there were reporting requirements related to offshore trusts—particularly those trusts of which he was the grantor.

Sam testified at trial that he hired tax professionals because he realized that the United States tax laws were complicated, and that he needed experts to assist him in complying with those laws, going so far as to testify that he was not competent to even read his own tax returns due to their complexity.[1383] Of course, this testimony leads to Sam's argument—under Boyle —that he should not be subject to penalties because he received high quality tax advice that he was not competent to independently evaluate.

The Court agrees that Sam should not be charged with the responsibility to independently evaluate the correctness of the tax advice he received. Moreover, the Court does not expect Sam to be competent to determine which of his expert[1384] tax advisors was correct regarding the proper legal characterization of the 1992 IOM trusts and the tax consequences of the annuity transactions undertaken through them. But, as a well-educated, 591 experienced, and sophisticated businessman, Sam was competent to understand that he had received conflicting advice from the tax professionals he had hired to give him that advice

—i.e., Tedder and Chatzky on the one hand and Lubar on the other hand. Specifically, Tedder and Chatzky advised in May 1993 that it was more likely than not that the Lake Providence IOM Trust and the Delhi IOM Trust would be characterized as nongrantor trusts as to Sam, while Lubar advised in July 1993 that there was a significant risk that those two trusts, along with the earlier settled Bulldog IOM Trust, would be characterized as grantor trusts as to Sam. And, as previously found, the correct legal characterization of the 1992 IOM trusts —particularly the Bulldog IOM Trust through which the annuity transactions had been undertaken—drives both the tax consequences to Sam of the annuity transactions and his reporting obligations.

So, what did Sam do when he learned in 1993 that his expert advisers disagreed over the proper legal characterization of the 1992 IOM trusts and the tax consequences flowing from the annuity transactions undertaken through them? Similarly, what did Sam do knowing that the factual predicate underlying Lubar's advice regarding the characterization of the Bessie IOM Trust and the La Fourche IOM Trusts as grantor trusts as to King and Cairns, respectively, was wrong?

In short, Sam did nothing. He simply ignored their disagreement and the factual lies upon which the 1994 and 1995 IOM trusts were predicated and proceeded to undertake more annuity and other business transactions through the Sam International Penalty Trusts for the next decade until his hand was forced by a chance encounter that Boucher had with Lubar in the Cayman Islands in 2003. At that time Boucher learned of Lubar's 1993 advice to Sam's agent, French, [1385] and, as previously found, that led to a flurry of activity. [1386]

Specifically, Boucher and Hennington, also acting as Sam's agents, met with Lubar in London (just as French had done literally a decade earlier) and, after understanding Lubar's earlier concerns, Boucher and Hennington prepared a written memorandum addressed to their principal, Sam (among others), disclosing what they had learned. [1387] This led to Lubar being asked to reanalyze the Wyly offshore system, which he did and which reconfirmed his original conclusions about the proper legal characterization of the 1992 IOM trusts as foreign grantor trusts as to Sam and raised new concerns about the tax consequences of the annuity transactions undertaken through them.

And, as previously found, after a failed anonymous meeting with the IRS to try to resolve the Wyly's looming tax problems that Lubar undertook on Sam's and Charles' behalf in August 2003, Hennington 592 approached Pulman at Meadows Owens for further advice in late September 2003 due to the looming due date of Sam's 2002 tax return (October 15, 2003). By late October, Hennington learned that Pulman believed that Sam had a "reportable position" that the 1992 IOM trusts were foreign non-grantor trusts. But, at best, that simply put Sam back where he was in 1993—i.e., two tax experts hired to advise him about the offshore system disagreed as to whether the 1992 IOM trusts were grantor or non-grantor trusts as to Sam and the tax and reporting consequences flowing from those trusts. One difference here, however, from 1993 is that even Pulman warned Sam about the significant penalties attendant to his failing to report to the IRS. [1388] Another significant difference is that by late 2003, Sam knew several other things—he knew that (i) the IRS had expressed concerns in August 2003, at the anonymous meeting Lubar had with them on Sam's behalf, that there had been incomplete Form 3520 reporting, (ii) the legal advice on which the offshore system was based was in conflict with Lubar's advice and had been provided by promoters, and (iii) the entire offshore structure was fundamentally flawed. [1389] Notes from this meeting even indicate that Lubar agreed that the Wylys had neglected their obligation to file Forms 5471, and that one IRS representative commented that the Wylys would now be on notice that they had an obligation to file Forms 3520, 3520–A, and 5471. [1390]

So, once again, the question must be asked—what did Sam do to resolve the legal uncertainty and clarify his reporting obligations? The answer this time is slightly different but, as relevant here, the difference is not meaningful. While Sam did nothing to attempt to resolve the legal uncertainty, he did start filing Forms 8275 with the IRS disclosing the possibility that the IOM trusts were grantor trusts as to him, that there were possible funding issues with the 1994 and 1995 trusts, and that property had been exchanged with subsidiaries of these foreign trusts in exchange for private annuities. [1391] But, this was not meaningful disclosure compared to Sam's obligation to file Forms 3520–A and 5471 because the Forms 8275 did not provide the essential information required in order to satisfy Sam's obligations under 26 U.S.C. §§ 6038 and 6048.[1392] These sections of the Internal Revenue Code require a taxpayer to provide detailed information about foreign trusts and corporations so that the IRS is able to monitor taxpayer compliance. The Forms 8275 that Sam filed did not provide the names of the Sam International Penalty Trusts or the Foreign 593 Corporations, information about trustees or beneficiaries of the Sam International Penalty Trusts, financial information about the Sam International Penalty Trusts or the Foreign Corporations, or detailed information about the transactions engaged in by any of these entities.[1393] All of this information is required in order to satisfy Sam's reporting obligations under §§ 6038 and 6048.[1394]

And, in early 2004, the IRS began its audit of Sam, the focal point of which was Sam's offshore system and the transactions undertaken offshore as Hennington testified.[1395] By then, Sam had to know that the secrecy surrounding his offshore system was about to be destroyed and the IRS was going to learn the extent of his offshore holdings. At this point there was no reason not to file all possibly required forms with the IRS; even if they were later determined not to have been required, filing them would insure that Sam would not be held liable for failing to file them when litigation with the IRS arose, as Sam had to know it would.[1396]

But, again, what did Sam actually do? Nothing of real consequence—he simply waited for the IRS to come after him, all the while continuing his offshore activities. Such a caviler attitude towards his reporting obligations for 20 plus years reflects, at a minimum, reckless indifference. For these reasons, the Court concludes that Sam acted with willful neglect when he failed to file Forms 3520–A and 5471.

(2) As to Dee

[114] Since the Court found that Dee is not liable for fraud penalties under § 6663, the Court has not previously examined Dee's reasonable cause defenses. Like Sam, Dee attempts to establish her reasonable cause and lack of willful neglect by her purported reliance on the advice of professionals. According to Dee, her reasonable cause defense boils down to this:

> Dee Wyly reasonably relied on her husband to handle the couple's financial, tax, and legal affairs. Dee Wyly never had any reason to suspect that Charles Wyly ever engaged in illegal or fraudulent activity, and there is no evidence that he ever did. Dee Wyly had no reason to suspect that the legal, financial, and tax professionals retained by her husband provided anything other than competent professional advice and counsel.[1397]

594 In other words, when it came to tax matters Dee relied on her husband, Charles, who in turn relied on professionals, and Dee should be able to rely on the advice of professionals to the same extent Charles did. Through this reasoning, Dee attempts to use the same facts and circumstances as Sam did in order to establish reasonable cause and lack of willful neglect. Although the law on this issue pulls in somewhat conflicting directions, the Court ultimately concludes that Dee has established that she acted with reasonable cause and without willful neglect based on reliance on the advice of professionals, as explained below.

Under 26 C.F.R. § 1.6664–4 (which the Court acknowledges is not controlling here but is nevertheless helpful), advice "is any communication, including the opinion of a professional tax advisor, setting forth the analysis or conclusion of a person, other than the taxpayer, provided to (or for the benefit of) the taxpayer and on which the taxpayer relies, directly or indirectly."[1398] Under this regulation there are thus grounds to define advice broadly, and it seems at least conceivable that Dee could rely on the advice of professionals through her husband as Debtors have argued.

However, if Dee is to rely on professionals through her reliance on Charles, then there is an argument that her reliance can only establish reasonable cause to the same extent as Charles' reliance could. This is important, because, like Sam, any reasonable cause defense asserted by Charles (or more accurately, by his probate estate) would fail here for the same reasons Sam's reasonable cause defenses failed. A brief reminder is appropriate. Although the names of Charles' offshore trusts and corporations were different than Sam's, and he established fewer offshore trusts and corporations than Sam, Charles' actions and the advice he received is identical, in all material respects, to that of Sam. In short, the two brothers implemented a substantively identical system of offshore trusts and corporations in the IOM through which they undertook substantively identical transactions from 1992 through 2011 when Charles died. Thus, for the reasons just explained as to Sam, Charles would not be able to prove that he received advice on which he can reasonably rely that characterizes the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts as non-grantor trusts as to him. And, for the same reasons that Sam's reasonable cause defenses to the imposition of International Penalties failed, any such defenses asserted by Charles (or his probate estate) would also fail.

Despite the problems Charles (or his probate estate) would have establishing a reasonable cause defense here, the case of Reser v. C.I.R. [1399] strongly suggests that Dee, as opposed to Charles, can establish reasonable cause through her indirect reliance on this advice. While the Court was somewhat surprised by this, it is prudent for it to follow the Fifth Circuit's decision and analysis in Reser, to which we now turn.

The taxpayers in Reser were a husband ("Don") and wife ("Rebecca"), both of whom were highly educated and had obtained their law degrees. [1400] Don and Rebecca's problems began when Don formed a subchapter S corporation ("DRPC") of which he was the sole shareholder, and 595 then obtained a joint loan with this corporation from Frost Bank. [1401] Don had complete control over the use of the loan proceeds, and used them for both personal expenses and as operating capital for DRPC. [1402] Don and DRPC eventually defaulted on their loan with Frost Bank. [1403]

Tax issues arose when Don attempted to claim losses related to DRPC on his tax return. [1404] Don argued that he should be able to claim losses related to the Frost Bank loans, because in fact these loans had been made to Don who in turn lent the money to DRPC. [1405] The only evidence that Don presented in order to substantiate his claim that he had lent money to DRPC was a series of promissory notes. [1406] However, these promissory notes first appeared after the IRS made its final determination of tax liability. Don had not produced the notes in response to earlier IRS document requests, which caused the tax court to disregard them at trial. [1407] The tax court held that since there was no "actual, substantive debt" owed by DRPC to Don that losses related to these loans could not be deducted on Don's and Rebecca's joint tax return. [1408]

The IRS also sought to recover various penalties from Don and Rebecca related to the overstated losses stemming from the Frost Bank loans. [1409] Don and Rebecca argued that they should not be liable for these penalties because they relied on accountants to prepare their returns. [1410] The tax court rejected this argument, stating that: [1411]

> Stewart Goodson, the certified public accountant who prepared the returns here, testified that John Gwaltney, DRPC's accountant, told him to treat loans listed on the financial statements as coming from the bank as loans from [Don], and that such loans were in fact from [Don]. Mr. Goodson, an agent of DRPC, thus treated the loans as loans from [Don]. In light of our finding that there was no separate loan from [Don] to [DRPC], we find that [Don's] reliance on Mr. Goodson was not reasonable, as based on inaccurate information that Mr. Goodson made no effort to verify, and that appears to have been furnished to him on [Don's] instructions.

Apparently not eager to be held liable for tax penalties because of a dubious tax position taken by her husband, Rebecca also attempted to obtain penalty relief based on the innocent spouse defense. [1412] The tax court rejected her innocent spouse defense, stating that: [1413]

> Petitioner wife, an attorney, signed the 1987 tax return. She undoubtedly noticed that the losses attributable to her husband's corporation would act to shelter > her income. Given the circumstances, we find that a reasonably prudent taxpayer should have known that the tax liability stated was erroneous, or that further investigation was warranted. 596 We find that petitioner wife should have investigated whether the losses were properly deductible.

> Since we hold that petitioner wife should have known, or was on reasonable notice, that the loss was improper, we must conclude that she does not qualify for treatment as an innocent spouse under section 6013(e).

Thus, the tax court held that Rebecca was liable for both tax and penalties because her husband claimed erroneous deductions on their joint tax return. [1414]

Rebecca, but not Don, appealed the tax court's decision to the Fifth Circuit. [1415] The Fifth Circuit affirmed the tax court's decision that the losses related to the Frost Bank loans were not deductible, but reversed the tax court's decision to hold Rebecca liable for penalties. [1416] The Fifth Circuit held that the tax court's finding that Rebecca was not an innocent spouse was clearly erroneous. [1417] The Fifth Circuit based this conclusion, in part, on its determination that Rebecca did not actually know, did not have reason to know, and did not have a duty to inquire as to whether deducting the DRPC losses related to the Frost Bank loans was proper. [1418] The Fifth Circuit reached this conclusion for the following reasons: [1419]

> The relevant factors that we are to consider indicate that [Rebecca] did not know and did not have reason to know that the deductions in question would give rise to a substantial understatement on the 1987 joint return. First, [Rebecca's] education, albeit advanced, provided her with no special knowledge of complex tax issues such as basis computation. She had a background in history and practiced personal injury law. Second, [Rebecca] was not personally involved with DRPC's business and financial affairs to any significant degree; rather, she was engaged full-time in her law practice and was the family's sole source of financial support. In addition, she gave birth to their second child in 1987. Third, the record is devoid of evidence of lavish or unusual expenditures compared to the Resers' normal standard of living and spending patterns, which exhibits no notable changes during the years in question. To the contrary, they invested most of [Rebecca's] income into DRPC and consumed the rest on the family's living expenses. In addition, they incurred substantial debt when borrowing money to invest in DRPC. And ultimately, the Resers divorced, and Don filed for bankruptcy. Finally, [Rebecca] cannot be penalized for Don's discredited efforts to recast the Frost Bank loan in a tax-favorable light. Indeed, [Rebecca] was not even aware of the second set of "promissory notes" until 1991, several years after she had signed the 1987 joint return.

The Fifth Circuit also noted that the ultimate conclusion that these losses were not deductible by Don and Rebecca rested on the application of "an extremely difficult and technical process" that had been hotly contested and on which IRS agents had reached two different conclusions. [1420] Most importantly, the Fifth Circuit noted that Rebecca had been reasonable in relying on accountants to prepare her taxes, 597 and had no duty to inquire as to the propriety of the deductions: [1421]

> Had [Rebecca] asked Don, [or the accountants] about the deductions, they would have told her what they believed-that DRPC's losses were properly deductible in full. Neither the court nor the law will penalize [Rebecca] for failing to perform the hollow act of asking questions, the answers to which would have provided no new or different information.

On this basis, the Fifth Circuit found that the tax court had been clearly erroneous in finding that Rebecca was not an innocent spouse.[1422]

However, there were certain penalties for which Rebecca did not qualify for innocent spouse relief based on a technicality, namely that the tax liability from which she sought relief was not a high enough amount.[1423] Thus, the Fifth Circuit explored whether she could be released from these liabilities for penalties based on other grounds —i.e., absence of negligence and, as relevant to Dee, reasonable cause. The Court concluded first that Rebecca had not been negligent:[1424]

> The relevant inquiry for the imposition of a negligence penalty is whether the taxpayer acted reasonably in claiming the loss. The Tax Court found that [Rebecca's] reliance on Stewart Goodson, the CPA who prepared the 1988 joint return, was not reasonable, as based on inaccurate information, in light of its decision that there was no separate loan from Don to DRPC. We find clear error in this conclusion of the Tax Court. For the same reasons that we concluded that [Rebecca] did not have reason to know of the substantial understatement on the 1987 joint return, we conclude that she acted reasonably in relying on the professionals who prepared the 1988 joint return. In fact, but for her failure to meet a technical requirement, she would have been an innocent spouse for purposes of the 1988 joint return. Goodson and Bryan, two CPA's at a national accounting firm, both agreed that the Resers' basis in DRPC was sufficient to claim the losses as deductions. As we stated in Chamberlain v. Commissioner, "[t]o require the taxpayer to challenge the [expert], to seek a 'second opinion,' or try to monitor [the expert] on the provisions of the Code himself would nullify the very purpose of seeking the advice of a presumed expert in the first place." Furthermore, [Rebecca] was wholly unaware of Don's belated attempt to recast the Frost Bank loan to his tax advantage.

The Fifth Circuit then considered whether, in addition to not being negligent, Rebecca had established that she had acted with reasonable cause and good faith.[1425] The Court concluded that Rebecca had established reasonable cause and good faith because:[1426]

> We have just concluded that [Rebecca] acted reasonably in relying on the professionals who prepared the 1988 joint return and would have been an innocent spouse for purposes of that return but for her failure to meet a technical requirement ... we exonerate her from liability for this penalty. Any other conclusion 598 would be absurdly inconsistent with our earlier holdings.

In this way, Rebecca escaped all liability for taxes or penalties related to erroneous deductions taken by her husband on their joint return.[1427]

Thus, in Reser, the Fifth Circuit stated that it would be "absurdly inconsistent" to hold that an innocent spouse who had no actual knowledge or reason to know of a tax liability caused by her husband's actions did not also have reasonable cause in relation to penalties caused by those same actions. The Fifth Circuit reached this conclusion in part on the basis that a spouse who did not know that the professional advice she relied on was based on incorrect facts provided by her husband could still rely on that advice, especially when that advice was regarding complicated tax law. There was no indication in the Fifth Circuit's reasoning that it was important whether Rebecca relied on this advice on her own or "through her husband," and the court's admonition against punishing Rebecca based on the hollow act of asking Don or the accountants questions would be inconsistent with a need for direct reliance. If Rebecca had been relying on advice directly, she would not have needed to ask questions, because she would have known the advice's contents already.

Finally, the Fifth Circuit held that Rebecca had acted with reasonable cause despite the fact that she was a highly educated lawyer who was at least somewhat involved in her husband's financial affairs.

There are numerous similarities between Dee's situation here and Rebecca's situation in Reser. Like Rebecca, Dee has been found to be an innocent spouse with respect to their income tax underpayments because she did not know or have reason to know of the income coming in from the offshore system.[1428] This finding was based on Dee's credible testimony at trial that she relied entirely on Charles to handle all tax and business matters throughout their marriage.[1429] Dee has never prepared a tax return or discussed tax matters with her husband or any tax professional.[1430] In fact, Dee testified that it was her practice to sign whatever tax return Charles or someone from the Wyly family office gave her without reviewing it or asking questions about it throughout their fifty plus year marriage.[1431]

The evidence shows that even to this day Dee is completely unaware of the intricacies of the offshore system Charles established.[1432] At trial, Dee testified that 599 she did not know what an annuity or a grantor or non-grantor trust was, and that she never discussed the offshore trusts or the other offshore corporations with her husband or with any other person.[1433] That Dee is largely unaware of even the basics of the offshore system is not incredible at all, as Dee testified that she "literally never" discussed business issues with Charles.[1434] Thus, Dee's lack of knowledge regarding the offshore system is presumably far greater than Rebecca's lack of knowledge regarding DRPC and its losses in Reser. Despite the fact that Rebecca was a highly educated lawyer who actually did have some involvement in her husband's business affairs, the Fifth Circuit found that Rebecca's education and experience and her level of involvement in her family's finances made it clear that she had no reason to know of the understatements caused by her husband.[1435] Dee's argument is much stronger than Rebecca's, as there is no evidence in the record that she has any business experience and she has credibly testified that she never even spoke about business matters with Charles.[1436]

Just as Rebecca in Reser was unaware that her husband had mischaracterized the nature of the DRPC loans to his professionals in seeking their advice, Dee was unaware (i) of the specifics of the advice that Charles had received, (ii) whether the advice actually addressed the relevant factual and legal issues that needed to be addressed, (iii) what factual assumptions served as the predicate for the advice, and (iv) whether there was anything wrong with the advice that was given to her husband by the many professionals that were consulted on his behalf regarding the offshore system. Although Charles is charged with knowledge of the contents of the advice that he received, albeit mostly indirectly through French, Robertson, Hennington and Boucher, and Charles is also charged with the knowledge that there were missing legal opinions, conflicting legal opinions, and legal opinions based on false factual assumptions that all impacted the tax status of the offshore system and his obligation to file reports about it with the IRS, Dee had no way of knowing any of that. In fact, had Dee sought out this information regarding the offshore system she—even more so than Rebecca in Reser —would in all likelihood have been told that nothing was amiss. Sam has consistently proclaimed his innocence of any wrongdoing here because, according to him, every professional he consulted told him all was fine with the offshore system. There is no reason to believe that Charles would have said anything different. And, while the Court has not found Sam's testimony credible given its review of the actual advice on which Sam purports to rely, Dee would have had no way of knowing that reassurances from Sam and Charles, if given, were untrue.

The Fifth Circuit refused to penalize Rebecca in Reser "for failing to perform the hollow act of asking questions, the answers to which would have provided no new or different information," especially when she had no knowledge that Don had falsely told their accountants that he had 600 loaned money to DRPC.[1437] The rationale for refusing to penalize Dee is even stronger here, where Dee's asking questions would have been an even hollower act than Rebecca's. While the Court believes that Dee is an intelligent woman, the Court is satisfied that her absolute lack of business sophistication would have left her unable to ask the relevant questions of Charles. Dee has three years of college, no business or legal experience, and was faced with a set of transactions much more complicated than the ones at issue in Reser —transactions which the IRS' expert—a highly experienced forensic accountant —called "if not the most complicated, one of the most complicated cases" that he had ever investigated.[1438] It would have been all but impossible for Dee to "fact check" the advice Charles received regarding the offshore system.

Dee's case is also similar to Rebecca's in Reser in that Dee is not entitled to innocent spouse relief for International Penalties due to a technicality. The technicality in Reser was that, at that time, only tax liabilities greater than 25% of the adjusted gross income for the preadjustment year were eligible for innocent spouse relief.[1439] This restriction has since been repealed.[1440] For Dee, the technicality is that innocent spouse relief applies only to income tax liability, not liability for International Penalties.[1441] This is despite the fact that Dee is liable for International Penalties for essentially the same reason that she would have been liable for income tax underpayments but for her innocent spouse defense—i.e., because the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts were grantor trusts as to Charles and her.

While the legal and factual issues are not identical, the similarity of Dee's situation to that of Rebecca in Reser strongly suggests that the Fifth Circuit would conclude that Dee acted with reasonable cause and not with willful neglect for the purposes of §§ 6038(c)(4)(B) and 6677(d). As the Fifth Circuit noted, it would be absurdly inconsistent to hold that Dee is an innocent spouse for the purposes of Charles' and her income tax underpayments but that she is not able to establish reasonable cause for the purposes of avoiding liability for the International Penalties, which flow from the same legal characterization of the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts as grantor trusts.

At trial, Dee credibly testified that, after Charles' death, she continued to rely on the Wyly family office to prepare her tax returns and to handle her finances, and that she has never had any reason to suspect that they were deficient in their duties.[1442] The fact that Charles died did not give Dee any new reason—or any new ability—to question whether she was filing all of the reports required by the IRS with respect to the offshore system.

In light of all of these facts and the legal principles articulated in Reser, the Court holds that Dee has established that she acted with reasonable cause and without willful neglect for all of the tax years at issue. Thus, Dee has established her reasonable cause defenses with respect to her liability for the International Penalties.

In coming to its conclusion as stated above, this Court has reviewed the cases 601 that, on first reading, counsel for a different result. The tax court has stated that "the fact that a husband assumes the duty to file a tax return and fails to do so does not of itself provide the wife with reasonable cause for failure to file, at least where the wife has not taken steps to assure that her husband has performed this duty.[1443] The tax court's refusal to allow reliance on a husband, standing alone, to constitute reasonable cause extends to situations where one wonders what more a wife could be asked to do. For example, Estate of Molever v. C.I.R.[1444] involved the following facts:

> Mr. Molever always prepared joint Federal income tax returns for himself and [Mrs. Molever], and [Mrs. Molever] relied on him, as an accountant, to do it properly. If she questioned anything he did, he thundered at her and accused her of ignorance. He assured her that he was in frequent consultation with two certified public accountants in Phoenix. In fact, Mr. Molever was deducting the expenses of his litigation as business expenses, assuring petitioner that he had "loss carryforwards." Among these expenses he deducted 40 percent of the Molevers' living expenses (rent, electricity, water, and telephone). Mr. Molever insisted that petitioner file a Form W–4 for 1987 on which she claimed 10 dependency exemptions. For 1988, petitioner filed a Form W–4 claiming 2 exemptions. Mr. Molever became enraged when he learned of this, and insisted petitioner again claim 10 exemptions for 1989. When correspondence or calls from the IRS arrived, petitioner directed them to Mr. Molever and relied on him to handle all tax matters.
> In early 1988, Mr. Molever was very ill with cancer and emphysema. After the episode in which he threatened petitioner with a gun, Mr. Molever's doctor advised petitioner that shortage of oxygen to his brain could explain his irrational episodes. Eventually, he required oxygen full-time. On April 10, 1991, Mr. Molever died.

Even in this situation, involving a wife faced with an irrational and violent husband who actively resisted her attempts to do what was right under the Internal Revenue Code, the tax court held that the taxpayer was negligent for not filing her tax return on time, and that reliance on her husband was insufficient to establish reasonable cause.[1445]

Dee's situation is distinguishable from the above cases in an important respect. 602 Courts holding that reliance on a husband is insufficient to establish reasonable cause have so held in the context of wives who failed to file standard income tax returns, a document U.S. taxpayers generally know is required to be filed annually.[1446] In contrast, Dee's liability for International Penalties arises as a result of a failure to file information returns related to foreign corporations and foreign trusts, documents that most U.S. taxpayers would be unaware of. Dee relied on legal professionals—albeit through Charles—to tell her whether these information returns should be filed. The women in the above-cited cases were relying on their husbands to make sure that returns they knew or should have known were due were in fact filed. The Supreme Court in U.S. v. Boyle has made it clear that it is reasonable to rely on a professional's advice as to whether a certain return should be filed, but that it is an individual taxpayer's responsibility to ensure that returns which they know are due are filed and filed timely.[1447] The Court thus distinguishes these cases from Dee's case.

For all of these reasons, the Court concludes that Dee has established her reasonable cause defenses to her liability for the International Penalties under 26 U.S.C. §§ 6038(c)(4)(B) and 6677(d).

I. Does the Imposition of the International Penalties Violate the Eighth Amendment?

1. Applicable Supreme Court Precedent

The Debtors final argument to avoid liability for the International Penalties is that those penalties constitute excessive fines under the Eighth Amendment of the United States Constitution, which provides, as relevant here, that: "[e]xcessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted."[1448] The Debtors' argument concerns only the excessive fines clause of the Eighth Amendment (the "Excessive Fines Clause")—i.e., that portion of the Eighth Amendment that provides that excessive fines shall not be imposed.[1449] Specifically, the Debtors argue that a quartet of relatively recent Supreme Court cases stand for the proposition that the International Penalties are unconstitutionally excessive fines as applied to them.[1450]

In contrast, while the IRS does not dispute the importance of these four Supreme Court decisions, it argues that under their holdings: (i) the International Penalties are not "fines" as that term is defined for purposes of the Excessive Fines Clause, and (ii) even if the International Penalties are "fines," they are not excessive. The 603 IRS also correctly notes that almost all of the relatively few cases that have interpreted the Excessive Fines Clause "concern forfeitures related to crimes;" and thus, the IRS cautions this Court against expanding the Supreme Court's Excessive Fines Clause jurisprudence into the realm of civil tax penalties, where it has never before been successfully used to strike down a civil tax penalty as unconstitutional.[1451]

For the reasons explained below, the Court largely agrees with the IRS and concludes that the International Penalties are not fines. Alternatively, the Court concludes that if the International Penalties are properly construed as fines, they (i) are not excessive as applied to Sam, and (ii) are excessive as applied to Dee.

a) The Supreme Court Decisions

The Debtors rely upon U.S. v. Halper,[1452] which, although not explicitly stated in their briefing, is helpful to them because it defines the concept of "punishment" broadly and only sanctions that are "punishment" can be considered to be "fines" under the Excessive Fines Clause.[1453] Halper submitted 65 Medicare reimbursements that were overstated by $9 each, for a total of $5 85.[1454] For this overbilling, Halper was assessed a criminal fine of $5,000 and imprisoned for two years.[1455] A civil False Claims Act suit was subsequently brought against him.[1456] Since Halper had violated the relevant statute under the False Claims Act 65 separate times, and each violation of the statute called for a penalty of $2, 000, double damages, and costs; a total civil liability of $130,000 was assessed against him.[1457] Halper argued that this nominal civil penalty raised implications under the Double Jeopardy Clause, which states that "nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb...."[1458]

Thus, the Halper Court addressed the question of "whether a civil sanction, in application, may be so divorced from any remedial goal that it constitutes 'punishment' for the purposes of double jeopardy analysis."[1459] The Halper Court held that "under the Double Jeopardy Clause a defendant who already has been punished in a criminal prosecution may not be subjected to an additional civil sanction to the extent that the second sanction may not fairly be characterized as remedial, but only as a deterrent or retribution."[1460] In defining remedial versus deterrent or retributive sanctions, the Halper Court noted that "a civil sanction that cannot fairly be said solely to serve a remedial purpose, but rather can only be explained as also 604 serving either retributive or deterrent purposes, is punishment."[1461] The Court also noted that both civil and criminal sanctions constitute punishment when "as applied in the individual case" they serve the goals of punishment.[1462]

It is important to stress that Halper is a double jeopardy case, and that a later Supreme Court case—Hudson v. U.S.—"in large part disavow[ed] the method of analysis used in United States v. Halper " in the double jeopardy context and called the Halper framework "ill considered" and "unworkable."[1463] Furthermore, the Halper Court itself noted that the rule it announced "is a rule for the rare case ... where a fixed-penalty provision subjects a prolific but small-gauge offender to a sanction overwhelmingly disproportionate to the damages he caused"[1464] and that "the only proscription established by our ruling is that the Government may not criminally prosecute a defendant, impose a criminal penalty upon him, and then bring a separate civil action based on the same conduct and receive a judgment not rationally related to the goal of making the Government whole."[1465] The Halper Court also noted that, despite its holding, "the Government is entitled to rough remedial justice ... according to somewhat imprecise formulas, such as reasonable liquidated damages or a fixed sum plus double damages ...,"[1466] and acknowledged that drawing the line between remedial and punitive sanctions is always an imprecise science and often an impossible one.[1467]

The second case relied upon by the Debtors here is Browning–Ferris Indus. of Vt., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc.,[1468] which held that "[w]hatever the outer confines of the [Excessive Fines Clause's] reach may be, we now decide only that it does not constrain an award of money damages in a civil suit when the government neither has prosecuted the action nor has any right to receive a share of the damages awarded." Thus, the Supreme Court did not apply the Excessive Fines Clause to a jury's award of punitive damages in a private, civil lawsuit.[1469] The relevance of this holding to the Motions 605 and Claim Objections is not immediately apparent. However, the Debtors cite it for the proposition that the word "fine" in the context of the Excessive Fines Clause means "a payment to a sovereign as punishment for some offense."[1470]

The Debtors next rely upon Austin v. U.S.,[1471] which answered the question of "whether the Excessive Fines Clause of the Eighth Amendment applies to forfeitures of property under 21 U.S.C. §§ 881(a)(4) and (a)(7)." The Austin Court held that it did, because the forfeitures in question constituted "payment to a sovereign as punishment for some offense."[1472] The Austin Court reached this conclusion on the basis that, in certain cases, civil sanctions could be considered to be punishment under the Excessive Fines Clause:[1473]

> The Excessive Fines Clause limits the government's power to extract payments, whether in cash or in kind, "as punishment for some offense." [Browning–Ferris, 492 U.S. at 265, 109 S.Ct. 2909.] (emphasis added). "The notion of punishment, as we commonly understand it, cuts across the division between the civil and the criminal law." United States v. Halper, 490 U.S. 435, 447–448, 109 S.Ct. 1892, 1901, 104 L.Ed.2d 487 (1989). "It is commonly understood that civil proceedings may advance punitive as well as remedial goals, and, conversely, that both punitive and remedial goals may be served by criminal penalties." Id., at 447, 109 S.Ct., at 1901. See also United States ex rel. Marcus v. Hess, 317 U.S. 537, 554, 63 S.Ct. 379, 389, 87 L.Ed. 443 (1943) (Frankfurter, J., concurring). Thus, the question is not, as the United States would have it, whether forfeiture under §§ 881(a)(4) and (a)(7) is civil or criminal, but rather whether it is punishment.
> In considering this question, we are mindful of the fact that sanctions frequently serve more than one purpose. We need not exclude the possibility that a forfeiture serves remedial purposes to conclude that it is subject to the limitations of the Excessive Fines Clause. We, however, must determine that it can only be explained as serving in part to punish. We said in Halper that "a civil sanction that cannot fairly be said solely to serve a remedial purpose, but rather can only be explained as also serving either retributive or deterrent purposes, is punishment, as we have come to understand the term." 490 U.S., at 448, 109 S.Ct., at 1902.

The Austin Court noted that the determination of whether a sanction was a punishment and therefore a fine under the Excessive Fines Clause was governed by Halper : "[u]nder [Halper], the question is whether forfeiture serves in part to punish, and one need not exclude the possibility that forfeiture serves other purposes to reach that conclusion."[1474] In rejecting the argument that the forfeitures in question were purely remedial, the Supreme Court noted "forfeiture of property is a penalty that has absolutely no correlation to any damages sustained by society or to the cost of enforcing the law."[1475]

606 The Austin Court concluded that forfeitures under 21 U.S.C. §§ 881(a)(4) and (a)(7) did not serve a solely remedial purpose in light of (i) the historical understanding of forfeiture as punishment, (ii) the clear focus of the forfeiture statutes in question on the culpability of the owner, and (iii) evidence that Congress understood these provisions as serving to deter and punish.[1476] In a footnote, the Austin court drew a distinction between forfeitures and other types of monetary sanctions:[1477]

> In Halper, we focused on whether "the sanction as applied in the individual case serves the goals of punishment." 490 U.S., at 448, 109 S.Ct., at 1902. In this case, however, it makes sense to focus on §§ 881(a)(4) and (a)(7) as a whole. Halper involved a small, fixed-penalty provision, which "in the ordinary case ... can be said to do no more than make the Government whole." Id., at 449, 109 S.Ct., at 1902. The value of the conveyances and real property forfeitable under §§ 881(a)(4) and (a)(7), on the other hand, can vary so dramatically that any relationship between the Government's actual costs and the amount of the sanction is merely coincidental. See Ward, 448 U.S., at 254, 100 S.Ct., at 2644. Furthermore, as we have seen, forfeiture statutes historically have been understood as serving not simply remedial goals but also those of punishment and deterrence. Finally, it appears to make little practical difference whether the Excessive Fines Clause applies to all forfeitures under §§ 881(a)(4) and (a)(7) or only to those that cannot be characterized as purely remedial. The Clause prohibits only the imposition of "excessive" fines, and a fine that serves purely remedial purposes cannot be considered "excessive" in any event.

The Austin Court did not articulate a test for determining whether a particular forfeiture or other type of punishment is excessive under the Excessive Fines Clause. Instead, it held only that payments to a sovereign that are made as punishment for some offense are subject to the limitations of the Excessive Fines Clause, and that a sanction is punishment under the Excessive Fines Clause if it serves a retributive or deterrent purpose.[1478]

Finally, the Debtors rely upon U.S. v. Bajakajian.[1479] Bajakajian was the first—and to date is the only—Supreme Court case that actually applies the Excessive Fines Clause.[1480] Bajakajian was convicted of willfully failing to report the fact that he was transporting more than $10,000 in currency out of the country.[1481] The penalty for this offense was the forfeiture of the entire amount that Bajakajian failed to report—$357,144.[1482] Bajakajian was transporting these funds to repay a lawful debt, and his failure to report the funds was not connected to any kind of unlawful activity, including tax evasion.[1483] The Supreme Court noted that the district court had found that Bajakajian "failed to report that he was taking the currency out of the United States because of fear stemming 607 from cultural differences: Respondent, who had grown up as a member of the Armenian minority in Syria, had a distrust for the Government."[1484]

The Bajakajian Court adopted the Austin Court's analysis, and stated that "[f]orfeitures—payments in kind—are thus 'fines' if they constitute punishment for an offense."[1485] The Bajakajian Court also adopted the Austin Court's assertion that even if a forfeiture is only punitive in part that it is still within the purview of the Excessive Fines Clause.[1486] Having decided that the forfeiture in question was a fine within the meaning of the Excessive Fines Clause, the Bajakajian Court then turned to the question of whether that fine was excessive,[1487] holding that "a punitive forfeiture violates the Excessive Fines Clause if it is grossly disproportional to the gravity of a defendant's offense."[1488] The Supreme Court reasoned that a forfeiture must be grossly disproportional to the gravity of a defendant's offense based on two observations: (i) "judgments about the appropriate punishment for an offense belong in the first instance to the legislature,"[1489] and (ii) "any judicial determination regarding the gravity of a particular criminal offense will be inherently imprecise." [1490] According to the Court, these two observations, taken together, "counsel against requiring strict proportionality between the amount of a punitive forfeiture and the gravity of a criminal offense;" [1491] "[i]f the amount of the forfeiture is grossly disproportional to the gravity of the defendant's offense, it is unconstitutional." [1492]

Applying this standard, the Supreme Court held that the forfeiture imposed on Bajakajian was grossly disproportional to the gravity of his offense, and thus violated the Excessive Fines Clause because [1493]

> Respondent's crime was solely a reporting offense. It was permissible to transport the currency out of the country so long as he reported it. Section 982(a)(1) orders currency to be forfeited for a "willful" violation of the reporting requirement. Thus, the essence of respondent's crime is a willful failure to report the removal of currency from the United States. Furthermore, as the District Court found, respondent's violation 608 was unrelated to any other illegal activities. The money was the proceeds of legal activity and was to be used to repay a lawful debt. Whatever his other vices, respondent does not fit into the class of persons for whom the statute was principally designed: He is not a money launderer, a drug trafficker, or a tax evader ... And under the Sentencing Guidelines, the maximum sentence that could have been imposed on respondent was six months, while the maximum fine was $5,000.
> The harm that respondent caused was also minimal. Failure to report his currency affected only one party, the Government, and in a relatively minor way. There was no fraud on the United States, and respondent caused no loss to the public fisc. Had his crime gone undetected, the Government would have been deprived only of the information that $357,144 had left the country.
>
> Comparing the gravity of respondent's crime with the $357,144 forfeiture the Government seeks, we conclude that such a forfeiture would be grossly disproportional to the gravity of his offense. It is larger than the $5,000 fine imposed by the District Court by many orders of magnitude, and it bears no articulable correlation to any injury suffered by the Government.

[115] [116] [117] [118] [119] Thus, these cases—beginning with Halper and ending with Bajakajian —lay out a framework for how to apply the Excessive Fines Clause. In sum, to be constrained by the Excessive Fines Clause, a sanction must be (i) a fine, and (ii) excessive. [1494] A sanction is a "fine" if it is "payment to a sovereign as punishment for some offense." [1495] A payment is made "as punishment for some offense" when its purpose is —even in part—retribution or deterrence. [1496] A fine is excessive when it is "grossly disproportional to the gravity of the defendant's offense." [1497] In order to evaluate whether a fine is grossly disproportional to the gravity of a defendant's offense, courts should consider the Bajakajian factors, including: (i) the essence of the violator's wrongdoing and its relation to other illegal activity, (ii) whether the violator fits into the class of persons for whom the statute was principally designed, (iii) the nature of the harm caused by the violator's conduct, and (iv) the maximum non-forfeiture sentence and fine that could have been imposed. [1498]

b) Lower Courts' Interpretations of Supreme Court Precedent

The most recent of the Supreme Court cases just discussed, Bajakajian, was decided over fifteen years ago. Since Bajakajian was decided, lower courts have had ample opportunity to apply its holdings to monetary sanctions. Significantly, neither party has cited a case to the Court, nor has the Court been able to locate one through its own research, invalidating a non-forfeiture, legislative civil penalty under the Excessive Fines Clause. [1499] Indeed, 609 the post-Austin and post-Bajakajian cases that the Court has reviewed largely counsel against a holding that the International Penalties are fines, [1500] or that they are excessive, as will be discussed below.

2. Are the International Penalties "Fines"?

[120] Various courts of appeals have categorically refused to extend Austin and Bajakajian into the realm of civil tax penalties. For example, in McNichols v. C.I.R.,[1501] McNichols forfeited all of the proceeds of his drug dealing to the United States.[1502] In addition, the IRS assessed fraud penalties against McNichols.[1503] The First Circuit held that the assessment of fraud penalties against McNichols on property that he had already forfeited to the government as a part of a criminal plea agreement was not a fine that could be limited by the Excessive Fines Clause, explaining that:[1504]

> Using Austin as a springboard, petitioner argues that the additions to the income tax were punitive, and that, by seizing his property and then subjecting that same property to an income tax along with penalties and interest, the IRS has violated the proportionality requirements of the Eighth Amendment. We decline to take the giant leap that petitioner urges for several reasons. First there is an insurmountable wall of tax cases, discussed infra, holding that the government has a right to do precisely what it has done here. Second, the instant case is a civil income tax not a forfeiture case as was Austin. And Austin does not directly or impliedly suggest that either its holding or statements to the effect that a forfeiture can be an excessive fine under the Eighth Amendment are or should be applicable to any actions other than forfeitures under 21 U.S.C. §§ 881(a)(4) and (a)(7). Nor, under the facts of this case, do we perceive any reason for applying the principles of Austin to petitioner. Petitioner agreed to the forfeiture. He stipulated to the tax court that he derived unreported taxable income in 1981 and 1982 from the sale of marijuana. The plea agreement warned petitioner that income tax might be due. Indeed, prior to signing the plea agreement, petitioner was sent a notice of deficiency assessing 610 taxes and penalties for the years 1981 and 1982. The Supreme Court in James v. United States, 366 U.S. 213, 81 S.Ct. 1052, 6 L.Ed.2d 246 (1961) made an observation that applies to petitioner:
> > We should not continue to confound confusion, particularly when the result would be to perpetuate the injustice of relieving embezzlers of the duty of paying income taxes on the money they enrich themselves with through theft while honest people pay their taxes on every conceivable type of income.
> Id. at 221, 81 S.Ct. at 1056. We find no Eighth Amendment violations.

As is obvious from its decision, the First Circuit refused to read the Austin Court's definition of "fines" as encompassing civil tax penalties. The McNichols court also rejected an attempt to use Halper for the purpose of characterizing civil tax penalties as fines, stating that "[t]o use Halper as a base for vaulting into the tax arena would be to misapply the case and distort its holding."[1505] The McNichols court also noted—as does the IRS in its briefing here—that characterizing civil tax penalties as having the kind of punishment purpose that would make them fines under Austin runs counter to the Supreme Court decision in Helvering v. Mitchell,[1506] where the Court characterized additions to tax for fraud as remedial as opposed to punitive:[1507]

> The remedial character of sanctions imposing additions to a tax has been made clear by this Court ... They are provided primarily as a safeguard for the protection of the revenue and to reimburse the Government for the heavy expense of investigation and the loss resulting from the taxpayer's fraud.

Holding that Helvering v. Mitchell was "the foundation stone" for "the wall of cases" that barred McNichols' Excessive Fines Clause defense, the First Circuit concluded that the Helvering Court's characterization of civil tax penalties as remedial meant that civil tax penalties are not fines, and that because they are not fines they are not subject to the Excessive Fines Clause's limitations.[1508]

While the Fifth Circuit has not spoken as directly as some of the other circuits on the issue of whether civil tax penalties can ever be "fines" under Austin, decisions of the Fifth Circuit that touch upon this issue also counsel against a holding that the International Penalties are fines. For example, in the context of a double jeopardy analysis, the Fifth Circuit noted that a civil penalty for failure to file an information return "is analogous to the fraud penalty at issue in Helvering," and for that reason found the civil penalty for failure to file an information return to be remedial rather than punitive for double jeopardy purposes.[1509] The Fifth Circuit has also noted that Austin did not overrule an earlier Supreme Court decision—Ingraham v. Wright —where "the Court explicitly described the Eighth Amendment as being 'designed to protect those convicted of 611 crimes.' "[1510] And, of course, both Austin and Bajakajian involved individuals who had been convicted of crimes, unlike the Debtors here.

As relevant here then, under Austin, a monetary sanction is a "fine" if it is "payment to a sovereign as punishment for some offense,"[1511] and a payment is made "as punishment for some offense" when its purpose is—even in part—retribution or deterrence.[1512] It is clear that the International Penalties have at least some deterrent purpose. The Joint Committee on Taxation explained in its report titled "General Explanation of Tax Legislation Enacted in the 104th Congress" that 26 U.S.C. §§ 6038, 6048, and 6677 were amended into their present forms because:

> The Congress was informed that certain U.S. settlors established foreign trusts, including grantor trusts, in tax haven jurisdictions. Income from such foreign grantor trusts was taxable on a current basis to the U.S. grantor, but the Congress understood that there was noncompliance in this regard. The Congress was concerned that the prior-law civil penalties for failure to comply with the reporting requirements applicable to foreign trusts established by U.S. persons had proven to be ineffective. In order to deter noncompliance, the Congress believed that it is appropriate to expand the reporting requirements relating to activities of foreign trusts with U.S. grantors or U.S. beneficiaries and to increase the civil penalties applicable to a failure to comply with such reporting requirements.[1513]

The "prior-law civil penalties" that the Joint Committee on Taxation described had been limited to a maximum of $1,000.[1514] Today, the penalty for each violation of § 6038 is $10,000.[1515] The penalty for violations of § 6048(b) is $10,000, or 5% of the gross value of the relevant 612 trust's assets, whichever is greater.[1516]

The explanation of the Joint Committee on Taxation cited above indicates that the International Penalties are aimed at preventing—or deterring—the precise actions that the Wylys have engaged in here—i.e., surreptitious transactions by U.S. taxpayers with foreign trusts on whose income tax should have been paid, and whose existence and taxability went undetected for many years, in part because reporting requirements were not followed. The International Penalties represent more than housekeeping requirements. As the IRS notes, the International Penalties "are connected to tax evasion."[1517] They operate to deter misconduct in an international sphere that, as the Joint Committee on Taxation pointed out, can be dominated by secrecy.[1518]

Under Austin, this deterrence factor weighs in favor of holding that the International Penalties have at least some punishment purpose, and are therefore fines that can be limited by the Excessive Fines Clause. However, there are also numerous factors that weigh against such a holding. Even the Austin Court noted—citing Halper —that in the ordinary case a small, fixed-penalty provision "can be said to do no more than make the government whole" and that such penalties are therefore remedial.[1519] Both Austin and Bajakajian were decided within the specific context of forfeitures that were imposed in connection with some crime.

The parties have not cited, nor has the Court located through its own research, a single case that holds that a tax penalty such as the International Penalties is a fine under the Excessive Fines Clause, let alone an excessive fine. As discussed above, most circuit courts that have considered the question of whether it is appropriate to treat tax penalties as fines under the Excessive Fines Clause have answered that question with a categorical "no," and the tax court has followed suit. The one circuit court that has left the door open to even the possibility of a tax penalty being treated as a fine under the Excessive Fines Clause has stated that such penalties could only be fines where "no remedial purpose" was served or where such penalties are "several times greater than necessary to achieve a remedial purpose."[1520] These courts rely on the Supreme Court's characterization of tax penalties as purely remedial in Helvering v. Mitchell as support for their analysis, an analysis that can be extended to the International Penalties.

Such a strong consensus among the circuit courts—as well as the tax court—that Austin and Bajakajian should not be extended into the tax realm counsels against 613 treating the International Penalties as fines. Although the Fifth Circuit has not spoken as clearly on this issue as other courts, its precedent also counsels this result. The Fifth Circuit has specifically stated that a civil penalty for failure to file an information return "is analogous to the fraud penalty at issue in Helvering" and is thus purely remedial.[1521] The Fifth Circuit has also held that an administrative fine cannot be excessive as long as it "does not exceed the limits of the statute authorizing it."[1522] This statement leads to the inference that—under Fifth Circuit precedent—a non-forfeiture fine such as the International Penalties cannot violate the Eighth Amendment.

From this Court's perspective, a holding that the International Penalties are not fines is consistent with relevant Supreme Court precedent, including Austin and Bajakajian. First, both of those cases were decided within the narrow context of forfeitures related to crimes, and extending their holdings to the realm of civil tax penalties would be, as the First Circuit said, a "giant leap."[1523]

Second, when the Supreme Court disavowed the reasoning of Halper in Hudson v. U.S., it observed that "all civil penalties have some deterrent effect."[1524] This observation makes sense. No one wants to pay a penalty, and thus the imposition of a penalty will always have at least some deterrent effect. But, this observation is in natural tension with Austin's statement that a "civil sanction that cannot fairly be said solely to serve a remedial purpose, but rather can only be explained as also serving either retributive or deterrent purposes, is punishment, as we have come to understand the term."[1525] However, if any deterrent purpose is sufficient in order to declare a civil sanction to be punishment and therefore a fine, then all civil sanctions are necessarily punishment, and it therefore becomes unnecessary to evaluate whether a civil sanction is a "fine" under the Excessive Fines Clause. A court can simply proceed to analyze whether the civil sanction is excessive in every instance, because the answer to whether a particular civil sanction is a fine will always be "yes." This cannot be the proper result in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Helvering v. Mitchell, which declares civil tax penalties to be remedial. It also cannot be the proper result in light of the fact that Austin does not declare it unnecessary to analyze whether civil sanctions are fines, and the fact that Bajakajian declares that traditional, civil, in rem forfeitures as they were understood at the time the Eighth Amendment was enacted are not fines.[1526]

In sum, those courts that have been faced with the dilemma of how to apply an Excessive Fines Clause analysis to civil tax penalties have all arrived at largely the same answer—i.e., civil tax penalties such as the International Penalties are not fines, and therefore the Excessive Fines Clause is not applicable to them. This Court likewise concludes that the International Penalties are not fines, adopting the reasoning of those courts.

*614 3. Alternatively, Are the International Penalties "Excessive?"

Alternatively, even if this Court concluded that the International Penalties are fines, lower court cases interpreting Bajakajian make strong arguments that fines such as the International Penalties under § 6677 can almost never be excessive. In Bajakajian, the Supreme Court held that in order to determine if a forfeiture is excessive, a court must: "compare the amount of the forfeiture to the gravity of the defendant's offense. If the amount of the forfeiture is grossly disproportional to the gravity of the defendant's offense, it is unconstitutional."[1527] Although decided prior to Bajakajian, the Fourth Circuit's observations in Thomas[1528] regarding percentage-based tax penalties are nevertheless still applicable here:

> Even assuming arguendo that the Excessive Fines Clause is implicated in this case, there is no basis for concluding that the $44,068 sanction is excessive. If the addition to tax is always calculated as fifty percent of the tax deficiency regardless of the means by which the income is accrued, the sanction could not be excessive as to one person, but not excessive as to another. All persons forced to pay additions to tax for > civil fraud are treated in the same manner.

Moreover, the tax court agreed with the Thomas court's observation in a post-Bajakajian context in Gorra v. C.I.R., [1529] noting that a civil tax penalty calculated as a percentage of an underpayment "could not be excessive to one person, but not excessive as to another" and that such a penalty by its nature "bears a relationship to the gravity of the offense that it is designed to remedy."

There is also a strong argument that a fixed-penalty provision such as the $10,000 fine assessed under § 6038 should rarely be considered excessive. The Supreme Court in Halper noted that "the Government is entitled to rough remedial justice, that is, it may demand compensation according to somewhat imprecise formulas, such as reasonable liquidated damages or a fixed sum plus double damages" without such a sanction being labeled as punishment. [1530] The Halper court also noted that its holding that a fixed-damages provision was punishment was a rule for the rare case. [1531] Indeed, it is telling that the Debtors have not cited to a case that declares a fixed, nonforfeiture, legislative fine such as the one imposed under § 6038 unconstitutional, nor has the Court been able to locate such a case through its own research.

Another factor counseling against declaring the International Penalties excessive here is that even in the realm of forfeitures—where offenders may be punished with a total surrender of property on top of the maximum statutory fine—courts have been reluctant to find that those forfeitures are "grossly disproportional." For example, in U.S. v. Wallace, [1532] the Fifth Circuit found that punishing a pilot for a simple failure to register his airplane by forcing him to forfeit that airplane was not a grossly disproportional fine. In arriving at this conclusion, the Fifth Circuit 615 noted that the forfeiture was within the range of fines prescribed by Congress for the pilot's reporting violation, and that this created "a strong presumption ... that the forfeiture is constitutional." [1533]

The Eleventh Circuit explained the rationale for this conclusion in U.S. v. 817 N.E. 29th Drive, Wilton Manors, Fla., [1534] where it noted that > Translating the gravity of a crime into monetary terms—such that it can be proportioned to the value of forfeited property—is not a simple task. Fortunately for us, this task has already been performed by two very competent bodies. The first is Congress, which, in enacting criminal laws, has specified the maximum permissible fine for a given offense. Because Congress is a representative body, its pronouncements regarding the appropriate range of fines for a crime represent the collective opinion of the American people as to what is and is not excessive. Given that excessiveness is a highly subjective judgment, the courts should be hesitant to substitute their opinion for that of the people. Consequently, if the value of forfeited property is within the range of fines prescribed by Congress, a strong presumption arises that the forfeiture is constitutional.

The Eleventh Circuit also noted in Wilton Manors that "[i]t is important to remember that the Excessive Fines Clause was drafted in an era in which the amount of a fine was determined solely by the judiciary; the Clause was thus intended as a limitation on courts, not legislatures." [1535]

Here, the International Penalties represent the very maximum fine that the Fifth Circuit would use as a benchmark for assessing proportionality. Moreover, the Fifth Circuit in Wallace also noted that the pilot's violation was more serious than the one at issue in Bajakajian, as it was a continuing violation occurring over the course of seven years as opposed to a one-time violation. [1536] Finally, the Wallace court also considered the degree to which the pilot benefited from his violation. [1537]

Both Wallace and an additional Fifth Circuit case —Newell Recycling Co., Inc. v. U.S. E.P.A. [1538] —indicate that the Fifth Circuit would consider almost any fine that was within the statutory maximum to be non-excessive under the Excessive Fines Clause. In Newell Recycling, the Fifth Circuit held that "[n]o matter how excessive (in lay terms) an administrative fine may appear, if the fine does not exceed the limits prescribed by the statute authorizing it, the fine does not violate the Eighth Amendment."[1539] Although 616 Newell Recycling was decided after both Austin and Bajakajian, it cites neither of these cases, which leads to an inference that the Fifth Circuit reads Austin and Bajakajian narrowly and to not apply outside of the context of forfeitures.[1540] If an administrative body's application of a maximum statutory fine is per se constitutional as the Fifth Circuit held in Newell Recycling, there is no reason to think that a court's application of a maximum statutory fine in a court proceeding would not also be per se constitutional.

a) As to Sam

[121] With these standards in mind, we turn to the International Penalties at issue here. According to the Computation Stipulations, Sam owes $427,614,822 in International Penalties related to failures to file Forms 3520–A and 5471.[1541] To reiterate, a fine is excessive when it is "grossly disproportional to the gravity of [Sam's] offense."[1542] And, in order to evaluate whether a fine is grossly disproportional to the gravity of Sam's offense, this Court is to consider the following factors: (i) the essence of Sam's wrongdoing and its relation to other illegal activity, (ii) whether Sam fits into the class of persons for whom the statute was principally designed, (iii) the nature of the harm caused by Sam's conduct, and (iv) the maximum non-forfeiture sentence and fine that could have been imposed.[1543] Sam has the burden of proof on the issue of excessiveness.[1544] For the reasons stated below and after analyzing the Bajakajian factors just identified, this Court finds that the International Penalties are not grossly disproportional to the gravity of Sam's offense, assuming that the International Penalties are fines.

First, it is important to note that the International Penalties are an inherently different type of penalty than the forfeitures at issue in Austin and Bajakajian. Unlike fixed penalty provisions such as the International Penalties, "forfeiture of property is a penalty that has absolutely no correlation to any damages sustained by society or to the cost of enforcing the law."[1545] Forfeitures thus have an inherent risk of disproportionality that is simply not present in the context of the International Penalties. Moreover, in Bajakajian, the Supreme Court pointed out that it was impossible to prove that the harm from Bajakajian's failure to report that he was taking $357,144 out of the country was "anywhere near 30 times greater than that caused by a hypothetical drug dealer who willfully fails to report taking $12,000 out of the country in order to purchase 617 drugs."[1546] This conclusion was possible because the harm to the government—information loss—was not related to the amount of money at issue.

Here, that disconnect is lacking. Section 6677(b) penalizes United States persons who are treated as owners of foreign trusts under the Grantor Trust Rules.[1547] To the extent that a taxpayer is treated as an owner of a foreign trust, that trust's income is taxable to that United States person under 26 U.S.C. § 671. Thus, every dollar unreported by the United States taxpayer is also—in most instances, and especially in Sam's instance—a dollar untaxed, lending an inherent proportionality to penalties under § 6677(b).[1548] This analysis is in line with the Fourth Circuit's observation that penalties assessed on a percentage basis are inherently proportional.[1549] Indeed, the parties have not cited, nor has the Court located through its own research, a single case that has invalidated a percentage calculation penalty, such as the International Penalties assessed under § 6677, under the Excessive Fines Clause.

What is more, many courts—including the Fifth Circuit —have held that a forfeiture that involves property of a value that falls within the maximum statutory fine that could be imposed for the same offense is strongly presumed to be constitutional.[1550] These holdings lead to an inference that a fixed or percentage-based fine that falls within the statutory maximum is also strongly presumed to be constitutional.[1551] Here, there is no forfeiture involved, and the International Penalties themselves are the very maximum statutory fine that the Fifth Circuit and other courts would use as a benchmark to measure proportionality. Such an approach leaves this Court with little opportunity to declare that the International Penalties are grossly disproportional to the gravity of Sam's offense.

An assessment of the Bajakajian factors also leads the Court to the conclusion that the International Penalties are not grossly disproportional as to Sam. The first Bajakajian factor—the essence of the violator's wrongdoing and its relation to other illegal activity [1552]—weighs against a finding that the International Penalties are grossly disproportional to the gravity of Sam's offense. Although Sam is liable for International Penalties as a result of "mere reporting offenses," the similarities to Bajakajian end there. Sam's reporting offense was very much related to other illegal activity—namely his decades long 618 tax fraud and his violations of the securities laws. Indeed, as discussed above in the Court's reasonable cause and fraud analyses, Sam and his agents avoided reporting requirements such as those required by the International Penalties' provisions specifically in order to facilitate his tax fraud. [1553] Any need to file international reporting forms was of great concern to the Wyly family office, and Hennington in particular expressed a preference for transactions that did not come with reporting requirements [1554]—no doubt because of her principals' views.

Just as Sam avoided SEC reporting requirements by structuring the securities held in the offshore system so that no single entity held a reportable amount of stock in order to avoid an SEC position that was inconsistent with his tax position, Sam avoided filing Forms 3520–A and 5471 in order to conceal the extent of the Wyly offshore system and to avoid an IRS audit. [1555] Forms 3520–A and 5471 are information returns, and as the Joint Committee on Taxation noted in its report on §§ 6038, 6048, and 6677, they are necessary "because some of the jurisdictions in which U.S. settlors established foreign trusts have strict secrecy laws ... [that] may effectively preclude the Treasury Department from obtaining information necessary to determine the tax liabilities of the U.S. grantors or U.S. beneficiaries with respect to items related to such foreign trusts." [1556] Sam's lack of reporting was thus a key component of his tax fraud. All of these factors indicate that Sam's violation of a reporting requirement was thus, unlike the violation in Bajakajian, related to other illegal activity besides the reporting requirement itself.

The second Bajakajian factor—whether the violator fits into the class of persons for whom the statute was principally designed [1557]—also weighs against Sam. The International Penalties were designed in order to combat a very specific problem—i.e., United States persons establishing foreign grantor trusts in tax haven jurisdictions and then failing to report the income from these trusts as taxable to them. [1558] Sam is a United States person who established multiple foreign trusts in a known 619 tax haven. [1559] He then proceeded to not report the income from the grantor trusts as taxable income to him, which in turn led to an IRS audit, the filing of his Case here, and the filing of the Motion and Claim Objection in the Case. Sam falls squarely within the class of persons for whom the International Penalties statutes were designed. It is difficult to imagine an offender who "fits the mold" of the International Penalties better than Sam.

The third Bajakajian factor—the nature of the harm caused by the violator's conduct [1560]—also weighs against Sam. The Bajakajian Court noted that the reporting offense at issue there resulted in very little harm—the government was faced with a loss of information only, and there was no harm "to the public fisc." [1561] Here, the circumstances are starkly different. Sam's reporting failure allowed him to avoid paying hundreds of millions of dollars of tax liability, which in turn deprived the United States government of hundreds of millions of dollars of revenue, and which may now be more difficult for the government to collect given the passage of time and the dissipation of Sam's wealth. According to the Debtors' post-trial reply, Sam owes $121,193,181 in federal income tax liability for the years 1996 through 2013, the years at issue for which the IRS asserts International Penalties liability. [1562] This is a staggering amount of taxes to have failed to pay. As the Debtors point out, however, Sam's International Penalties liability for those same years is $427,614,822, which is more than three times his tax liability. [1563]

While interesting, Sam's argument lacks force. First, Sam has no one to blame but himself for the enormous amount of International Penalties he is liable for. As early as 1993, Sam's trusted agent, French, was made aware that there was a significant 620 risk that the 1992 IOM trusts were grantor trusts as to Sam. This characterization of the trusts as grantor trusts, if correct, would change both the tax consequences of the trusts to Sam and Sam's reporting obligations. This knowledge is imputed to Sam under agency principles. [1564] Moreover, the factual predicates for the 1994 and 1995 IOM trusts being foreign grantor trusts as to King and Cairns were not satisfied, as Sam either knew or should have known. [1565] However, Sam chose to (i) ignore these problems, and (ii) fail to report his ownership interest in these offshore trusts on Form 3520–A or his ownership interest in the Foreign Corporations on Form 5471. As the years wore on and the International Penalties grew, so too did the magnitude of Sam's tax fraud, and therefore the magnitude of the harm caused by Sam's reporting violations.

Second, the harm caused by Sam's reporting violations should not be measured merely against the amount of Sam's tax liability. Sam should have paid the taxes he owes without the need for a lengthy audit and a multi-year federal court proceeding. Moreover, Sam had the use of the $121 million of income taxes he owed for the period that he failed to pay his tax obligation. Obviously, the ongoing harm of Sam's reporting violations—in addition to the base amount of taxes owed—is compounded by: (i) the time value of money lost by the government, (ii) the significant costs incurred by the government in pursuing Sam, (iii) the general blow to the integrity of the tax system caused by Sam's conduct, and (iv) the risk of collection the government now faces given the passage of time and the dissipation of Sam's assets. While the penalties assessed against Sam are vast, so too is the harm that he caused. Thus, the third Bajakajian factor weighs against a finding that the International Penalties are grossly disproportional to the gravity of Sam's offense.

The final Bajakajian factor—the maximum non-forfeiture sentence and fine that could have been imposed [1566]—also weighs against a holding that the International Penalties are grossly disproportional to the gravity of Sam's offense. This is because the International Penalties are one of the relevant, non-forfeiture fines that can be imposed against Sam. It is also noteworthy that the International Penalties under § 6677 have their own built-in maximum: [1567]

> At such time as the gross reportable amount with respect to any failure can be determined by the Secretary, any subsequent penalty imposed under this subsection with respect to such failure shall be reduced as necessary to assure that the aggregate amount of such penalties do not exceed the gross reportable amount (and to the extent that such aggregate amount already exceeds the gross reportable amount the Secretary shall refund such excess to the taxpayer).

For the purposes of Sam's violations of § 6048(b), "gross reportable amount" is defined as "the gross value of the portion of the trust's assets at the close of the year treated as owned by the United States person." [1568] Thus, a percentage-based penalty under § 6677 can never result in a 621 penalty more severe than total forfeiture of all assets in the trust. [1569] This cap, which places an upper limit on the percentage-based penalty under § 6677, lends even more weight to the idea that a penalty under § 6677 is strongly presumed to be constitutional and that the International Penalties here are not grossly disproportional as to Sam.

For all of these reasons, even if the International Penalties are fines, they are not excessive fines as applied to Sam.

b) As to Dee

[122] According to the Computation Stipulations, Dee owes $277,312,325 in International Penalties related to failures to file Forms 3520–A and 5471. [1570] Dee's Eighth Amendment argument is more compelling than Sam's if the International Penalties are properly construed as fines. The analysis the Court is about to undertake is once again done in the alternative to its previous holding that the International Penalties are not fines to which the Eighth Amendment applies.

In assessing whether the International Penalties are grossly disproportional to the gravity of Dee's violation, the Court is guided by the Second Circuit's decision in von Hofe v. U.S. [1571] von Hofe is a forfeiture case, and it is one of the very few forfeiture cases that the Court found declaring the forfeiture of an individual's interest in a home to be an excessive fine under the Excessive Fines Clause. [1572] von Hofe involved a husband ("Harold") and a wife ("Kathleen") who each faced forfeiture of their one half interest in their marital home. [1573] Harold and Kathleen had both been convicted of drug offenses under Connecticut law as a part of a plea agreement. [1574] Harold was convicted of manufacturing and/or distributing a controlled substance and Kathleen was convicted of possession of a controlled substance.[1575] The government subsequently brought a civil in rem forfeiture action against the von Hofes, seeking forfeiture of their home.[1576]

This series of events came about because Harold had engaged in a relatively small-time marijuana cultivation operation in the couple's basement.[1577] Although a jury found that Kathleen was not an innocent owner who "did not know of the conduct giving rise to the forfeiture,"[1578] the district court found in a subsequent evidentiary hearing that she was not aware that anyone was selling marijuana in her home.[1579] The Second Circuit applied the Bajakajian factors, and held that "[b]ecause the extent of the forfeiture bears no correlation either with Mrs. von Hofe's minimal culpability or any harm she purportedly caused, the Excessive Fines Clause precludes forfeiture of her entire one-half interest in 32 Medley Lane."[1580] The Second Circuit noted that Kathleen's culpability was "best described as turning 622 a blind eye to her husband's marijuana cultivation in their basement."[1581] In describing Kathleen's situation, the Second Circuit was candid:[1582]

> Mrs. von Hofe's offensive conduct boils down to her joint ownership of 32 Medley Lane and silence in the face of her husband's decision to grow marijuana in their basement almost thirty years into their marriage. And yet she is being punished as if she were distributing drugs, when the district court concluded as a matter of fact that she had no knowledge of any distribution or remuneration. The government cannot justify forfeiture of Mrs. von Hofe's interest in 32 Medley Lane, for the punishment bears no reasonable correlation either to her minimal culpability or any harm she caused.

The Second Circuit reached the opposite conclusion regarding Harold, holding that "Mr. von Hofe's lengthy and extensive involvement in the manufacture and distribution of marijuana from his basement, the seriousness of his offenses and their relationship to his other criminal activity, allow us to easily conclude that forfeiture of his one-half interest in 32 Medley Lane is not an excessive fine."[1583]

The key takeaway that this Court draws from von Hofe is the need to apply the Bajakajian factors in view of each offender's particular involvement in the relevant offense. For example, in assessing the harm factor against Dee, it is the harm caused by Dee, not the harm caused by the reporting failure in the abstract that is relevant. With this in mind, the Court applies the Bajakajian factors to Dee.

The first Bajakajian factor—the essence of the violator's wrongdoing and its relation to other illegal activity[1584]—weighs in favor of a holding that the International Penalties are grossly disproportional to the gravity of Dee's offense. Dee's violation of §§ 6038 and 6048 are simple reporting violations, which were not made to conceal other illegal activity on her part. As found previously, Dee lacked anything but the most basic knowledge regarding the offshore system throughout the period for which the IRS seeks to recover International Penalties.[1585] Dee did not commit tax fraud, she was not willfully blind, and she is entitled to the innocent spouse defense regarding her income tax underpayments. Dee's level of culpability is low; her biggest "offense" was trusting her husband of fifty plus years, which "offense," if it is one, is minor.

The second Bajakajian factor—whether the violator fits into the class of persons for whom the statute was principally designed[1586]—also weighs in favor of a holding that the International Penalties are grossly disproportional to the gravity of Dee's offense. The International Penalties were designed in order to combat the problem of United States persons establishing foreign grantor trusts in tax haven jurisdictions and failing to report the income from these trusts as taxable to them.[1587] Although Dee and Charles 623 should have paid taxes and reported on the Charles and Dee International Penalty Trusts, Dee did not (i) cause those trusts to be established in tax haven jurisdictions, and (ii) make the decision to not (a) pay taxes on the trust income, or (b) file the required reporting forms. Dee relied entirely on Charles to handle all tax and business matters throughout their marriage.[1588] Dee has never prepared a tax return and never discussed tax matters with Charles.[1589] Dee testified that it was her practice to sign whatever tax return Charles gave her without reviewing it and without asking questions about it throughout their fifty plus year marriage.[1590] Unlike Kathleen in von Hofe, Dee did not "turn a blind eye" to Charles' and Sam's fraudulent activities.[1591] The record shows that Dee had no knowledge of, and was not engaged in, their fraudulent activities. For these reasons, Dee does not fit into the class of persons for whom the International Penalties were principally designed.

The third Bajakajian factor—the nature of the harm caused by the violator's conduct[1592]—also weighs in favor of a holding that the International Penalties are grossly disproportional to the gravity of Dee's offense. Dee's reporting violations did cause harm. It facilitated Charles' tax fraud. However, as did the Second Circuit in von Hofe, the Court here finds it significant that Dee was in no sense the engine that drove these reporting failures. As the Court discussed in its assessment of the first two Bajakajian factors, Dee had no knowledge of, and did not participate in, Charles' tax fraud. The harm that Dee herself caused was minimal.

The final Bajakajian factor—the maximum non-forfeiture sentence and fine that could have been imposed against Dee, does weigh against a holding that the International Penalties are grossly disproportional to the gravity of Dee's offense. As with Sam, the International Penalties are the relevant, non-forfeiture fines that can be imposed against Dee.

After assessing the Bajakajian factors as they apply to Dee, this Court concludes that the International Penalties —both under §§ 6038 and 6677—are excessive fines as to Dee. In spite of its general concerns about finding a percentage-based or flat fine (such as the International Penalties) excessive, the Court cannot ignore the extent to which the Bajakajian factors favor Dee. Of course, one last reminder, this conclusion that the International Penalties as applied to Dee are excessive fines under the Eighth Amendment is an alternative conclusion to an alternative conclusion. The Court's primary conclusions are that: (i) Dee is not liable for International Penalties because she established her reasonable cause defenses, and (ii) the International Penalties are not "fines" under the Excessive Fines Clause. The Court's conclusion that the International Penalties are excessive as to Dee is only reached if one or both of its other conclusions are held to be in error.

624 J. Do the Equitable Doctrines of Laches or Estoppel Apply Here, or Does the Court have Discretion Regarding the Assessment of Taxes or Penalties Against the Debtors?

1. Does Laches Apply Here?

[123] [124] The Debtors argue that those IRS claims that are not barred by a statute of limitations should be barred by laches. Laches is an equitable defense,[1593] and thus the Debtors have the burden of proving that it applies. The Court rejects the Debtors' argument that laches should bar the IRS' claims for three reasons: (i) many of the IRS' claims are subject to express statutes of limitation that then preclude the application of laches, (ii) there is strong precedent indicating that the doctrine of laches may not be asserted against the United States in order to prevent the collection of taxes and tax penalties, and (iii) even if the doctrine of laches is applicable here, the Debtors' failed in their proof to establish its required elements. Each reason is explained below.

While the Debtors state that the Fifth Circuit's decision in Sage v. U.S.[1594] supports their position that the doctrine of laches applies here, their reliance on this case is misplaced. Sage's holding was that the bringing of an action by the IRS to collect penalties under 26 U.S.C. § 6700 is not subject to any statute of limitations.[1595] In reaching this conclusion, the Sage court noted that the doctrine of laches could still, potentially, curb the IRS' penalty assessment power under § 6700.[1596] The idea that laches could apply to an IRS claim not subject to any express statute of limitations is of no moment here. That is because the IRS' claims for taxes here are subject to a specific statute of limitations—i.e., 26 U.S.C. § 6501.[1597] As relevant 625 here, this explicit statute of limitations is kept open by §§ 6501(c)(1) and/or (c)(8).[1598] As the Supreme Court noted in Petrella v. Metro–Goldwyn–Mayer, Inc.,[1599] there is no case where the Supreme Court "has approved the application of laches to bar a claim for damages brought within the time allowed by a federal statute of limitations." Thus, to the extent that a statute of limitation exists for the IRS' claims here, and the claims are brought within that limitations period, the application of the equitable doctrine of laches is not appropriate.

Even if all of the IRS' claims here were not subject to an express statute of limitation, Fifth Circuit precedent has also clearly established that the doctrine of laches may not be invoked by taxpayers in order to prevent the IRS from collecting taxes or penalties. In discussing whether a debtor in bankruptcy could invoke the doctrine of laches in order to prevent the IRS from collecting taxes and penalties, the Fifth Circuit stated in In re Fein :[1600]

> We need not reach the substantive issue of whether the circumstances of this case are appropriate for the invocation of laches, as laches "may not be asserted against the United States when it is acting in its sovereign capacity to enforce a public right or protect the public interest." See United States v. Popovich, 820 F.2d 134, 136 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 976, 108 S.Ct. 487, 98 L.Ed.2d 485 (1987). The timeliness of government claims is governed by the statute of limitations enacted by Congress. See United States v. Summerlin, 310 U.S. 414, 416, 60 S.Ct. 1019, 1020, 84 L.Ed. 1283 (1940); Chevron, U.S.A., Inc. v. United States, 705 F.2d 1487, 1491 (9th Cir.1983). Fein admits that the government timely asserted the federal tax liabilities.

The Fifth Circuit has relied upon this well-known rule in multiple situations where the United States sought to collect outstanding tax deficiencies.[1601] The Fifth Circuit's conclusions in those cases are based on the Supreme Court's observations 626 in U.S. v. Summerlin[1602] that "[i]t is well settled that the United States is not bound by state statutes of limitation or subject to the defense of laches in enforcing its rights."

It is beyond dispute that the United States is enforcing its own rights when it seeks to collect taxes and penalties, as it is doing here. As the Seventh Circuit noted in U.S. v. Administrative Enterprises, Inc.,[1603] "[t]here is no better illustration of the enforcement of a sovereign right than the use of compulsory process to determine liability for unpaid taxes." In addition, the Fifth Circuit affirmed, albeit in an unpublished opinion, a tax court decision that held that the doctrine of laches did not prevent the IRS from assessing taxes or penalties where "section 6501(c)(1), which we have determined to be applicable, expressly authorizes respondent to assess deficiencies against petitioner 'at any time.' "[1604]

Since the doctrine of laches may not be used in order to bar the United States from collecting taxes, the Debtors' defense of laches cannot succeed.

Alternatively, even if the doctrine of laches was applicable here, the Debtors have failed in their proof. Under Fifth Circuit precedent, "[t]o establish that a cause of action is barred by laches, the defendant must show (1) a delay in asserting the right or claim; (2) that the delay was not excusable; and (3) that there was undue prejudice to the defendant."[1605] The Debtors state the allegations that underlay their laches defense in their pre-trial briefing:

> The [IRS] claims are extremely late; they were filed a dozen years after attorney Charles Lubar met on behalf of the Wylys with senior IRS officials in Washington in August 2003, in which meeting the IRS advised that it was going to appoint a "champion" to address and resolve all offshore-related issues not only with the IOM trusts related to the Wylys but also any other similarly situated taxpayers' trusts, and after the Wylys had first included Form 8275 in their annual tax returns. The claims come eleven years after the IRS commenced audits of Charles and Sam's 2000 returns in early 2004, and nine years after a Senate investigation made public the same facts on which the IRS relies; and four years after a key witness, Charles Wyly, died. The delay is not excusable and it has prejudiced the Debtors, subjecting the IRS Proofs of Claim, not to limitations, but to the defense of equitable laches; and the Debtors so assert.[1606]

Putting aside for the moment the fact that the Debtors lump together all of the tax years for which the IRS has filed a Proof of Claim as if the delay alleged was equal for all of the years at issue (which it is not), the Debtors have presented no evidence that an eleven-year period between the commencement of an audit and the filing of a proof of claim constitutes an 627 inexcusable "delay" under the unique facts of these Cases. As the Court has noted many times, these are fraud cases of incredible complexity. A cursory examination of civil tax fraud cases show that multi-year delays between the commencement of an IRS investigation and a tax court decision are not uncommon, even in run-of-the-mill cases.[1607] That these Cases—which all parties acknowledge are unusually complex—should take longer than "normal" to proceed from audit to decision is not remarkable.

This same complexity makes the IRS' delay—if in fact it has delayed—excusable. The Cases involve dozens of offshore entities that engaged in a myriad of complicated financial transactions that were designed—by the Wylys and their sophisticated advisors—to be difficult to unravel.[1608] That the IRS took time to investigate the Wylys' offshore system and the transactions undertaken offshore was—far from being an inexcusable mistake—probably the most prudent course. Moreover, that the IRS would await the outcome of the SEC Action in the SDNY Court is also not terribly surprising, as the same offshore trusts and corporations were at issue there too, at least in large part.

Finally, the Debtors have failed to show that the IRS' supposedly inexcusable delay has unduly prejudiced them. Although the Debtors allege that Charles was a key witness, they fail to point to any additional facts or insights that Charles would have provided here that Sam or Evan was not capable of providing. The evidence presented at trial shows that Sam and Charles largely moved in lockstep with respect to their respective offshore systems and the transactions undertaken through them. In fact, from the mountain of evidence presented at trial, it appears to this Court that Sam was the instigator of moving Wyly wealth offshore and that Charles simply followed in his brother's footsteps. In short, the Debtors' failed to offer any evidence to support their argument that Charles' passing has unduly prejudiced them. If anything, Charles' passing may have strengthened Dee's other defenses, as there is no witness available to question her testimony about what Charles and she discussed throughout their marriage.

For all of these reasons, the Debtors' defense of laches fails.

2. Does Estoppel Apply Here?

[125] [126] [127] The Debtors also assert that estoppel should bar the IRS' claim(s) again them. Estoppel is an equitable doctrine, and it may be invoked in order to avoid injustice in a particular case.[1609] According to the Fifth Circuit, a party seeking to establish estoppel against the United States must prove five things:

> (1) affirmative misconduct by the government, (2) that the government was aware of the relevant facts and (3) intended its act or omission to be acted upon, (4) that the party seeking estoppel had no knowledge of the relevant facts and (5) reasonably relied on the government's conduct and as a result of his reliance, suffered substantial injury.[1610]

628 The first element, affirmative misconduct, is unique to instances where the party against whom estoppel is sought is the government. The Fifth Circuit has noted that "[c]ourts have been exceedingly reluctant to grant equitable estoppel against the government."[1611] In fact, it appears to be an open question in the Fifth Circuit whether equitable estoppel may ever be applied against the government.[1612] What is known is that "the rarity of this remedy means that the burden that a petitioner must meet is very high."[1613]

There are strong policy reasons underlying courts' reluctance to apply equitable estoppel against the government. As the Supreme Court has pointed out:

> When the Government is unable to enforce the law because the conduct of its agents has given rise to an estoppel, the interest of the citizenry as a whole in obedience to the rule of law is undermined. It is for this reason that it is well settled that the Government may not be estopped on the same terms as any other litigant.[1614]

In terms of when it might be appropriate to apply equitable estoppel against the government, the Fifth Circuit and the Supreme Court agree that "estoppel might be appropriate when the public interest in ensuring that the Government can enforce the law free from estoppel is outweighed by the countervailing interest of citizens in some minimum standard of decency, honor, and reliability in their dealings with their Government."[1615] And, although certain 629 courts have applied estoppel in order to restrain the IRS from collecting tax penalties, the Debtors' situations do not present the sort of extreme case where the application of estoppel against the government is appropriate.

[128] Here, the Debtors have failed in their proof. Specifically, the Debtors have not proven the first element of their estoppel defense against the government—i.e., that the IRS engaged in any affirmative misconduct. The Debtors allege that estoppel should apply here for largely the same reasons that they believe that laches should apply—because of "the IRS's failure to act during its interminable auditing process."[1616] However, the Fifth Circuit has held that "affirmative misconduct is something more than merely negligent conduct."[1617] Indeed, the Fifth Circuit has clearly stated that "to state a cause of action for estoppel against the government, a private party must allege more than mere negligence, delay, inaction, or failure to follow an internal agency guideline"[1618] and that "[a]ffirmative misconduct requires an affirmative misrepresentation or affirmative concealment of a material fact by the government."[1619] Since the IRS' alleged failure to act here is simply its delay in acting and not an affirmative misrepresentation or affirmative concealment, it cannot qualify as affirmative misconduct.

The only conduct that the Debtors' arguably point to that could potentially qualify as an affirmative misrepresentation or affirmative concealment by the IRS is that allegedly "the IRS advised that it was going to appoint a 'champion' to address and resolve all offshore-related issues not only with the IOM trusts related to the Wylys but also any other similarly situated taxpayers' trusts."[1620] However, the evidence does not establish that the IRS ever definitively advised the Wylys that it was going to appoint such a champion. Notes taken by a Wyly lawyer during the anonymous meeting where the IRS supposedly 630 made the representation that it would appoint an issue champion also indicate that the IRS' lawyers who were present at the meeting made it clear that they had no authority to settle the taxpayers' claims, especially on an anonymous basis, and that they would have to defer to their client—the IRS.[1621] Even taking a single line of these notes out of the context of multiple other portions of the notes where the IRS' lawyers indicated their lack of authority to settle, this alleged statement hardly amounts to an affirmative misrepresentation or affirmative concealment.[1622] The Debtors have not offered any evidence that IRS personnel or lawyers were lying or concealing facts when they allegedly stated that they were going to appoint an issue champion. It is just as plausible—if not more plausible—to infer that the idea of appointing an issue champion to resolve the offshore tax issues of the Wylys and other similarly situated taxpayers simply never panned out, as it is to infer that the IRS was making an affirmative misrepresentation or affirmatively concealing facts when its lawyer allegedly stated that an issue champion would be appointed.

Furthermore, a rebuttal witness called by the IRS who attended the anonymous meeting in August 2003, Danielle Grimm ("Grimm"), specifically denied that it was ever represented at that meeting that an issue champion would be appointed.[1623] Given that the Wyly lawyer who took the notes did not testify at trial and that Grimm did, the Court doubts that there was ever anything approaching an explicit promise to appoint an issue champion made by anyone who attended the meeting on behalf of the IRS. Even if there was, neither such an explicit promise nor the mere fact of the IRS' delay amount to the kind of affirmative misconduct necessary to satisfy the first element necessary to estop the government.

Moreover, it is also important to remember that cases on equitable estoppel against the government generally state that the government can only be bound by the acts or statements of its agents that are within the scope of those agents' authority.[1624] In other words—as the Fifth 631 Circuit has explained—"courts have insisted that any estoppel against the government result from a representation of an official acting within the scope of her official authority, thus implying that the concept of apparent authority does not apply in the case of a government estoppel."[1625] Indeed, the Fifth Circuit has specifically noted that "the government cannot be bound by unauthorized or incorrect statements of its agents."[1626] Thus, even if the IRS lawyers who attended the August 2003 meeting did in fact unequivocally state that an issue champion would be appointed to resolve the Wylys' tax issues, the IRS could not be estopped by such a statement if that promise was not within the scope of those IRS lawyers' authority. As Grimm testified, and as the notes from the meeting indicate, no one present at the meeting had the authority to appoint an issue champion.[1627] Thus, even if someone at the meeting had explicitly asserted that the IRS was going to appoint an issue champion, the lack of authority of anyone at the meeting to take that step would prevent the application of estoppel against the IRS here.[1628]

632 While it is clear that the Debtors have failed to prove that the IRS engaged in the kind of affirmative misconduct that is necessary to estop it here, Debtors have also failed to prove other of the more traditional elements of estoppel. For example, the Debtors have not proven the third element of estoppel—i.e., that the government intended its act or omission to be acted upon—or the fifth element of estoppel—i.e., that the Debtors reasonably relied on the government's conduct and, as a result of their reliance, suffered substantial injury. The Debtors' attempt to compare the IRS' silence after the August 2003 meeting and the commencement of the audit of Sam's and Charles' 2000 tax returns in February 2004 to the facts of Fredericks v. C.I.R.[1629] is unavailing, as explained below.

In Fredericks, the taxpayer ("Fredericks") filed a form consenting to an unlimited extension of the statute of limitations for the assessment of taxes.[1630] Fredericks was then told by the IRS that this unlimited extension form was never received, and subsequently submitted (at the IRS' request) numerous forms consenting to a series of 1–year extensions of the statute of limitations.[1631] Sometime before the Fredericks' final 1–year extension expired, the IRS discovered that it actually did have the unlimited extension form, but did not inform Fredericks of this fact.[1632] The IRS allowed the final 1–year form to expire, and then proceeded to rely on the unlimited extension form (which as far as the Fredericks knew the IRS had never received) to investigate Fredericks for another 8 years and eventually assess tax deficiencies, interest, and penalties.[1633] It is important to note that the unlimited extension form could have been revoked by Fredericks, had Fredericks in fact known that the IRS had received an unlimited extension form from him.[1634]

Moreover, in Fredericks, the IRS used silence for the specific purpose of creating a misapprehension of the facts in the mind of the taxpayer.[1635] As just noted, had Fredricks known that the IRS had received the unlimited extension form, he could have revoked that form at any time and prevented the IRS from continuing its investigation.[1636] In order to prevent this 633 from happening, the IRS lied by omission to Fredericks so that it could continue its investigation.

Here, however, there is simply no evidence that the IRS intended to cause the Wylys to take any action one way or the other as a result of its lawyers' alleged representations at the August 2003 meeting or due to the time it took to conduct its audit of Sam's and Charles' tax returns. In the first place, there is no evidence that the IRS knew at the time of the August 2003 meeting with Lubar that it was speaking with a Wyly representative.[1637] It is difficult to imagine how the IRS could attempt to induce the Wylys to refrain from taking action without knowing that the Wylys were even involved. Furthermore, Grimm testified that no one at the IRS has ever told a taxpayer's representative to continue on as they were until an issue champion was appointed.[1638] It is equally implausible to infer that the IRS intended—through auditing the Wylys for an extended period—to induce the Wylys to continue in their use of the offshore system and thereby cause interest and penalty amounts to increase due to the passage of time. Had the Wylys chosen to unwind the offshore system in the face of an IRS audit and repatriate the offshore assets, as French did even without an IRS audit, the IRS—far from being disappointed that its supposed scheme to inflate interest and penalty amounts had been thwarted—doubtless would have been thrilled that the offshore assets were now in the United States and subject to its claims. Thus, there is no credible evidence that the third element of estoppel—that the government intended its act or omission to be acted upon—is satisfied here.

Similarly, there is no evidence that the fifth element of estoppel—that the Debtors reasonably relied on the government's conduct and as a result of their reliance, suffered substantial injury—is satisfied here. This is because there is no evidence that the Wylys' actions were influenced in any way by the IRS' conduct at the August 2003 meeting or over the course of the audit. The basic structure of the offshore system has not changed since its inception. The idea that Sam and Charles—who are/were incredibly sophisticated businessmen and who have/had the advantage of incredibly sophisticated counsel—could reasonably rely on the fact that the IRS indicated it might appoint an issue champion and that the IRS had begun auditing the offshore system to continue on their present course without change defies common sense. If anything, these facts—which so clearly indicated that the IRS thought there was something amiss with the offshore system—should have caused Sam and Charles to consider unravelling the offshore system or at least start reporting based upon the potential that the reporting was required. Had Sam and Charles taken this step, much of the sting of the IRS' so-called delay would be removed, as almost ten years' worth of taxes, fraud penalties, and International Penalties would not be in dispute today. As the Supreme Court has pointed out: "the party claiming the estoppel must have relied on its adversary's conduct in such a manner as to change his position for the worse [,] and 634 that reliance must have been reasonable in that the party claiming the estoppel did not know nor should it have known that its adversary's conduct was misleading."[1639] The Debtors have not changed their position in any way in reliance on the IRS, and the blame for any increase in interest and penalty amounts due to the passage of time is most properly placed on Sam and Charles, rather than the IRS.[1640]

The Debtors have also not proven the second and fourth elements of estoppel. The second element of estoppel is that the government was aware of the relevant facts and the fourth element of estoppel is that that the party seeking estoppel had no knowledge of the relevant facts.[1641] When the Fredericks court found that equitable estoppel could be applied against the IRS, it noted that "[t]he IRS was the only party with knowledge of all the facts in this case."[1642] Here, the situation is almost entirely reversed. At the August 2003 meeting, the Wylys did not even reveal their identities, let alone all of the relevant facts surrounding their offshore system.[1643] The details surrounding the offshore system were only revealed to the IRS over the course of the audit process and litigation in this Court, and were at all times known to the Wylys. The information imbalance present in these Cases—far from presenting a case for estoppel—explains why the IRS' audit process took so long, as there were many facts about the offshore system that were known to the Wylys but unknown to the IRS, and it took a long time for all of these facts to come to light. Thus, the second and fourth elements of estoppel against the government are not satisfied.

Because the Debtors have not satisfied any of the elements necessary for the Court to invoke the rare remedy of estopping the government, the Court rejects the Debtors' estoppel defense.

3. Does the Court have Discretion to Alter the Penalty Amounts?

[129] Although the Joint Pre–Trial Order filed by the parties indicates that one of the issues to be resolved is "[w]hether the Bankruptcy Court has discretion regarding the assessment or amounts of any penalty sought by the IRS," this issue does not appear to be discussed in any of the Debtors' briefing or in their proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law.[1644] Happily, this issue is easily resolved; finally, an easy one. The Fifth Circuit has specifically held in a tax context that "equity will not bar the imposition of a statutory penalty"[1645] and more generally that "there is no inherent power for the judiciary to mitigate congressionally-mandated penalties."[1646] As the Supreme Court observed long ago, to hold otherwise would be to violate one of the most basic elements of the principle of Separation of Powers—i.e., that the judiciary must interpret 635 the laws as Congress has written them.[1647]

For these reasons, the Court has no discretion to modify the penalties Congress imposed by statute on the Wylys in these Cases.

K. Suspension of Interest Under 26 U.S.C. § 6404(g)

The Debtors also argue that they are entitled to mandatory interest suspension for tax years 1998 through 2010[1648] in accordance with 26 U.S.C. § 6404(g), which provides as follows:

> (g) Suspension of interest and certain penalties where Secretary fails to contact taxpayer.—

(1) Suspension.—

> (A) In general.—In the case of an individual who files a return of tax imposed by subtitle A for a taxable year on or before the due date for the return (including extensions), if the Secretary does not provide a notice to the taxpayer specifically stating the taxpayer's liability and the basis for the liability before the close of the 36–month period [1649] beginning on the later of—
> > (i) the date on which the return is filed; or
> >
> > (ii) the due date of the return without regard to extensions,
> > the Secretary shall suspend the imposition of any interest, penalty, addition to tax, or additional amount with respect to any failure relating to the return which is computed by reference to the period of time the failure continues to exist and which is properly allocable to the suspension period.
> (B) Separate application.—This paragraph shall be applied separately with respect to each item or adjustment.
> If, after the return for a taxable year is filed, the taxpayer provides to the Secretary 1 or more signed written documents showing that the taxpayer owes an additional amount of tax for the taxable year, clause (i) shall be applied by substituting the date the last of the documents was provided for the date on which the return is filed.

According to the Debtors: (i) both Sam and Dee timely filed their 1998 through 2010 tax returns, as stipulated by the parties, [1650] and (ii) prior to the IRS filing its Proofs of Claim, the Debtors were never provided with the notice referenced in § 6404(g)(1)(A); thus, they are entitled to mandatory suspension of interest for the relevant years.

636 The IRS disagrees, arguing that mandatory interest suspension under § 6404(g) does not apply (i) because the "return of tax" referenced in § 6404(g)(1)(A) is a Form 5471 [1651] that was never filed (so that interest suspension was never triggered), (ii) to any gross misstatement of income, [1652] and/or (iii) to cases involving fraud. [1653] The IRS further argues that, in any event, this Court lacks jurisdiction to consider interest suspension under § 6404(g) based upon the mandates of 26 U.S.C. § 6404(h), as interpreted by the Supreme Court in Hinck v. U.S. [1654] and the tax court in Corbalis v. C.I.R. [1655] Because the latter two arguments are dispositive of this issue, the Court will address the IRS' arguments in reverse order.

1. This Court has Jurisdiction to Determine the Amount of Interest Payable by the Debtors, Including Whether the Debtors Are Entitled to Mandatory Interest Suspension under 26 U.S.C. § 6404(g)

[130] Before turning to the IRS' argument that this Court lacks jurisdiction, it is helpful to understand the process involved when a taxpayer believes he is entitled to interest suspension under 26 U.S.C. § 6404(g). As explained in Revenue Procedure 2005–38: [1656]

> taxpayers may notify the Service that interest was assessed in violation of section 6404(g) by submitting Form 843, "Claim for Refund and Request for Abatement." Taxpayers should write "Section 6404(g) Notification" at the top of the Form 843. The Service will review the Form 843 notification, decide whether to abate interest under section 6404(a), and notify the taxpayer of its decision. Because section 6404(g) is an interest suspension provision, rather than an interest abatement provision, and because section 6404(b) generally bars claims for abatement with respect to income tax, the notification to the taxpayer of the Service's abatement determination does not constitute a final determination letter from which the taxpayer can petition the Tax Court under section 6404(h). [1657]
> If the Service does not exercise its authority under section 6404(a) to abate interest alleged to have been assessed in violation of section 6404(g), the taxpayer may pay the disputed interest assessment, file an administrative claim for refund and, if that claim is denied or not acted upon within six months from the date of filing, bring suit for refund under section 7422 and 28 U.S.C. § 1346(a)(1).

Returning to the statute, 26 U.S.C. § 6404(h) provides that:

> [t]he Tax Court shall have jurisdiction over any action brought > by a taxpayer who meets the requirements referred to 637 in section 7430(c)(4)(A)(ii) [providing net worth limitations] to determine whether the Secretary's failure to abate interest under this section was an abuse of discretion, and may order an abatement, if such action is brought within 180 days after the date of the mailing of the Secretary's final determination not to abate such interest.

The Supreme Court interpreted 26 U.S.C. § 6404(h) in the case of Hinck v. U.S.,[1658] where it held that the tax court has exclusive jurisdiction to review the IRS' refusal to abate interest under 26 U.S.C. § 6404(e)(1):

> [Section 6404(h)] is a precisely drawn, detailed statute that, in a single sentence, provides a forum for adjudication, a limited class of potential plaintiffs, a statute of limitations, a standard of review, and authorization for judicial relief. And Congress enacted this provision against a backdrop of decisions uniformly rejecting the possibility of any review for taxpayers wishing to challenge the Secretary's § 6404(e)(1)[1659] determination. Therefore, despite Congress's failure explicitly to define the Tax Court's jurisdiction as exclusive, we think it quite plain that the terms of § 6404(h)—a precisely drawn, detailed statute filling a perceived hole in the law—control all requests for review of § 6404(e)(1) determinations. Those terms include the forum for adjudication.

In Corbalis v. C.I.R.,[1660] the tax court was faced with the issue of whether § 6404(h) applied equally to § 6404(e), as addressed in Hinck, and § 6404(g). The tax court held that § 6404(h) applies equally to both subsections, finding that: (i) because § 6404 is titled "Abatements," a claim for suspension of interest under § 6404(g) was the logical equivalent of a claim for abatement under § 6404(e), and (ii) there was no reason for nondiscretionary acts under § 6404(g) ("the Secretary shall suspend") to be less susceptible to judicial review than discretionary acts under § 6404(e)(1) ("the Secretary may abate").

According to the IRS, the reasoning in Hinck and Corbalis applies equally here, leaving the tax court with exclusive jurisdiction to consider the Debtors' claims for interest abatement under § 6404(g). As explained below, this Court disagrees.

Notably, both Hinck and Corbalis are procedurally distinct from the Cases. There, the taxpayers requested abatement or suspension, and the IRS issued a final 638 determination as required by the statute. It was the request/refusal process that implicated § 6404(h) and judicial review by the tax court to determine whether the IRS abused its discretion. Here, there is nothing in the record showing that (i) the Debtors filed a Form 843, or (ii) that the IRS mailed a "final determination" refusing to suspend interest. Thus, this Court has not been placed into a position where it must review the IRS' decision for an abuse of discretion. Simply put, the statutory prerequisites to § 6404(h) have not been met, and the statute does not apply to the facts of the Cases.[1661]

Instead, from this Court's perspective, the relevant statute is 11 U.S.C. § 505(a), which states in relevant part:

> (a)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection, the court may determine the amount or legality of any tax, any fine or penalty relating to a tax, or any addition to tax, whether or not previously assessed, whether or not paid, and whether or not contested before and adjudicated by a judicial or administrative tribunal of competent jurisdiction.
> (2) The court may not so determine—
>> (A) the amount or legality of a tax, fine, penalty, or addition to tax if such amount or legality was contested before and adjudicated by a judicial or administrative tribunal of competent jurisdiction before the commencement of the case under this title[.]

As explained by the Fifth Circuit in In re Luongo,[1662] § 505(a) is a "broad grant of jurisdiction" and "absent the express statutory limitations in § 505(a)(2)(A) and (B), bankruptcy courts have universally recognized their jurisdiction to consider tax issues brought by the debtor, limited only by their discretion to abstain." Thus, based upon the facts of the Cases and the jurisdiction conferred under 11 U.S.C. § 505(a), this Court concludes that it has jurisdiction to determine the proper amount of interest payable by the Debtors, including whether the Debtors are entitled to mandatory interest suspension under 26 U.S.C. § 6404(g).

2. Mandatory Suspension of Interest Does Not Apply in Any Case Involving Fraud, Precluding Suspension for Sam in the Relevant Years

[131] As set forth in 26 U.S.C. § 6404(g)(2)(B), interest suspension shall not apply to "any interest, penalty, addition to tax, or additional amount in a case involving fraud." As explained by the Code of Federal Regulations,[1663] suspension:

> does not apply to any interest, penalty, addition to tax, or additional amount for a year involving a false or fraudulent return. If a taxpayer files a fraudulent return for a particular year, paragraph (a) [suspension] of this section may apply to any other tax year of the taxpayer that does not involve fraud. Fraud affecting a particular item on a return precludes paragraph (a) of this section 639 from applying to any other items on that return.

Although few courts have addressed the meaning of "fraud" in relation to § 6404(g), those addressing it have interpreted the term consistent with its use in other portions of the statute:[1664]

> The dispute underlying this motion is whether Sala's return is a "case involving fraud" under § 6404(g). While no court has addressed fraud under this statute, it is well established that the Government must prove fraud in other parts of the tax code by clear and convincing evidence. Upshaw's Estate v. C.I.R., 416 F.2d 737, 741 (7th Cir.1969); Hebrank v. C.I.R., 81 T.C. 640, 642, 1983 WL 14880 (1983); Petzoldt v. C.I.R., 92 T.C. 661, 699, 1989 WL 27845 (1989). I conclude that the Government's burden of proof under 6404(g) is also clear and convincing evidence.

Thus, to the extent that this Court has found fraud in existence for any given tax year, interest suspension under § 6404(g) is not available for any item on the return.

With respect to Sam, the Court has found fraud in each of tax years 1998 through 2010, the years for which Sam claims to be entitled to interest suspension under § 6404(g).[1665] Thus, the Court concludes that Sam is not entitled to the suspension of interest under 26 U.S.C. § 6404(g) for any of these tax years.

3. Interest Suspension is Moot as to Dee Because She Did Not Commit Tax Fraud and She is Entitled to Innocent Spouse Relief from the Income Tax Underpayments to Which § 6404(g) Interest Suspension Would Apply

[132] Section 6404(g) states that "[i]n the case of an individual who files a return of tax imposed by subtitle A [titled "Income Tax"] ... the Secretary shall suspend the imposition of any interest, penalty, addition to tax, or additional amount with respect to any failure relating to the return which is computed by reference to the [relevant time period]." On its face, § 6404(g) applies only to income tax-related interest, penalties, additions to tax, or additional amounts. And, as previously found, Dee did not commit fraud[1666] and, because of the success of her innocent spouse defense, Dee is not liable for subtitle A income tax underpayments alleged by the IRS in its Proof of Claim in any year when interest suspension would apply. Thus, interest suspension is moot as to her.

V. CONCLUSION

Although there were numerous other issues to be addressed (as is obvious from our over 400–page opinion), the heart of the Motions largely boiled down to the Court answering two questions. First, did Sam and Charles commit tax fraud?[1667] 640 Second, if they did, what role, if any, did Dee have in that fraud?

And, as noted at the outset of this opinion, the parties' respective views on how these questions should be answered varied widely. The Court acknowledged at the outset of this opinion that its responsibility was to thoughtfully evaluate the evidence and the parties' legal arguments in order to come to its own determination of what happened.

After (i) three weeks of trial, (ii) days spent reading designated portions of deposition testimony or trial testimony from the SEC Action of eleven (11) witnesses who did not offer live testimony here,[1668] (iii) two days of closing arguments, (iv) careful analysis of the parties' pre and post-trial briefs, along with its own legal research, and (v) literally countless hours spent pouring over those one hundred (100) formal written legal opinions, legal memoranda, trust agreements and related formation documents (along with amendments to those documents), annuity agreements and amendments to annuity agreements, internal communications, letters of wishes, communications from trust protectors to trustees, SEC filings, tax returns, formation documents of offshore and domestic entities, real estate documents, and hundreds of other exhibits admitted into evidence at trial, the Court is convinced—by clear and convincing evidence —that Sam and Charles committed tax fraud. That the tax scheme implemented here was "papered" in such a way as to attempt to shield the Wylys from this outcome is equally clear. But the substance of those documents, if carefully examined, reveals the truth.

The Wylys' version of the truth is simply too glib. We received all this tax advice from a myriad of capable professionals, so we cannot have committed tax fraud. Now, we didn't read any of the advice ourselves, or hear most of the advice directly, but what we were told about the advice by French, Robertson, Boucher, and Hennington was enough to make our hearts pure.

But, to accept the Wylys' explanation requires the Court to be satisfied that it is appropriate for extraordinarily wealthy individuals to hire middlemen to do their bidding in order to insulate themselves from wrong-doing so that, when the fraud is ultimately exposed, they have plausible deniability. To put a finer point on it—here is the Court's version of what happened, which it has come to after much thought and analysis.

Sam likes what Tedder has to sell in 1991—a scheme to put hundreds of millions of dollars of wealth offshore in exchange for unsecured private annuities that will only be taxed—at ordinary income rates—when Sam actually receives annuity payments years in the future. So Sam tells his chief outside lawyer, French, who is not a tax lawyer (French is a securities lawyer), to make it happen from a legal perspective, while telling the chief financial officer of the Wyly family office, Robertson, to make it happen from an administrative perspective.

So, it happens—Sam settles the Bulldog IOM Trust with $100 in early 1992 and then enters into six extremely complicated private annuity transactions in February 1992 involving six newly created domestic corporations and six newly created IOM corporations, all of which are owned, directly or indirectly, by Bulldog IOM Trust. Why so many entities to do the private annuity transactions in 1992? Simple—the options Sam assigned to the Nevada corporations 641 are for the stock of public companies on whose boards Sam sat. Sam wanted to keep each corporation under the SEC reporting threshold so that the extent of his offshore system did not become public for fear of jeopardizing the anticipated tax benefits from the offshore system.

No tax is paid when these annuity transactions are undertaken. Why? Because Sam received—although he never read—written legal opinions from the lawyer who promoted the scheme to him that there would be no tax consequences to him at the time of implementation. However, a key predicate for that legal advice was that the Bulldog IOM Trust had to be a valid foreign non-grantor trust. And, while that's certainly what the trust formation documents say, surprisingly, in the one hundred formal written legal opinions Sam received over the years concerning the offshore system (including for the 1992 annuity transactions), he never received a written legal opinion stating that the Bulldog IOM Trust was a valid foreign non-grantor trust—from the promoter or anyone else—until 2003, when he got conflicting advice from two different tax professionals Hennington hired on his behalf—Lubar (in mid–2003) and Pulman (in late October 2003), both pieces of advice relayed to him by Hennington, about the characterization of the Bulldog IOM Trust as a grantor or non-grantor trust—Lubar opining that it was a foreign grantor trust as to Sam and Pulman opining that Sam had a "reportable position" that it was not. Of course, simple math tells us that this advice was received over twenty-one years after the Bulldog IOM Trust was established and began conducting business offshore tax-free. But we get ahead of ourselves in the Court's version of what happened here.

Returning to the 1990s, Sam's trusted securities lawyer, French, has lingering concerns about the tax consequences flowing from the 1992 annuity transactions, so French goes to London in 1993 to meet with an extremely well-credentialed international tax lawyer, Lubar, to get a second opinion concerning the status of the Bulldog IOM Trust as a foreign non-grantor trust and the tax consequences flowing from Sam's 1992 private annuity transactions. French learns that Lubar has concluded that there is a "significant risk" that the Bulldog IOM Trust (and two other similar trusts established in late 1992) will be characterized as foreign grantor trusts to Sam, which dramatically changes the tax consequences flowing from Sam's 1992 private annuity transactions and any other business transaction undertaken through the Bulldog IOM Trust along with Sam's reporting obligations.

Although Sam never directly testified he did not know about the fact that French got this advice from Lubar in 1993, we are asked to conclude that Sam did not know about this advice because the IRS failed to prove that Sam knew about it. In fact, Sam wants us to believe that he did not even know that French went to see Lubar to get a second opinion (again because the IRS failed to prove that he did), although the Court reasonably infers from the trial record that Lubar did not work for free, but instead billed the Wylys for his advice and that the Wyly family office paid those bills.

Given Lubar's conclusions about the offshore structure used in 1992, French asks Lubar about an alternate structure that might work better and Lubar advises that a foreign grantor trust settled by an individual who is a nonresident alien of the United States could be a better device through which to accomplish the Wylys' goals. In February 1994, Lubar issues a 642 memorandum to French that states his specific advice about such a foreign grantor trust.[1669] However, of critical importance to Lubar's advice were three facts he was told to assume were true by French: (i) the grantor of the trust has known the Wylys "for a considerable period of time," (ii) the trust is being established as "an entirely gratuitous act," and (iii) the grantor has not received and will not receive any "consideration, reimbursement or other benefit" for settling the trust, "directly or indirectly."[1670] Those three factual assumptions are expressly and unequivocally stated in the written memorandum containing Lubar's advice to French, who was acting as the Wylys' agent.

French apparently told Sam about at least part of this advice from Lubar, because an individual residing in the IOM who Sam barely knew, King, settled a trust in February 1994 naming Sam and his family members as beneficiaries.[1671] That trust was the Bessie IOM Trust. Of course, Sam wants to rely on Lubar's advice (as contained in his February 1994 memorandum to French) for the tax consequences flowing from transactions undertaken by Sam through the Bessie IOM Trust—i.e., no tax (or other reporting) is due because King is not subject to tax or reporting in the United States, but Sam denies knowing the predicate facts upon which that favorable advice depended—i.e., that King had known Sam for a considerable period of time, that King established the Bessie IOM Trust as an entirely gratuitous act, and that King would not receive any benefit for settling the trust, which were untrue. And, although the Deed of Settlement for the Bessie IOM Trust states that King settled the trust with $25,000, that too was a lie, which Sam again denies knowing. Once the Bessie IOM Trust was settled, however, Sam starts transacting business through it offshore by undertaking two more complicated private annuity transactions in 1996[1672] and a myriad of extremely complicated real estate transactions involving, among other things, homes, an art gallery, and an office for himself and other family members in Texas and Colorado in the late 1990s and early 2000s[1673]—all tax and reporting free.

Then, in 1995, another purported foreign grantor trust—La Fourche IOM Trust—is settled,[1674] again naming Sam and his family as beneficiaries—this time by Cairns, an IOM resident who did not know Sam at all[1675] and who signed a letter prepared by French[1676] that falsely states:[1677]

> I wanted to take this opportunity to let you know what a pleasure it has been knowing you over the past years and 643 dealing with you on > both business and social matters. I appreciate your many courtesies. As you know, I have established a trust with Wychwood Trust Limited, called The La Fourche Trust, for the benefit of you and your family, and have provided this trust with the sum of $25,000.00. This is to show my gratitude for your loyalty to our mutual ventures and your personal support and friendship. I hope that, wisely managed, this trust fund can grow for many years and inure to the benefit of many generations of your family.

All of this is a lie, except that the La Fourche IOM Trust was established with Wychwood Trust Limited. [1678] When asked why he would sign a letter full of lies, he glibly responded that he was a friend of Ronnie Buchanan. [1679] So, who was Ronnie Buchanan and why would he ask Cairns to sign a false letter? Buchanan was the primary Wyly contact at Lome House Trust, who served as trustee for Bessie IOM Trust as well as other Wyly IOM trusts. [1680]

The Court has no idea why Buchanan would ask a friend of his to lie for the Wylys, wealthy Americans Cairns had never laid eyes on, although it is likely explained by the fact that Buchanan continued to serve as a trustee of the Bessie IOM Trust through 1998, [1681] earning fees for those trust management services. Similarly, the Court has no idea why Cairns would sign a letter full of lies addressed to someone he didn't even know—Sam—although it is likely explained by the fact that shortly after signing it, Cairns' trust management company was hired to serve as trustee for some of the Wylys' IOM trusts, including La Fourche IOM Trust. [1682]

Although the Deed of Settlement for the La Fourche IOM Trust states that Cairns settled the trust with $25,000, that too was a lie. And, once the La Fourche IOM Trust was purportedly "settled," Sam starts transacting business through it offshore including undertaking another complicated private annuity transaction in 1996.

Once again, Sam wants to rely on Lubar's advice as contained in the February 15, 1994 memorandum addressed to French for the tax consequences flowing from transactions undertaken by him through the La Fourche IOM Trust—i.e., no tax (or other reporting) is due because Cairns is not subject to tax or reporting in the United States, but Sam denies knowing the predicate factual assumptions upon which that favorable advice depended—i.e., that Cairns had known Sam for a considerable period of time, that Cairns established the La Fourche IOM Trust as an entirely gratuitous act, and that Cairns would not benefit from his settling of the trust, all of which were untrue.

644 Although fourteen more offshore entities wholly owned by Bessie IOM Trust were established at Sam's direction in the IOM or the Cayman Islands in the late 1990s and early 2000s, by 1996 the heart of the Wyly offshore system had been established through deceptive and fraudulent actions. While Sam wants us to believe that he had no idea of these fraudulent and deceptive acts, his silence is deafening, as he never denied knowledge of the "bad acts." Moreover, even assuming Sam did not know about all of the "bad acts" undertaken to benefit him because he hired others to "make it happen," the fact that Sam had the financial wherewithal to attempt to insulate himself from the "bad acts" that occurred here cannot change the proper outcome or, if it does, an appellate court will have to so rule.

From this Court's perspective, Sam cannot have the good without taking the bad. Sam never actually read any of the legal opinions or memoranda he received in connection with the offshore system and that he claims his reliance upon defeats his fraudulent intent or proves his reasonable cause and good faith defense; nor was he required to do so, as he can receive advice indirectly under the tax regulation at issue. Moreover, Sam rarely dealt directly with a lawyer, choosing again to deal with them through middlemen —i.e., French, Robertson, Hennington, and Boucher, which the tax regulation also permits. But it is hard to believe that those middlemen chose to only tell Sam about the favorable aspects of the advice they were given on his behalf by the tax professionals they hired on his behalf. We certainly know Hennington and Boucher didn't, as reflected by what happened in 2003 when Boucher had a chance meeting with Lubar in the Cayman Islands, which led to Hennington's and Boucher's discovery of many disconcerting facts about the Wyly offshore system and the tax consequences of the transactions undertaken through the offshore system, all of which were reported to Sam, among others, in writing, in detail, immediately.

That Sam may have only heard what he wanted to hear from some of those middlemen—i.e., the favorable aspects of the advice upon which he purports to rely here—is certainly possible, but the Court rejects the argument that he never knew or understood the assumptions upon which that favorable advice depended. In short, Sam cannot rely on the favorable portions of the professional's advice he sought, while feigning ignorance of the factual predicates upon which that advice relied for its accuracy. For example, did Sam not wonder why King and Cairns, one individual he barely knew and the other who he did not know at all, each settled a trust with $25,000 in the IOM and named him and his wife and children as beneficiaries? Perhaps that happens all the time in Sam's life, but if it happened in mine, I would be asking questions —lots of them.

Sam is a sophisticated and well-educated businessman that accumulated great wealth through his business acumen and hard work. And, while he may be an “idea guy” that leaves the day-to-day business details to professional managers and advisors he hires, it is clear that he expects results and is knowledgeable about the results they obtain on his behalf. He does not simply turn his wealth over to others and wish them luck. As relevant here, the Court is convinced Sam knew what was happening in connection with the offshore system and that no money or assets moved within that system without Sam's knowledge and express direction. Let me be clear, that Sam's directions to the offshore trustees was usually done through the formality of Sam making his “wishes” known to them—directly or through the trust protectors he appointed—is of little consequence. 645 The IOM trustees never refused to follow Sam's “wishes”—even when that made little sense—as they understood that their jobs depended upon it. If a Sam “wish” was not granted, they would be removed—plain and simple.

The Court does not believe that the law permits Sam to hide behind others and claim not to have known what was going on around him. This Court has taken its responsibility to sift through the mountains of evidence presented here seriously; it had the benefit of seeing the witnesses and evaluating their credibility and it spent countless hours reviewing the documents introduced into evidence, including those that were created to attempt to shield Sam from the fraud that the Court is convinced—by clear and convincing evidence—occurred here.

At the same time, the Court is equally convinced that Dee is innocent of any wrongdoing. That she did not know the details of what Sam and Charles had done offshore is clear. And, there was nothing that should have “tipped her off” that something was amiss. She did not commit fraud, she did not participate in any fraud, she was not willfully blind, and she is entitled to the benefit of the innocent spouse defense.

Orders reflecting these rulings shall be entered separately in each of the Cases. The Court hereby directs the parties' counsel to confer with each other and attempt to submit agreed forms of orders to the Court consistent with this Memorandum Opinion and allowing the IRS' claims in agreed amounts within thirty days of the entry of this Memorandum Opinion on the Court's docket. If no agreement can be reached, each party shall submit its own proposed form of order on or before the forty-fifth day after entry of this Memorandum Opinion on the Court's docket, along with an explanation of why the other side's proposed order is improper.

Collateral Estoppel Findings

1. Between 1992 and 1996, Sam and Charles Wyly created a number of IOM trusts, each of which owned several subsidiary companies. Michael French, the Wylys' family attorney, Sharyl Robertson, the Chief Financial Officer (“CFO”) of the Wyly family office, and Michelle Boucher, the CFO of the Irish Trust Company, a Wyly-related entity in the Cayman Islands, served as protectors of the IOM trusts. French, Robertson, and Boucher conveyed the Wylys' investment recommendations to the trust management companies administering the Wylys' IOM trusts (the “IOM trustees”). All of the IOM trustees' securities transactions were based on the Wylys' recommendations and the IOM trustees never declined to follow a Wyly recommendation.

2. The Wylys served as directors of Michaels Stores, Sterling Software, Sterling Commerce, and Scottish Annuity and Life Holdings, Ltd. (“Scottish Re”). As part of their compensation, the Wylys received stock options and warrants. “Between 1992 and 1999, Sam and Charles Wyly sold or transferred to the [IOM] trusts and companies stock options in Michaels Stores, Sterling Software and Sterling Commerce” in exchange for private annuities while simultaneously disclaiming beneficial ownership over the securities in public filings with the SEC. Between 1995 and 2005, the IOM trusts and companies exercised these options and warrants, 646 separately acquired options and stock in all four companies, and sold the shares, without filing disclosures.

3. The jury found that the Wylys were beneficial owners of the Issuer securities transferred to, held, and sold by the IOM trusts because the Wylys, directly or indirectly, had or shared voting and/or investment power over these securities. Thus, the jury concluded that the Wylys failed to accurately disclose the extent of their beneficial ownership in the Issuer securities under sections 13(d) and 16(a) of the Securities Exchange Act (the “Exchange Act”). The jury also found that the Wylys caused the Issuers to violate section 14(a) of the Exchange Act, because the Wylys misrepresented the extent of their beneficial ownership to the Issuers in their Director and Officer (“D & O”) questionnaires, which were incorporated by the Issuers in proxy statements.

4. In addition to these disclosure violations, the Wylys were found liable for securities fraud in violation of section 10(b) of the Exchange Act and section 17(a) of the Securities Act of 1933 (the “Securities Act”), and for aiding and abetting the Issuers' and the IOM trusts' securities law violations.

5. In early to mid–1991, Sam Wyly asked Robertson to attend a seminar held by lawyer and trust promoter David Tedder on the use of foreign trusts as a method of asset protection and tax deferral. Shortly thereafter, the Wylys, Robertson, and French attended another Tedder seminar in New Orleans. Tedder, French, and the Wylys then had a private meeting at Sam Wyly's house in Malibu, California. At that meeting, Tedder “talked about establishing trusts that would provide tax deferral, and how the Wylys could transfer assets to those trusts and get tax deferral on the growth of those assets.”

6. Specifically, Tedder recommended transferring the Wylys' stock options in Sterling Software and Michaels Stores to a foreign trust in exchange for a private annuity “in a tax-free kind of transaction.” Under Tedder's plan, it was “expressly intended that [the Wylys] ... irrevocably surrender the enjoyment, control, ownership, and all economic benefits attributable to the ownership of the [options] which are sold in exchange for the private annuity.”

7. The Wylys pursued the offshore program primarily for its tax advantages.

8. However, because Tedder suggested transferring stock options in publicly traded companies—Sterling Software and Michaels Stores—any such transaction would implicate the securities laws. French testified that he raised concerns about whether the Wylys would continue to have filing obligations as directors of Sterling Software and Michaels Stores, even after the transfers. Tedder responded that making SEC filings could threaten the Wylys' tax benefits, because “disclosure of the offshore trusts in SEC filings may lead the IRS to discover and investigate the tax issue, and ... the IRS might use the Wylys' SEC filings against them if the tax issue was ever litigated.”

9. But Sam Wyly corroborated French's account by testifying that 647 Tedder told him that SEC filings “could trigger tax problems if you had these things on file and [were] reporting the trust shares on [Schedule] 13Ds.” Further, it would be logical to draw an inference that the Wylys would have been concerned about taking inconsistent positions in their SEC and IRS filings when millions of dollars of tax savings were at stake.

10. The jury found that the Wylys always had beneficial ownership over the options, warrants, and securities held by the IOM trusts.

11. Thus, the Wylys were obligated to disclose, on the filings required by sections 13 and 16, any time they or the trusts transacted in those securities. Because beneficial ownership under the securities laws turns on having voting and/or investment power, truthful SEC filings would have forced the Wylys to admit having some element of control over the securities held by the trusts. To the Wylys, this would mean conceding some element of control over the trustees. But the Wylys believed—rightly or wrongly—that it was critical to conceal their control of the trustees in order to maintain the tax-free status of the trusts, including income from transactions in the Issuer securities.

12. Footnote 91. (Sam Wyly) ("We took steps to avoid control, and those are steps to create the appearance of avoiding control. It's reality and it's appearance. You want the appearance to match the reality.") Accord PX 890 (11/3/00 email from Robertson to Evan Wyly) ("Remember that it is critical from a U.S. tax standpoint that there is no appearance that the Wyly's [sic] are in control of the trusts or the protectors.").

13. Because the Wylys made public filings showing the transfer of options to foreign trusts, and at other times publicized their relationship to the foreign trusts, the Wylys also took affirmative steps to minimize the trusts' SEC filings to conceal the ultimate exercise and sale of those options. For example, the Wyly family office tracked the percentage of ownership each trust management company had in a particular Issuer to avoid triggering mandatory SEC reporting. Thus, as Sam Wyly testified, not making SEC filings was logically "something that consistently went on" throughout the duration of the offshore system.

14. Even when it would have been otherwise helpful to assert beneficial ownership over the stock held by the foreign trusts, such as during Sam Wyly's proxy battle for control of Computer Associates (the acquirer of Sterling Software) in February 2002, the Wylys chose not to do it in fear of inconsistent tax positions. From these facts, it is logical to draw the inference that making misleading statements in SEC filings, or not making SEC filings at all, was part of the Wylys' plan to maintain the appearance of separation and independence from the foreign trusts.

15. Footnote 95. See PX 1101 (2/26/02 email from Keeley Hennington, tax director and, starting in 2000, CFO of the Wyly family office, to Boucher, attaching Hennington's note to Sam Wyly) ("The trusts are record 648 owners of the shares on C[omputer] A[ssociates]' books. If it is represented [that] there are $2.9 shares [sic], I think it is likely CA may say we show the Wyly's [sic] only own 1.5M options and again the difference would need to be explained ... Our friendly IRS agent is still looming around and although he has verbally agreed not to look further at any foreign entities or trusts, I would not want to give him any fresh ammunition.").

16. The Wylys ultimately hired Tedder to help establish the first group of offshore trusts and subsidiary companies in 1992 (together with the Plaquemines Trust, the "Bulldog Trusts"). These trusts were settled by Sam or Charles Wyly and had beneficiaries including the Wylys' wives and children and several charitable organizations. The trust deeds permitted the protectors to "add [ ] or substitut[e]" a charitable organization "by notice in writing to the trustees." These trusts were explicitly set up as "non-grantor trust[s] rather than [ ] grantor trust[s] under Section 671–678 of the Code." Under the terms of the trusts, no United States beneficiary could receive a distribution from the trust until two years after the settlor's death.

17. Footnote 97. (Robertson). The 1992 Trusts relevant to the remedies phase are: 1) the Bulldog Non–Grantor Trust; 2) Lake Providence International Trust; 3) the Delhi International Trust; 4) the Pitkin Non–Grantor Trust; and 5) the Castle Creek International Trust. In 1995, the Bulldog Trust settled the Plaquemines Trust, which had a class of beneficiaries including Sam Wyly's children. These trusts are referred to as the "Bulldog Trusts" for purposes of this Opinion and Order. The terminology was coined by defendants' expert, Professor Robert Danforth, and has been adopted by the parties in their briefing and argument.

18. In 1993, French approached the law firm of Morgan, Lewis & Brockius (“Morgan Lewis”) to discuss whether the Bulldog Trust was a “grantor or non-grantor trust.” Morgan Lewis prepared a memorandum concluding 1) that there was a “significant risk that the [Bulldog] Trust will be characterized as a grantor trust under § 679 [because] income is being currently accumulated for the benefit of U.S. beneficiaries,” and 2) that “[i]t is also likely that the Trustee's power to add or substitute other foreign charities (within the class [of beneficiaries]) causes the Trust to be characterized as a grantor trust under § 674. Charles Lubar, the partner at Morgan Lewis retained to work on this matter, gave the memorandum to French and spoke with him about its conclusions.

19. The following year, French asked Lubar to advise the Wylys about whether a trust settled by “a foreign person who had done business with Sam Wyly” would be treated as a grantor trust. Lubar advised that “as long as there wasn't an indirect transfer of assets by the U.S. person and the foreign person put the money up, and there were certain powers in the trust, then it would be a foreign grantor trust, 649 and the distributions then would not be taxable.” For the purposes of rendering his opinion, Lubar assumed that the foreign grantor would be the “sole transferor of property to the trust [ ],” unless the taxpayers transferred funds “on an ‘arm's length’ basis.”

20. In 1994 and 1995, two foreign citizens established several trusts for the benefit of the Wylys and their families (collectively, the “Bessie Trusts”). The Bessie Trust and the Tyler Trust were purportedly settled by Keith King, an individual associated with Ronald Buchanan, an IOM trustee selected by the Wylys, with initial contributions of $25,000 each. However, no such contribution was ever made. The trusts “were settled with a factual dollar bill ... plus an indebtedness of $24,999 each on the part of Keith King as settlor.” That indebtedness was immediately forgiven.

21. Footnote 107. The 1994/1995 trusts relevant to this Opinion and Order are: 1) the Bessie Trust; 2) the La Fourche Trust; 3) the Red Mountain Trust; and 4) the Tyler Trust. These trusts will be referred to as the “Bessie Trusts,” as per Professor Danforth's grouping.

22. The La Fourche Trust and the Red Mountain Trusts were purportedly settled by Shaun Cairns, another individual associated with Buchanan, also with initial contributions of $25,000 each. Cairns testified that French prepared letters stating that Cairns was establishing the trusts “to show [his] gratitude for [the Wylys'] loyalty to our mutual ventures and [their] personal support and friendship,” and asked Cairns to sign them. In truth, Cairns had never met nor dealt with the Wylys before establishing the trusts, and had provided only $100 towards the trusts. Shortly after these trusts were settled, Cairns's trust management company was hired to serve as trustee for some of the Wylys' IOM trusts.

23. These transactions were shams intended to circumvent the grantor trust rules. French and Buchanan, acting as the Wylys' agents, recruited King and Cairns to create a falsified record of a gratuitous foreign grantor trust. The trust documents are admittedly false—King and Cairns never contributed $25,000 towards the initial settlement.

24. There were no gratuitous transfers here. First, I am doubtful that King provided even the factual $1 towards the trusts. In a November 26, 1995 fax to French, Buchanan writes that “Keith never produced the money.” Buchanan explains that the King-related trusts “were settled with a factual dollar bill” only so that “there [was] no question of the[ ] [trusts] being voidable by reason of the absence of assets” pending the Wylys' transfer of options. Even if King had contributed the $1, the premise that an unreimbursed dollar bill is sufficient to establish a tax-free foreign grantor trust cannot be taken seriously. Second, Cairns's transfer of $100 cannot be considered gratuitous because shortly after settling these trusts, he received lucrative work from the Wylys as trustee. Finally, in light of the falsified trust deeds and supporting documentation surrounding 650 these trusts, it would be unjust to consider anyone but the Wylys to be the true grantors of these trusts.

25. The trusts were administered by professional asset management companies located on the Isle of Man. The trustees were selected by the Wylys or the protectors. The protectors, all of whom were Wyly agents, had the authority to remove and replace trustees. As mentioned earlier, the protectors also transmitted the Wylys' investment recommendations to the trustees. Defendants have presented no evidence of an investment made by the IOM trusts that did not originate with the Wylys' recommendations. Nor have defendants presented evidence of an IOM trustee rejecting a Wyly recommendation.

26. The SEC, on the other hand, has identified several transactions where the Wylys bypassed the trustees altogether. In October 2001, Keeley Hennington, who replaced Robertson as the head of the Wyly family office in June 2000, called Lehman Brothers and directed it to sell 100,000 shares of Michaels Stores held by Quayle Limited, an IOM company, at Charles Wyly's request. Neither Wyly nor Hennington contacted the trustees before placing the sell order. On another occasion in June 2002, Sam Wyly contacted a broker directly and instructed him to "hold on" to 100,000 shares of TYCO stock, overriding a previous order from the IOM trustee, based on an earlier Wyly recommendation, to sell all TYCO shares.

27. The SEC also presented evidence of transactions that no independent trustee would reasonably initiate.

28. For example, on September 26, 1998, Boucher contacted an IOM trust to recommend a ten million dollar investment in the Edinburgh Fund. On September 28, Boucher told the trustee for the first time that the Edinburgh Fund was a fund run by Sam Wyly's son-in-law and that it did not have a prospectus or subscription documents. Despite knowing nothing about the investment beyond its connection to the Wyly family, the trustee agreed to "forward the necessary instructions to Lehman Brothers." One day later, Boucher followed up with the trustee "to ask for an update on progress with regard to making funds available for the proposed investment in the Edinburgh Fund.... [Boucher] mentioned that the Fund had already commenced trading and that the funds would therefore be required urgently."

29. Some of the Wylys' recommendations had nothing to do with securities at all. Among the many personal purchases, loans, and investments the Wylys directed the IOM trustees to make, were businesses for Wyly children and family members, real estate, artwork, jewelry, collectibles, and furniture.

30. "In April 1992, Sam and Charles Wyly transferred 960,000 Michaels Stores options and 1,983,588 Sterling Software options to ten Nevada companies indirectly owned by two Isle of Man trusts in exchange for deferred private annuity agreements." In 1995 and 1996, the Wylys transferred 1,350,000 Michaels 651 Stores options, 2,650,000 Sterling Software options, and 4,600,000 Sterling Commerce options to the IOM trusts, also in exchange for annuities.

31. In June 1997, French approached Morgan Lewis to discuss the tax consequences of the private annuity transaction. Lubar remembers that he was "really concerned about the transaction" and "worried that the transfer of the options to a company that didn't have any other assets in exchange for a private annuity raised a question about whether that was an arms-length transfer." However, Lubar acknowledged that "other tax lawyers would look at a transfer of a private annuity in different ways."

32. After studying the issue, Lubar advised French that the transfers created potential problems under sections 674 and 679, amongst other provisions.

33. Ordinarily, a company granting stock options as compensation issues a Form 1099 or W2 reporting income to the director or officer and takes a corresponding deduction for the compensation expense when the option is exercised. When the Wylys transferred their stock options to the IOM trusts in exchange for private annuities, the Issuers of the options—that is, Sterling Software and Michaels Stores—had to decide whether that transfer was a taxable event that required issuing a Form 1099 or W2 to report income to the Wylys. To address these concerns, Tedder sent an opinion letter to both companies explaining that the Wylys should not have to recognize income because the annuity did not require payment until a date certain in the future.

34. Jeannette Meier, general counsel of Sterling Software, asked French's law firm, Jackson Walker, to give a "back up" tax opinion to support Tedder's letter. French provided a draft opinion, but never finalized the letter. Nevertheless, based on French and Tedder's representations, Sterling Software decided not to issue a Form 1099 to the Wylys and declined to take a corresponding deduction for compensation expense. But Meier testified that the company was "concerned about ... whether, not having gotten a backup opinion from Jackson Walker, [it] was on good ground not to have to put [the compensation expense] in the [Section] 10–Q [financial statements.]" The value of the options was "a big number" and "would have affected the accuracy of the public filings" if Sterling Software had decided to report it as compensation.

35. Michaels Stores treated the transfer of options identically. In addition, French instructed Mark Beasley, general counsel for Michaels Stores, not to issue Form 1099s for any of the foreign trust entities upon those companies' exercise of stock options.

36. In March 2000, SBC Communications Inc. ("SBC") acquired Sterling Commerce, which had been spun off from Sterling Software in 1995. "As part of [the] acquisition ... all outstanding options to purchase shares of Sterling [Commerce] were canceled. All option holders received cash ... based on the excess of the stock purchase 652 price over the option price." On January 11, 2001, SBC notified the Wylys that it was planning "to issue a Form 1099 to [the respective Wylys]/[their] trusts showing taxable income" in the total amount of $73,912,500. The Wylys, through Boucher and Robertson, reached out to Rodney Owens, a partner at the Meadows Owens law firm in Dallas, to write a memo to SBC explaining why a 1099 should not be issued. On January 26, 2001, Owens wrote in a letter to SBC that "it is not appropriate for SBC to file a 1099 or any other reporting papers regarding this transaction because [the IOM entity] is a foreign corporation, and the income from the purchase of the stock is not subject to U.S. taxation." After receiving the letter, SBC sought additional information about the private annuity transaction, including whether the transfer of options had been recognized as a taxable event at the time of the original transaction, and if not, what the schedule of annuity payments was. Although French's relationship with the Wylys had broken down by this point, he agreed to write a memorandum supporting the tax treatment of the annuities.

37. All in all, between 1992 and 2004, the Issuers never reported income related to the exercise of options or warrants transferred to the foreign trusts. Their decision not to report was a result of the Wylys' deceptive behavior and affirmative misrepresentations. Because the Wylys disclaimed beneficial ownership of the options upon transfer, convinced the Issuers that the private annuity transactions were not taxable events, and did not disclose their beneficial ownership of the securities held by the IOM trusts in their Director and Officer questionnaires, the Issuers did not attribute taxable income to the Wylys.

38. The annuity payments for the original option transfers had been due to commence in the late 1990s, but that period was extended to 2004. In early 2003, Boucher and Hennington approached Lubar to discuss potential issues arising from the upcoming annuity payments. Lubar told Hennington and Boucher that, as he explained to French years before, he believed the trusts were grantor trusts under either sections 674 or 679 and should have been taxable to the Wylys all along. Further, Lubar believed the IRS would challenge the private annuity transactions. Lubar and other Morgan Lewis attorneys suggested approaching the IRS "on a no-name basis" to see "where the negotiations with the IRS might lead" in the event the Wylys wanted to pursue a voluntary disclosure.

39. Boucher and Hennington summarized Lubar's advice in a July 2, 2003 memorandum to Sam Wyly, Charles Wyly, Evan Wyly, and Donald Miller. The memorandum addressed several concerns about the "logistical problems of paying the annuities." Hennington and Boucher were concerned that "[i]t is almost certain given the large amount of these payments that the reporting will result in an IRS audit. [Further], [t]here is also a high likelihood that as a result of this audit the entire structure of 653 the foreign system will be audited by the IRS."

40. Additionally, Hennington and Boucher reported that [t]he annuity payments will bankrupt several of the IOM companies, which could bring the validity of the annuity transaction into question. [And] [a]fter a few years of payments, [other] companies will be left with non-liquid assets, which will result in payments being made in kind ... [which] may also call into question the validity of the transaction and the 'arms length' nature of the transaction.

41. On August 13, 2003, several attorneys representing the Wyly family met with Internal Revenue Service ("IRS") officials. Lubar gave the IRS some details about the trusts, and admitted that there was a "serious risk [that] they were grantor trusts from the beginning." Lubar also explained the private annuity transactions, and told the IRS, after questioning, that the options were for stock in publicly traded corporations, that no income was reported upon exercise, and that the corporations claimed no deductions.

42. According to attorney notes memorializing the meeting, an IRS officer asked if the taxpayers were "significant enough shareholders that their holdings would be listed on SEC filings" and asked if the "SEC filings show[ed] beneficial interest in shares." Lubar said that he believed they were significant enough shareholders for "at least [the] first two [companies]" but did not know if the filings showed beneficial ownership. Hennington and Boucher reported to the Wylys that the IRS was primarily interested in the structure of the annuity, but added that one of the IRS representatives "seemed very interested in any SEC reporting of the initial transactions [even though] [t]his seems out of their area of expertise or control."

43. The Wylys did not proceed with Morgan Lewis on a voluntary disclosure path. But by February 2, 2004, Charles Wyly received a notice of audit. Shortly thereafter, Sam Wyly asked Hennington, Boucher, and Charles Pulman, another attorney at Meadows Owens, "to explore what happens [for purposes of taxation] if he is not a U.S. citizen." The firm concluded that an expatriate U.S. citizen who has a net worth of more than $622,000 "will be treated as having a principal purpose of tax avoidance" and will continue to be taxed pursuant to several special provisions.

44. From May to August 2004, the IRS sent a number of information document requests ("IDRs") to both Sam and Charles Wyly. In at least one of the IDRs, the IRS requested additional information about a transfer of Michaels Stores options to an independent trust, such as "the identity of all original and current beneficiaries, including their nationality, place of residence, and current mailing address" as well as the identity of "the grantor(s) of the trust(s)." At an October 21, 2004 meeting between attorneys representing the Wyly family and the IRS, an IRS agent said that the IDRs regarding the options transfers were based on information "pulled from SEC filings." At that 654 meeting, the IRS agents also asked questions about the trusts, including about why Keith King set up the Tyler Trust.

45. The SEC has not shown that the Wylys' or Issuers' SEC filings launched the IRS audit of the Wylys and the offshore system, or even that accurate filings would have been likely to trigger an earlier examination. However, it is evident from the IDRs and from the October 2004 meeting, that once the IRS investigation was under way, agents and investigators were consulting SEC filings as part of their fact finding process and identified numerous issues and misstatements.

46. The IOM trusts sold 1.8 million shares of unregistered stock between June and December 1997, at prices ranging from approximately $21 per share in the summer to approximately $35 per share in the fall. The trusts sold 200,000 of these shares less than one year after the December 1996 private placement, in violation of the terms of the purchase agreement. In 1998, the IOM trusts sold a small number of shares at approximately $32 per share. In 2000 and 2001, the IOM trusts sold approximately 1.2 million shares at prices ranging from approximately $40 per share in September 2000 to approximately $55 per share in November 2001.

47. Defendants must concede that if I conclude that the Wylys were the real grantors of the Bessie Trusts, then the profits earned on the sale of Issuer securities by those trusts are taxable to the Wylys, not the purported foreign grantors. Because I conclude that the purported foreign grantors made no gratuitous contributions, "the trusts at issue [are] clearly grantor trusts taxable to the domestic grantors."

48. Section 674(a) provides that: "[t]he grantor shall be treated as the owner of any portion of a trust in respect of which the beneficial enjoyment of the corpus or the income therefrom is subject to a power of disposition, exercisable by the grantor or a nonadverse party, or both, without the approval or consent of any adverse party." Quoting a prominent tax treatise, defendants concede that the "power of disposition" includes "powers to 'effect such major changes in the enjoyment of a trust's income and corpus as the addition and elimination of beneficiaries' as well as 'minor and customary power[s]' over income and corpus distribution." Because a non-beneficiary trustee is considered a non-adverse party under the statute, "[s]ection 674(a) captures virtually every trust, including the [IOM] trusts." Thus, defendants concede that "[u]ltimate liability under [s]ection 674[ ] ... turns on whether any of the statutory exceptions apply."

49. According to defendants, the Bulldog Trusts are not grantor trusts because they fall under the section 674(c) exemption. Under that exemption, section 674(a) does not apply to "certain powers that are exercisable by independent trustees." According to the corresponding IRS regulation, which summarizes the statute, [t]he powers to which section 674(c) apply are powers (a) to distribute, apportion, or accumulate income to or for a beneficiary 655 or beneficiaries, or to, for, or within a class of beneficiaries, or (b) to pay out corpus to or for a beneficiary or beneficiaries or to or for a class of beneficiaries (whether or not income beneficiaries). In order for such a power to fall within the exception of section 674(c) it must be exercisable solely (without the approval or consent of any other person) by a trustee or trustees none of whom is the grantor and no more than half of whom are related or subordinate parties who are subservient to the wishes of the grantor.

50. To determine whether the Bulldog Trusts are covered by this exception, it is necessary to answer three questions: 1) Did the IOM trustees have the power to "distribute, apportion, or accumulate income" or "pay out corpus" to or for a beneficiary or beneficiaries?; 2) Were the IOM trustees a) the grantor, or b) a "related or subordinate" party as defined by the statute?; and 3) Were the trustees able to "exercis[e] [those powers] solely (without the approval or consent of any other person)"?

51. The first two questions are straightforward. First, the IOM trustees certainly had the power, as set out in the trust deeds, to "distribute, apportion, or accumulate income" or "pay out corpus" to or for a beneficiary. Second, the IOM trustees were neither the grantor, nor one of the individuals on the exclusive list of "related or subordinate" parties defined by the statute. The only remaining question is whether the IOM trustees were able to exercise those powers "solely" or "without the approval or consent of any other person."

52. The Wylys, through the trust protectors who were all loyal Wyly agents, retained the ability to terminate and replace trustees. The Wylys expected that the trustees would execute their every order, and that is exactly what the trustees did.

53. The evidence amply shows that the IOM trustees followed every Wyly recommendation, whether it pertained to transactions in the Issuer securities, making unsecured loans to Wyly enterprises, or purchases of real estate, artwork, collectibles, and other personal items for the Wylys and their children. The trustees made no meaningful decisions about the trust income or corpus other than at the behest of the Wylys. On certain occasions, such as the establishment of the Bessie Trusts, the IOM trustees actively participated in fraudulent activity along with the Wylys. The Wylys freely directed the distribution of trust assets for personal purchases and personal use. Because the Wylys and their family members were beneficiaries, the IOM trustees were thus "distributing" income for a beneficiary at the direction of the grantors—the Wylys.

54. Footnote 218. Because I conclude that both the Bulldog and Bessie Trusts were grantor trusts under Section 674, I need not reach the issue of whether they were also grantor trusts under Section 679.

55. The Wylys engaged in a thirteen year fraud, creating seventeen trusts and forty subsidiary companies, employing numerous IOM trustees, a veritable "army of lawyers," 656 hiring an offshore accountant to hold records outside the United States, and delegating several domestic employees to handle the administration of the trusts.

56. Reasonable and savvy businessmen do not engage in such activity unless it is profitable. Of course it was profitable—by transferring property, including valuable options and warrants, to the trusts, exercising the options and trading in secret, and using the proceed to reinvest in other ventures, the Wylys were able to accumulate tremendous tax-free wealth.

57. The jury found that the Wylys were beneficial owners of all of the Issuer securities—from the time the options were transferred to the trusts to the time the trusts exercised the options or otherwise acquired stock to the time they were sold. The jury also found that the Wylys' pervasive failure to disclose beneficial ownership constituted securities fraud. There is no evidence in the record that the purpose of this fraud was to manipulate or distort the market.

58. There is ample evidence, however, that the driving purpose of the securities fraud was to conceal the Wylys' relationship to the IOM trusts and preserve the preferential tax treatment on secret offshore profits for as long as possible.

59. First, defendants' motivation to preserve tax benefits was important to their decision to misrepresent their beneficial ownership. Admitting beneficial ownership would have forced defendants to take conflicting positions with two separate government agencies. Even if admission of "beneficial ownership" on a schedule 13D would not immediately reveal a fact that would establish control of an offshore trust, it would at least be facially inconsistent with a tax reporting position that did not include the profits from trades made by that offshore trust. It would have been reasonable, and in fact, prudent, for the Wylys to be concerned about taking conflicting positions in public SEC filings and on their tax returns because that SEC filing could constitute an admission for purposes of future tax litigation.

60. Given the Wylys' high profile background, tremendous wealth, and history of litigation with the IRS, the possibility of an IRS audit was not remote. In fact, it was highly likely. Thus, even if the Wylys had no reason to believe that SEC filings could trigger an audit, they certainly had reason to believe and fear that the IRS would consult all public filings in the event of an audit.

61. Second, the securities fraud was intimately connected to protecting the tax benefits in other ways. The Wylys took numerous steps to prevent the Issuers from issuing Forms 1099 to report income to either the Wylys in an individual capacity or to the offshore entities. The Issuers did not report income to the Wylys after the 1992 private annuity transaction because of the Wylys' misrepresentations about disclaiming beneficial ownership over the options, and French and Tedders' misrepresentations about the economic substance of that transaction. In 2001, nearly ten years later, the Wylys continued 657 the fraud by convincing SBC not to issue 1099s based on the same misrepresentations. None of the four Issuers reported income to the Wylys in connection with the options granted as compensation and transferred to the trusts, even though the Wylys certainly enjoyed the benefit of those options once they were exercised and the stock was sold.

62. The Wylys engaged in securities fraud to conceal their relationship to and control of the IOM trusts in order to maintain the secrecy of the offshore system and preserve their tax benefits. The unlawful gains causally related to the securities violations found by the jury, is an amount equivalent to the taxes avoided on the profits the Wylys realized on the sale of Issuer securities.

63. The Wylys' securities violations helped them establish the offshore system, conceal their trading profits, and use those trading profits to invest in other ventures and amass tremendous untaxed wealth.

64. Sam Wyly engaged in a large securities fraud spanning thirteen years, involving multiple trusts and entities and hundreds, if not thousands, of misstatements, all while being subject to a previous injunction entered in 1979.

Footnotes

[1] On April 15, 2015, the IRS filed Claim No. 18 against Sam's bankruptcy estate in Case No. 14–35043–BJH–11 and Claim No. 11 against Dee's bankruptcy estate in Case No. 14–35074–BJH–11 (together, the "Proofs of Claim "). As indicated above, the Debtors' bankruptcy cases are being jointly administered under Case No. 14–35073–BJH–11.

[2] See Debtor Sam Wyly's Objection to Proof of Claim No. 18 Filed by the IRS [ECF No. 938] and Debtor Caroline D. Wyly's Amended Objection to Claim Number 11 of the Department of Treasury—Internal Revenue Service [Case No. 14–35074, ECF No. 75].

[3] To the extent that a finding of fact is more properly construed as a conclusion of law, or vice versa, it should be so construed.

[4] 11 U.S.C. § 505 expressly provides that a bankruptcy court may determine a debtor's tax liability:

> (a)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection, the court may determine the amount or legality of any tax, any fine or penalty relating to a tax, or any addition to tax, whether or not previously assessed, whether or not paid, and whether or not contested before and adjudicated by a judicial or administrative tribunal of competent jurisdiction.
>
> (2) The court may not so determine—
> (A) the amount or legality of a tax, fine, penalty, or addition to tax if such amount or legality was contested before and adjudicated by a judicial or administrative tribunal of competent jurisdiction before the commencement of the case under this title[.]

[5] See I.R.S. v. Luongo (In re Luongo), 259 F.3d 323, 328–30 (5th Cir.2001) (citing legislative history referencing the jurisdictional nature of § 505).

[6] The Court wishes to express its appreciation to the parties for the enormous efforts that went into simplifying this trial whenever possible. The Joint Stipulations and the Computation Stipulations saved weeks of trial testimony.

[7] Dee is Charles' widow. Dee and Charles were married for 56 years and they filed joint tax returns throughout their marriage.

[8] SEC v. Wyly, 56 F.Supp.3d 394, 434 (S.D.N.Y.2014) ("For the foregoing reasons, Sam Wyly must disgorge $123,836,958.76 and Charles Wyly must disgorge $63,881,743.97. The Wylys shall also pay prejudgment interest for the entire period of the fraud through December 1, 2014, calculated in accordance with this Opinion and Order."). Sam's bankruptcy schedules list the judgment, including prejudgment interest, at $198,118,825.16. See Amended Schedule F, Case No. 14–35043, ECF No. 472 at p. 88 of 94.

[9] See Memorandum Opinion Exhibit A. The Court will cite to these findings by the number assigned to each on Exhibit A (e.g., Collateral Estoppel No. 1).

[10] This Court heard substantial evidence that overlaps with that the jury and the SDNY Court heard in the SEC Action. While various witnesses who testified there were not called here, the parties agreed to rely on their testimony in the SEC Action here. While this Court did not retry the legal determination of whether the Bulldog Trusts and the Bessie Trusts (as defined by the SDNY Court) were grantor trusts to Sam and Charles, having decided to apply collateral estoppel to that determination of the SDNY Court at the IRS' request, many of the factual findings made there (and to which this Court has applied collateral estoppel) were proven here also. Where the Court quotes from findings of fact made in the SEC Action in this Memorandum Opinion to which it has applied collateral estoppel, the Court will also note if that finding was independently proven here too. Unless the Court specifically notes otherwise, the finding here was proven by clear and convincing evidence.

[11] At certain points in this Memorandum Opinion, the Court refers to understatements of income instead of underpayments of income taxes. The parties agree that it is the Debtors' respective understatements of income that resulted in their respective underpayments of income taxes here.

[12] This agreement is contingent upon (i) the SDNY Court's determination of foreign grantor trust status being affirmed on appeal, which appeal is currently pending before the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, and/or (ii) this Court's collateral estoppel decision being affirmed on appeal, assuming such an appeal is taken.

[13] 26 U.S.C. § 7701(a)(31). Prior to August 20, 1996, a "foreign" trust was defined as a trust "the income of which, from sources without the United States which is not effectively connected with the conduct of a trade or business within the United States, is not includible in gross income under subtitle A." 26 U.S.C. § 7701(a)(31) (1996).

[33] As explained infra at pp. 371–74, 413–16, French (who served as the Wylys primary counsel and trusted agent for about twenty years, IRS Ex. 1199 ¶ 4 (p. 6)) learned in 1993 that an experienced international tax lawyer, Charles Lubar, who French hired on the Wylys' behalf, believed that the 1992 IOM trusts were properly characterized as foreign grantor trusts as to Sam and Charles. The Court imputes this knowledge to Sam and Charles under agency principles.

35 See Tr. Trans. 513:23–514:22 (Rubenstein).

36 There is no evidence suggesting that Dee was involved in any decisions regarding the structure of the offshore system at issue here. Nor is there any evidence suggesting that Dee knew of any uncertainty in the law during the relevant time period. Thus, Rubenstein's testimony has virtually no relevance as to Dee.

38 As explained by Rubenstein, a trust protector is an intermediary between the settlor of a trust and its beneficiaries, on the one hand, and the trustee, on the other hand. Trust protectors are usually individuals. Tr. Trans. 355:9–16 (Rubenstein).

We were surprised."), 1358:3–1359:9 (Donnie Miller) (Surprised by memo in 2003 because "I thought we were always compliant with regulations").

135 Tr. Trans. 1409:9–1423:16 (Sam's testimony regarding IRS Ex. 96, which contains the mid–2003 memoranda in which Hennington and Boucher expressed Lubar's conclusions regarding issues surrounding the trusts). Sam's testimony consists mainly of him acknowledging that the IRS' counsel correctly read the document into the record. Although Sam claims he does not remember the memorandum, he admits that he likely would have received it due to its importance and the fact it was sent by Hennington and Boucher. Further, when asked whether French had conveyed Lubar's concerns raised in 1993 regarding the status of the 1992 trusts, Sam simply testified "I don't know." Id. at 1419:5–11. And, when questioned as to whether this was too important of a topic for French not to have informed Sam, Sam testified: "[i]t's certainly an important topic, but it's the sort of thing delegated to attorneys—to Mr. French and other attorneys." Id. at 1420:17–21. Sam, however, did not testify as to any surprise in 2003 when he heard the news; he simply testified that he could not remember whether he was previously told. Remarkably, on redirect, Sam unequivocally testified that neither Owens, French or any of Sam's lawyers or CPAs ever told him that was anything seriously wrong with the IOM trusts "as a tax matter." Id. 2935:12–23(Sam). This is just one example of the many times that Sam's memory on redirect was superior to that during cross.

161 The Fifth Circuit, agreeing with many other courts that have explored the operation of burden shifting in the tax context, has pointed out that "the operation of this burden-shifting scheme is irrelevant when both parties have met their burdens of production and the preponderance of the evidence supports one party." Brinkley v. C.I.R., 808 F.3d 657, 664 (5th Cir.2015) (citing Knudsen v. C.I.R., 131 T.C. 185, 189 (2008) ("[A]n allocation of the burden of proof is relevant only when there is equal evidence on both sides.")). The Fifth Circuit has held that when both sides have met their burden of production and where the preponderance of evidence nevertheless favors one party, any error in the allocation of the burden of proof is harmless. Brinkley, 808 F.3d at 664 (citing Whitehouse Hotel Ltd. P'ship v. C.I.R., 615 F.3d 321, 332 (5th Cir.2010); Blodgett v. C.I.R., 394 F.3d 1030, 1039 (8th Cir.2005)). Indeed, the Fifth Circuit has gone so far as to explicitly state that "[t]he tax court need not decide whether the burden shifted where, as here, both parties offered some admissible evidence." Whitehouse Hotel, Ltd. P'ship, 615 F.3d at 332 (5th Cir.2010) (citing Blodgett, 394 F.3d at 1039). This is because "[i]n a situation in which both parties have satisfied their burden of production by offering some evidence, then the party supported by the weight of the evidence will prevail regardless of which party bore the burden of persuasion, proof or preponderance." Id. (quoting Blodgett, 394 F.3d at 1039).

The parties here have presented mountains of evidence, and so the Fifth Circuit's observations that allocation of burden of proof is sometimes unimportant may well apply here. Of course, this "it makes no difference" caveat does not apply to the IRS' burden for its assertion of fraud penalties, as the IRS must prove fraud by clear and convincing evidence, not a preponderance of the evidence. Out of an abundance of caution, however, this Court undertakes the burden of proof analysis.

[232] 26 U.S.C. § 6664(c)(1) provides that "[n]o penalty shall be imposed under section 6662 or 6663 with respect to any portion of an underpayment if it is shown that there was a reasonable cause for such portion and that the taxpayer acted in good faith with respect to such portion."

[233] Id. at § 6677(d) provides that "[n]o penalty shall be imposed by this section on any failure which is shown to be due to reasonable cause and not due to willful neglect. The fact that a foreign jurisdiction would impose a civil or criminal penalty on the taxpayer (or any other person) for disclosing the required information is not reasonable cause."

[234] Id. at § 6038(c)(4)(B) provides that "[f]or purposes of this subsection and subsection (b), the time prescribed under paragraph (2) of subsection (a) to furnish information (and the beginning of the 90–day period after notice by the Secretary) shall be treated as being not earlier than the last day on which (as shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary) reasonable cause existed for failure to furnish such information."

[245] Given the SDNY Court's determinations that the relevant IOM trusts were grantor trusts to Sam and Charles, and subject to (i) that decision being affirmed on appeal, and (ii) this Court's decision to apply collateral estoppel effect to that determination not being overturned on appeal, the Debtors, the probate estate of Charles, and the IRS have stipulated to the amounts of income tax underpayments and gift tax underpayments (assuming this Court finds that gifts were made) that are owing to the IRS. As a result, only the second prong (that the underpayment(s) for each relevant year was due to fraud) must be proven by the IRS here.

[246] Gagliardi v. U.S., 81 Fed.Cl. 772, 777 (2008) ("The term 'fraud,' as used in the statutory provisions authorizing the assessment of civil fraud penalties against taxpayers, means intentional wrongdoing on the part of a taxpayer motivated by a specific purpose to evade a tax known or believed to be owing.); Pesky v. U.S., 2013 WL 97752, *3 (D.Idaho Jan. 7, 2013) ("fraud is intentional wrongdoing on the part of the taxpayer with the specific intent to avoid a tax known to be owing").

[247] That Sam loves his family, and vice versa, is obvious. The same is true for Dee. Throughout trial, the courtroom has been filled with a combination, albeit sometimes different combinations, of the Debtors' children and perhaps grandchildren. Two of Sam's children testified at trial, Evan and Laurie, and their love and respect for their father was clear. It is also clear that Sam has instilled in his children the importance of family remaining close through family trips, periodic but regular family meetings, a focus of which is simply staying in touch and letting each other know what is going on in their respective lives, and the like. Dee's son-in-law, Donnie Miller, who is married to Dee's eldest daughter, Martha, and who is the executor of Charles' probate estate, also testified at trial and it is clear that Donnie was close to Charles and is close to Dee.

248 Sam told a story of making a modest and innocent mistake on an early tax return he filed which taught him that the tax laws were complicated and that he should hire professionals to assist him in complying with them, which he has done ever since. The mistake there cost him $134. Tr. Tran. 379:5–388:1; 694:4–11(Sam).

249 As used here "wishes" is a term of art and much evidence will be discussed throughout this Memorandum Opinion about how Sam and Charles made their "wishes" known to the trustees of the IOM trusts, who then implemented those "wishes" even when sound business judgment might have suggested it was imprudent to do so.

The implication of these varied lists of badges of fraud is that these lists are illustrative, rather than exhaustive. See Niedringhaus v. C.I.R., 99 T.C. 202, 211 (1992); Miller v. C.I.R., 94 T.C. 316, 334 (1990); see also Webb, 394 F.2d at 378 ("A summary of the above standards demonstrates their tutorial limitations: We must determine whether it is clearly erroneous that the taxpayer's intent to defraud the government was proven, as to any part of the deficiency, by clear and convincing evidence. Our path in fraud determinations is even more obstacle-pocked because we have no cinematography of the mind nor do we have books approaching impeccable accuracy. Nevertheless, courts have attempted to avoid deciding each case viscerally and have established certain factual checklists.").

255 See Richardson v. C.I.R., 91 T.C.M. (CCH) 981, 2006 WL 931912, at *22 (2006) ("In examining these factors [badges of fraud], this and other courts have further noted that the taxpayer's background, his or her level of education, and prior history of filing proper returns, and the context of the events in question are relevant to the inquiry.").

(CCH) 726, 1990 WL 130150 (1990) ("This and other courts frequently list various factors or 'badges of fraud,' but such lists of various kinds of circumstantial evidence from which fraudulent intent can be inferred are nonexclusive. The fact finder must weigh all of the evidence of record, and not merely check off the presence or absence of the various possible kinds of circumstantial evidence.") (internal citations omitted). Cf. Spies v. U.S., 317 U.S. 492, 499, 63 S.Ct. 364, 87 L.Ed. 418 (1943) (fraud may be inferred from "any conduct, the likely effect of which would be to mislead or conceal.").

257 26 U.S.C. § 6662(b)(6) states that: "[a]ny disallowance of claimed tax benefits by reason of a transaction lacking economic substance (within the meaning of section 7701(o)) or failing to meet the requirements of any similar rule of law."

258 The Court does not accept the Debtors' argument that reliance on the advice of counsel can negate fraudulent intent as a matter of law if there is clear and convincing circumstantial evidence of sufficient badges of fraud to prove fraudulent intent indirectly. If the Debtors' argument were true, there would be no need for the reliance on advice of counsel defense set forth in the statute. That reliance would simply be used to negate fraudulent intent as a matter of law as the Debtors assert here, precluding the IRS from carrying its burden of proof in every such case.

259 Almost all of the badges of fraud found applicable to Sam are equally applicable to Charles since his actions offshore are virtually in lockstep with Sam's actions. Although Charles' probate estate is not a formal party to the Motions, its counsel was present throughout the trial as was its executor, Donnie Miller, after he provided this Court with his testimony and was released from the rule. Because Dee and Charles filed joint tax returns until his death in 2011, and because Dee asks this Court to determine her liability to the IRS during those joint return years and thereafter, the Court has concluded that it must decide if Charles committed tax fraud for at least two reasons: (i) to decide if the statute of limitations on those years (1992–2011) remains open given the IRS' assertion of tax fraud against Dee and Charles, and (ii) to decide the extent to which Dee participated in Charles' alleged fraud.

260 See Niedringhaus, 99 T.C. at 211; Miller, 94 T.C. at 334.

261 The other "usual" badges of fraud are simply not present here. Specifically, there is no credible evidence in the record that the Wylys (i) failed to keep adequate records or kept a double set of books and records, (ii) failed to file tax returns or make estimated tax payments, (iii) engaged in criminal activities, and/or (iv) dealt in cash. The fact that these badges of fraud are not present supports a finding of no fraudulent intent. However, as the case law makes clear, the use of badges of fraud is not a simple process of counting up the badges and seeing how many are on each side of the fraud or no fraud equation. Rather, the presence of several badges suggesting fraudulent intent can outweigh those that do not. Cf. Sanchez v. C.I.R., 108 T.C.M. (CCH) 216, 2014 WL 4251054, at *6 (2014) ("Although no single factor is necessarily sufficient to establish fraud, a combination of several of these factors may be persuasive evidence of fraud."); Prowse, 2006 WL 1593998, at *7 (citing *Petzoldt v. 352 See Joint Exs. 59, 61, 63, 65, 67, and 69, whereby Sam deferred annuity payments scheduled to commence on his 65th birthday to his 70th birthday, and 71, 73, 75, 77, and 79, whereby Sam deferred annuity payments scheduled to commence on his 68th birthday to his 73rd birthday. Although the record reflects that Sam entered into six annuity transactions in each of the relevant years, the record does not contain the Private Annuity Agreement or an Amendment to Private Annuity Agreement related to Yurta Faf Limited (IOM).

Dee similarly extended annuity payments that were scheduled to commence on her 65th birthday to her 70th birthday. Joint Ex. 87.

355 Joint Stipulations ¶ 173 (annuity payments by year); Joint Exs. 80–95 (Annuity Agreements and Amendments to Annuity Agreements). Then, beginning in late 1999, Dee and Charles undertook a further highly complicated transaction in which all of the annuity agreements they had entered into which were held by an IOM corporation were transferred to Stargate Investments, Ltd, a Texas limited partnership ("Stargate Investments (Texas)"). A chart prepared by the parties depicting this transaction is attached as Exhibit K to this Memorandum Opinion. The evidentiary record is largely silent as to the reasons for the complexity of this further transaction. To date, in exchange for approximately $55 million worth of options, Dee and Charles have received—and paid tax on—approximately $112 million in annuity payments. As noted previously, Charles died in the summer of 2011, after which annuity payments on his life ceased. Dee continues to receive some annuity payments. More precisely, Stargate Investments (Texas) received all of the annuity payments, but Dee and Charles reported all of the annuity payments received by Stargate Investments (Texas) as ordinary income and as self-employment income on their joint federal income tax returns for the 2003 through 2011 tax years. Dee reported all of the annuity payments received by Stargate Investments (Texas) as ordinary income and as self-employment income on her individual federal income tax returns for 2012 and 2013. See Joint Stipulations §§ 161–162, 173, 174.

357 These corporations are (i) Tensas Limited (IOM), of which Sam forgave $14,913,153.13 in annuity payments, (ii) East Baton Rouge Limited (IOM), of which Sam forgave $20,947,937.97 in annuity payments, and (iii) East Carrol Limited (IOM), of which Sam forgave $25,111,130.26 in annuity payments.

361 As will be further discussed, the IRS contends that the record supports a finding that the Wylys never intended for the annuities to be paid. According to the IRS, the Wylys didn't need for the money to come back to the United States through annuity payments that would be taxed to them as ordinary income when received, after they and their lawyers had devised complicated structures that enabled the family to enjoy the benefits of their offshore wealth in the United States tax-free. See pp. 423–31, infra.

362 The Nevada entities were used to avoid payment of excise taxes on the transfers of the options and warrants. See Tr. Trans. 1203:2–11) (Chatzky) ("the primary reason why the Nevada corporation was used is because it was believed ... that if a foreign corporation issued an annuity, that there would be an excise tax imposed on the foreign corporation in the amount of 1 percent of the consideration for the annuity. Subsequent research showed that that wasn't the case."). While the Court is not troubled by the use of a Nevada corporation to avoid excise tax, the use of so many and the reason that so many were used—i.e., to attempt to avoid SEC reporting requirements by keeping each entity's ownership below the required reporting threshold as discussed infra at pp. 407–13—is more problematic and indicative of fraud.

The value in total is in excess of $4 million."). As reflected on IRS Ex. 444, sometime around December 2000, Charles agreed to purchase from Soulieana Limited (IOM) all items it purchased on his and Dee's behalf with a cost of $10,000 or less, which totaled "around $381K," and setting a minimum cost threshold of $10,000 for future purchases by Soulieana Limited (IOM). 381 While this may appear to be a formatting error in this Memorandum Opinion, it is not. Rather, when the IRS submitted its proposed collateral estoppel findings from the SEC Action, it submitted findings made by the SDNY Court in footnotes as well as in the body of the court's opinion. So, footnote 91 as quoted here is footnote 91 in the SDNY Court's opinion, which is Collateral Estoppel No. 12 on Exhibit A to this Memorandum Opinion. 555 More fully, the Supreme Court stated in Spies, 317 U.S. 492, 499, 63 S.Ct. 364 (1943) that:

> Congress did not define or limit the methods by which a willful attempt to defeat and evade might be accomplished and perhaps did not define lest its effort to do so result in some unexpected limitation. Nor would we by definition constrict the scope of the Congressional provision that it may be accomplished ‘in any manner.’ By way of illustration, and not by way of limitation, we would think affirmative willful attempt may be inferred from conduct such as keeping a double set of books, making false entries of alterations, or false invoices or documents, destruction of books or records, concealment of assets or covering up sources of income, handling of one's affairs to avoid making the records usual in transactions of the kind, and any conduct, the likely effect of which would be to mislead or to conceal. If the tax-evasion motive plays any part in such conduct the offense may be made out even though the conduct may also serve other purposes such as concealment of other crime.

Right? Answer: Yes.”); 1382:20–24 (Sam testifying that he did not know that his lawyers, with his knowledge, tried to keep the IOM trusts' ownership of securities under 5% to minimize SEC reporting requirements) and 1382:25–1392:10 (impeaching Sam with his testimony from the SEC Action); 2052:9–14 (Sam stating he does not remember personally writing off annuity payments) and 2647:23–2670:17 (impeaching Sam with letters he personally signed forgiving past due and future annuity payments). 585 The outcome here might have been different if the IOM corporations owing the annuity obligations had simply been left alone to invest the money they realized from the exercise of the options and sale of the associated stock—even in investments Sam “wished” the IOM trustees to make, as he is a savvy and successful businessman after all—and then those IOM corporations simply transferred the realized profits to other IOM entities to do with what the trustees decided (again, even consistent with Sam's “wishes”). In other words, had the IOM corporations owing the annuity obligations not been raided to support the families' lifestyles, leaving them unable to satisfy their annuity obligations to Sam (and Charles until his death) as they came due, and income tax had been paid on all of that income when received, we might not be here today. And, even after the offshore entities were raided to support the families' lifestyles, Sam could have “wished” for assets to be liquidated so that loans could be repaid and/or solvency could be restored and his annuities paid per the agreements with him. But, he didn't “wish” for that. And, as a result, it didn't happen. Why? Because Sam (and Charles) got greedy and were prepared to “risk” litigation with the IRS once the offshore system was fully exposed because, as businessmen who had taken business risks all their lives, they expected to be able to settle with the IRS for “pennies on the dollar.” IRS Ex. 1199 ¶ 57 (p. 15) (Annex A, Admissions of Defendant Michael C. French) (“Sam Wyly said if the IRS challenged his use of the Offshore Trusts, he would litigate with the IRS for years and then settle for pennies on the dollars. French knew that Sam Wyly previously litigated against the IRS for years and then settled.”). Sam was questioned regarding his pennies-on-the-dollar statement during cross examination. He testified he did not recall the statement, and IRS' counsel sought to impeach him with French's Consent. Tr. Trans. 1027:1–16(Sam). Sam's counsel objected on hearsay grounds and, since the IRS did not have a persuasive response, that objection was sustained. Id. at

The record is unclear, however, whether Laurie's sisters share a home or enjoy separate homes on the ranch.

589 Recall that Laurie was required to put in 1% in order to be a co-owner, who then has the legal right, according to Meadows Owens, to use and enjoy the asset without paying for the fair rental value of the asset. Tr. Trans. 2542:1–2543:10 (Pulman).

Joint Exs. 145–162. The only Form 3520 filed for the Bulldog IOM Trust was signed and dated by Sam as the settlor on June 6, 1992, was filed on a whitepaper schedule despite the existence of an IRS form that could have been used, and shows that $100 was transferred into the trust. Joint Ex. 142. Likewise, the only Form 3520 filed for the Lake Providence IOM Trust was signed and dated by Sam as the settlor on January 25, 1993, was filed on a whitepaper schedule despite the existence of an IRS form that could have been used, and shows that $100 was transferred into the trust. Joint Ex. 144. The singular Form 3520 for Delhi IOM Trust was signed by Sam on the same date and was also a whitepaper schedule that showed $100 being transferred into the trust. Joint Ex. 145. No Forms 3520 or 3520–A were filed for Bessie IOM Trust or La Fourche IOM Trust.

[623] See Joint Stipulations ¶¶ 223–256; Joint Exs. 142–175. The fact that these forms had to have been filed years late is of no economic consequence here, however, as the IRS is not seeking to recover penalties from the Wylys for any late filing of a form that the parties stipulated was filed.

[627] This finding applies to years 1992 through 2013, even though the IRS does not seek International Penalties for years 1992 through 1995. The IRS does not seek penalties for 1992 through 1995 presumably because during these years, the penalties under § 6677 and § 6038 were relatively de minimis and increased in 1996 and 1997 respectively. See Small Business Job Protection Act of 1996, Pub.L. No. 104–188, § 6677, 110 Stat. 1755 (increasing penalties under § 6677); Taxpayer Relief Act of 1997, Pub.L. No. 105–34, § 6038, 111 Stat. 788 (increasing penalties under § 6038). Nevertheless, § 6038 still required that Sam and Charles file Forms 5471 in years 1992 through 1995. See, e.g., 26 U.S.C. § 6038(a), (e)(1) (1994). This is because the relevant definitions of control under § 6038(e)(1) and "the rules prescribed by section 318(a) for determining ownership of stock" to which subsection (e)(1) refers—and by which the Court concludes that Sam and Charles were required to file Forms 5471—have not been amended from 1992 to date. See 26 U.S.C. §§ 318(a), 6038(e)(1). Since Sam and Charles did not file any Forms 5471 from 1992 through 1995, the badge of fraud of filing false or misleading documents still exists for these years due to the absence of Forms 5471 during those years. This badge of fraud also exists during 1994 and 1995 as to Sam and Charles for an additional reason. Section 6048(a)(1) required a Form 3520 to be filed upon "the creation of any foreign trust by a United States person." 26 U.S.C. § 6048(a)(1) (1994). Thus, when the Bessie IOM Trust and the Tyler IOM Trust were created in 1994 and the La Fourche IOM Trust and Red Mountain IOM Trust were created in 1995, Sam and Charles should have filed Forms 3520 documenting these events. See Joint Stipulations 28, 48, 81, 88. This means that the badge of fraud of filing false or misleading documents exists in 1994 and 1995 by virtue of the fact that these Forms 3520 were not filed.

651 26 U.S.C. § 6015(b)(1)(A)–(E).

652 The IRS asserts that innocent spouse relief is only available through 2009 because Charles did not sign the 2010 through 2013 tax returns. However, the Court disagrees with the IRS and concludes that the returns for 2010 and 2011 are joint returns notwithstanding the lack of Charles' signature and that Charles died in 2011. See 26 U.S.C. § 6013(a)(2) ("no joint return shall be made if the husband and wife have different taxable years; except that if such taxable years begin on the same day and end on different days because of the death of either or both, then the joint return may be made with respect to the taxable year of each."). Dee's 2010 and 2011 tax returns were filed as joint returns. 737 The Court acknowledges that 26 C.F.R. § 1.6664–4(c) was not in effect for all of the years at issue, and again stresses that it is using this regulation only as a guide when engaging in an analysis of all of the facts and circumstances surrounding Sam's reasonable cause and good faith defense/attempted negation of fraudulent intent. Section 1.6664–4(c)'s explanation of reliance on the advice of a professional was first added to the regulation in 1995, see T.D. 8617, 1995–2 C.B. 274, and underwent some language tweaks in 2003, see T.D. 9109, 2004–1 C.B. 519.

U.S.,* 583 F.3d 471, 481 (7th Cir.2009) ("Relying on a professional, however, will not always get a taxpayer off the hook. To constitute reasonable cause, the reliance must have been reasonable in light of the circumstances."). Of course, in asserting that reasonable cause depends on the quality of the professional advice that is received, the Court does not imply that Sam may not rely on advice merely because it turned out to be wrong. As the Supreme Court has pointed out in U.S. v. Boyle, when a professional advises a taxpayer on a matter of tax law, such as whether a liability exists or whether a return must be filed, it is reasonable for the taxpayer to rely on that advice without seeking a second opinion, even if that advice turns out to be wrong. See Boyle, 469 U.S. at 251, 105 S.Ct. 687; Whitehouse Hotel Ltd. P'ship, 755 F.3d at 249; Stanford v. C.I.R., 152 F.3d 450, 461–62 (5th Cir.1998). She stated that at no time had petitioner discussed any fur trading activities or any other income producing hobby, and that had she been aware of such a hobby she would have included income derived from the activity on petitioner's returns.").

749 In so finding, the Court acknowledges that at least some tax courts have held that while reliance on a promoter cannot establish reasonable cause, it can in some circumstances negate fraudulent intent. See Carreon, 2014 WL 91959, at *7; Alexander v. C.I.R., 106 T.C.M. (CCH) 198, 2013 WL 4606105, at *16 (2013). Nevertheless, the Court finds that Sam's reliance on Tedder's law firm, under the facts and circumstances here, did not negate Sam's fraudulent intent.

750 26 C.F.R. § 1.6664–4(c).

751 Sam received some advice that is not relevant to the issues we will discuss here in detail. For example, Sam received twelve written opinions from Chamberlain, Hrdlicka, White, Williams, & Martin dated October 15, 2003, each one addressing whether each of the twelve annuity transactions that Sam undertook in 1992 and 1996 were listed transactions mandating disclosure under 26 C.F.R. § 1.6011–4(a). The firm concluded that they were not. See Wyly Exs. DM–DX. Similarly, Sam received twelve substantively identical opinion letters from De Castro, West, Chodorow, Glickfeld, & Ness, Inc. dated October 15, 2003 addressing whether each of the twelve private annuity transactions was a "reportable transaction" under 26 U.S.C. § 6011; while worded differently, the same question addressed by the Chamberlain Hrdlicka firm. The De Castro West firm reached the same conclusion that the Chamberlain, Hrdlicka firm reached—the annuity transactions were not subject to disclosure as a reportable transaction. See Wyly Exs. DM–DX. The fact that the private annuity transactions were not a listed transaction is not in dispute among the parties here; thus, these opinions are not relevant to any issue in dispute.

752 In their pre-trial briefing, the Debtors argue that they have established reasonable cause for two reasons: (i) because they relied on the advice of their counsel, and (ii) because there was an honest difference of opinion as to the proper application of the tax law at issue here. The Court analyzes the Debtors' honest difference of opinion argument in the context of the Debtors' reasonable cause defenses to the imposition of International Penalties, and ultimately concludes that the Debtors' honest difference of opinion argument is identical to their reliance on the advice of counsel argument. See pp. 580–83, infra. The observations that the Court makes regarding the interchangeability of these two arguments apply with equal force to all of the Debtors' reasonable cause arguments, in both the International Penalties context and the tax fraud context.

766 Chatzky testified that he worked with Tedder's firm from time to time on particular clients, but that at some point in time they became partners in the same firm. While Chatzky could not be precise as to the timing, they became partners sometime between the April 1992 opinion letters just discussed and the May 19, 1993 opinion letters. Tr. Trans. 1134:12–1136:24 (Chatzky). Moreover, by February 22, 1996, Tedder and Chatzky were no longer law partners because Tedder "had a penchant for making statements to people that were either questionable or flatly untrue...." Id. at 1137:15–17. According to Chatzky, this made him uncomfortable, so the firm dissolved and Chatzky returned to practicing law through his own firm, Chatzky & Associates. Id. at 1138:18–1139:9. After the dissolution of their law firm, Chatzky testified that he no longer worked on common clients with Tedder, id. at 1139:16–20, and has never seen him again, id. at 11411–5.

767 See Wyly Exs. CB (Lake Providence IOM Trust) at SWYLY005378 and CC (Delhi IOM Trust) at SWYLYSEC01100186. The letters are identical and, based on the factual assumptions contained in the letters, the firm opines that "it is more likely than not that the trust will be construed to constitute a valid non-grantor trust for United States taxation purposes provided that the trust operates in accordance with the terms and provisions contained in the Trust Agreement."

768 Tr. Trans. 1170:9–11 (Chatzky).

769 In fact, while Debtors' counsel attempted to refresh Chatzky's recollection using a draft opinion letter dated February 2, 1992, that draft is unsigned and was not offered into evidence. Accordingly, there is no evidence in the record as to whether an opinion regarding the Bulldog IOM Trust was ever finalized, signed and issued to Sam. It goes without saying, therefore, that we have no idea on this record what such an opinion, if ever finalized, signed and issued, would have said.

794 As will be explained later, acting on Sam's behalf, Hennington received advice from Meadows Owens in October 2003 that Sam had a "reportable position" contrary to Lubar's conclusions—both those expressed originally in 1993 and those expressed in mid–2003, after Lubar did further research at Hennington's request, again acting on Sam's behalf. See pp. 491–93, infra.

796 Owens died in July 2003. Thus, he did not testify at trial and the IRS objected to the admission of any testimony from Sam or Evan concerning what Owens had told them on hearsay grounds. That lead to the Debtors' arguments that the purported advice was not being offered for its truth, but rather the impact the receipt of that purported advice had on Sam's state of mind.

797 As the Court stated in ruling on the IRS' objection to the admission of Evan's testimony regarding advice given by Owens to Sam, "[g]iven that it is being stipulated that the evidence is coming in not for the truth of the matter asserted but the impact that the statements, whatever they are, whether accurate or not, had on the state of mind of Sam Wyly and then, I guess as corroboration, Evan Wyly since he was also at the meeting, the Court will admit it for that limited purpose." 800 Of course, the IRS objected on hearsay grounds to Evan attempting to testify as to what Owens actually said at the family meetings. And, the Court was prepared to sustain the objection, which led to the Debtors' argument that the testimony was being offered, not for the truth of the matter asserted but for its impact on Sam's state of mind. As the Court stated in ruling on the IRS' objection to the admission of Evan's testimony, "[g]iven that it is being stipulated that the evidence is coming in not for the truth of the matter asserted but the impact that the statements, whatever they are, whether accurate or not, had on the state of mind of Sam Wyly and then, I guess as corroboration, Evan Wyly since he was also at the meeting, the Court will admit it for that limited purpose." 852 Each entity issuing a private annuity—whether in 1992 or in 1996—received an opinion from Chatzky and Associates dated April 15, 1998 addressing “the impact that Income Tax Regulation Section 1.1001–3 has on the modification of a private annuity agreement issued by you....” See, e.g., Wyly Ex. CS at SWYLY002638. This opinion was apparently requested because Sam amended the annuity agreements to defer the commencement date of his receipt of annuity payments. The upshot of these opinions is that (i) "it is unlikely that the modification of the timing of the private annuity payments will be considered a modification of a 'debt instrument,' " id. at 2643, and (ii) "it is likely that the Private Annuity will not be a debt instrument for purposes of Internal Revenue Code Section 1001, and thus this significant modification of a debt instrument analysis will be inapplicable to the transaction," id. at 2655. 884 French also asked one of his partners at Jackson Walker, Larry Bean ("Bean"), about Tedder's proposed offshore annuity transactions and the tax consequences flowing from them to the Wylys. Bean advised French that Jackson Walker would not give the Wylys an opinion consistent with that the Wylys were to get from Tedder, but that Tedder's proposed scheme

"may work," characterizing it, however, as aggressive. SEC Tr. Trans. 3725:6–3727:6, 3737:43741:12 (French). Three things of significance flow from this: (i) once again, French himself was not competent to analyze the tax consequences, (ii) French's own law firm was unwilling to give the Wylys' a favorable legal opinion upon which they could rely with respect to the 1992 IOM trusts and annuity transactions, and (iii) Sam knew that his primary outside law firm, Jackson Walker, would not give him a legal opinion corroborating the opinion he expected to receive from the promoter of the offshore system—i.e., Tedder's law firm—prior to establishing the 1992 IOM trusts and undertaking the 1992 private annuity transactions.

Although French's testimony in the SEC Action indicates that French reached out to Lubar at least in part to see if Morgan Lewis would represent the Wylys in an audit unrelated to the offshore system, the grantor status of the 1992 trusts was still also clearly on French's mind. A portion of French's testimony in the SEC Action that was admitted as evidence in this proceeding discusses a fax written by Lubar on June 4, 1997, which characterizes French as "concerned" about the 1992 trusts); IRS Ex. 806 (memorandum dated February 16, 1994 from Lubar to French laying out Lubar's advice on the establishment of foreign grantor trusts as to non-US citizens—the advice purportedly followed to establish the Wyly 1994 and 1995 IOM trusts).

G at HST_PSI230998 (financial statement showing FloFlo holding an interest in "Mi Casa Limited" as of December 31, 2001).

1040 As found by the SDNY Court in the SEC Action, to which we have applied collateral estoppel effect here. Collateral Estoppel No. 24.

1041 As reflected in the record: (i) the Cayman LLCs were established June 1, 2001 and were wholly-owned by the Bessie IOM Trust, Joint Stipulations ¶ 36, (ii) the Mi Casa, Spitting Lion, Cottonwood Ventures I and II, and Rosemary Circle R Ranch properties were purchased prior to June 1, 2001, Wyly Exs. BJ, BN, K, L, M, and S and Joint Stipulations ¶ 307, (iii) each IOM Real Estate Company was wholly-owned by the Bessie IOM Trust as of its formation, other than Rosemary Circle R Ranch Limited (IOM), which was owned by the Bessie IOM Trust and Orange as of April 11, 2000, Joint Stipulations ¶¶ 43–47, and (iv) as of June 1, 2001, the IOM Real Estate Companies were owned wholly or partially by the various Cayman LLCs, Joint Stipulations ¶¶ 44–47 (although ¶ 44 states "as of June 1, 2002," that date appears to be in error; the date, however, does affect this Court's ruling). Although the record shows that some percentage of Mi Casa Limited (IOM) was transferred from Bessie IOM Trust to FloFlo in 2001, the record does not disclose exactly when that transfer occurred or what percentage was transferred. See Tr. Trans. 2519:24–2520:13 (Hennington); IRS Ex. 90 (showing allocation of assets); Wyly Ex. G at HST_PSI230998 (financial statement showing FloFlo holding an interest in "Mi Casa Limited" as of December 31, 2001).

1042 The Bessie IOM Trust owned: (i) Spitting Lion Limited (IOM) indirectly (through its ownership of Orange, Pops, FloFlo, and Bubba), (ii) Cottonwood I Limited (IOM) directly in part and indirectly in part (through its ownership of Bubba), (iii) Cottonwood II Limited (IOM) directly in part and indirectly in part (through its ownership of the Cayman LLCs), (iv) Rosemary Circle R Ranch Limited (IOM) directly in part and indirectly in part (through its ownership of the Cayman LLCs), and (v) Mi Casa Limited (IOM) directly in part and/or indirectly in part (as the record is unclear).

1043 IRS Pre–Trial Brief [ECF No. 1018] at 78 ("Additionally, each child had full control of the entities that directly owned the property. The 'debts' were also transferred to the Cayman LLCs which were created for the benefit of children, showing the donative nature of the transactions involving Cottonwood I and II and the Cayman LLCs. * * * The listing of these obligations in the family financials records was not a sign of an actual debt, but rather to show to whom the property was assigned. This is reflected in the transfer of these 'loans' to the Cayman LLCs, which were created for the benefit of the children. Each Cayman LLC would receive the "loans" associated with the assets that they were using i.e. Cottonwood I to Bubba, LLC and Mi Casa to FloFlo, LLC.")

1044 As clearly shown in the record, the interests in the IOM Real Estate Companies transferred to the Cayman LLCs were returned to the Bessie IOM Trust when the Cayman LLCs were liquidated, which is directly contrary to the IRS' allegation that the interests were gifted by Sam to his children.

1045 Joint Stipulations ¶¶ 292–304; Computation Stipulations ¶ 6.

1046 Computation Stipulations ¶ 6. The Court is unsure whether the parties' stipulated figure is inclusive or exclusive of the ownership interests in the IOM Real Estate Companies. That determination is irrelevant, however, since the Court finds that no gift occurred in either instance.

(Nevada)'s sole shareholder is Stargate Farms Limited (IOM)), which (iii) in turn, had total control over the management of Stargate Sport Horses LP (Texas) (see Wyly Ex. X (Agreement of Limited Partnership of Stargate Sport Horses, L.P.) at §§ 6.01 (placing management of the business, including the right to sell assets, with the Managing General Partner), 10.02–10.03 & 1.01 (the Managing General Partner may be removed with the written consent of limited partners holding at least 50% of sharing ratio, as judged by investment capital), Ex. Although the record reflects that the Revocable Trusts are the sole owners of Stargate Investments (Texas), the distributions from Stargate Investments (Texas) were made directly into Charles and Dee's community property account because the CDW Revocable Trust is a grantor trust as to Dee and the CJW Revocable Trust is a grantor trust as to Charles, so the distributions would pass through the Revocable Trusts to Dee and Charles, respectively.

[1129] See Wyly Exs. PA, PC, PD. There are instances where the payments are difficult to track, however. For example, Wyly Ex. PA, on pp. 56–57, indicates that a $2.45 million payment was made on the Unsecured Loan on May 5, 2009; however, a review of the attached bank statement does not reflect this payment from Dee and Charles' account. Nonetheless, according to p. 57, of this $2.45 million, $2.284 million was deposited by Stargate Investments (Texas) back into Dee and Charles' community bank account on May 7, 2008.

[1139] The Court notes that the IRS' Proof of Claim filed against Dee's estate only references fraud penalties under § 6663 (related to filed returns), not § 6651 (failure to file). At closing argument, however, Dee's counsel stated that she would not argue that the IRS had waived its right to allege liability under § 6651. Tr. > A person shall be deemed to be in control of a foreign corporation if at any time during that person's taxable year it owns stock possessing more than 50 percent of the total combined voting power of all classes of stock entitled to vote, or more than 50 percent of the total value of shares of all classes of stock of the foreign corporation. A person in control of a corporation which, in turn, owns more than 50 percent of the combined voting power, or of the value, of all classes of stock of another corporation is also treated as being in control of such other corporation. The provisions of this paragraph may be illustrated by the following example:
> Example. Corporation A owns 51 percent of the voting stock in Corporation B. Corporation B owns 51 percent of the voting stock in Corporation C. Corporation C in turn owns 51 percent of the voting stock in Corporation D. Corporation D is controlled by Corporation A.

IRS Notice 97–34 is the only regulatory authority that purports to directly interpret 26 U.S.C. § 6048, and the IRS draws on it heavily for the purposes of its analysis. This notice is not entitled to deference under Chevron USA, Inc. v. Natural Res. Def. Council, Inc., 467 U.S. 837, 104 S.Ct. 2778, 81 L.Ed.2d 694 (1984). *BMC Software, Inc. v. [1216] 26 C.F.R. § 1.679–4(c) (discussing when certain obligations can be ignored for the purposes of § 679).

[1217] Although, as explained in at pp. 566–67 n. 1237, infra, the Court finds that the IRS is estopped from arguing that the annuity payments were gratuitous transfers based upon its agreements in the Computation Stipulations, the Court will nonetheless consider this argument.

[1222] In support of its argument that the private annuity payments should be treated as gratuitous transfers rather than fair market value exchanges for the purpose of § 6048(c), the IRS also points to language in IRS Notice 97–34 that defines a distribution as "any gratuitous transfer of money or property from a foreign trust." However, the IRS cites no statutory or regulatory authority that indicates that annuity payments can be construed as gratuitous transfers. See IRS Post–Trial Brief [ECF No. 1118] at 37.

1237 For the same reasons, the Court also concludes that the IRS is estopped from arguing that the annuity payments were gratuitous transfers. During closing arguments, the Court asked Debtors' counsel what the consequences would be if the Court found that the annuity transactions were flawed, and specifically whether this would allow the annuity payments to be treated as distributions and what the tax consequences of treating the annuities as flawed would be. Tr. Trans. 3462:17–3466:15 (closing question no. 9). After responding that this question "was a doozy," Debtors' counsel stated that the status of the annuities was not an issue in the case anymore because of the Computation Stipulations. Id. 3462:17–3466:15. When Debtors' counsel asked the IRS' counsel whether he agreed, IRS counsel replied that "... I—to use Your Honor's words, listening check, I—that sounds right based on the comp stip that Mr. Cole and Mr. Lan and I worked on for quite a while. That sounds right, Your Honor." Id. at 3466:12–15. Debtors' counsel then replied "I'm very happy with that answer. I don't have to brief that." Id. at 3466:20–21.

1280 26 U.S.C. § 643(i).

1281 Reprising an argument that it made in the context of the annuity payments, the IRS also argues that the loans should be treated as gratuitous transfers rather than loans under the principles of 26 U.S.C. § 679 and 26 C.F.R. § 1.679–4. This argument was addressed in the context of the annuity transactions, and the analysis is the same here. The statutes and regulations cited by the IRS are not applicable to this situation. See pp. 563–64, supra.

1282 See Wyly Exs. B(Sam), D (Charles), E (Charles), (F) Sam).

1283 Sam's January 2002 loan from Security Capital is factually different from his other loans from Security Capital in one potentially material respect—i.e, Sam was unable to repay the loan at maturity and Security Capital and he agreed to restructure the loan on favorable terms. However, Sam reduced the principal amount outstanding on this loan by $1,500,000 and paid an overdue annual interest payment to Security Capital in order to obtain an extension of the original maturity date to July 14, 2018. From this Court's perspective, this difference does not make the loan a gratuitous transfer.

The Court notes that most of the Fifth Circuit cases that it cites in its discussion of the legal standards related to establishing a reasonable cause defense based on reliance on the advice of counsel are decided in the context of § 6664, which requires a taxpayer to establish both "reasonable cause" and "good faith" in order to escape liability. Here, only "reasonable cause" and lack of "willful neglect" (under § 6677 only) are the relevant standards. The Court notes that these Fifth Circuit cases draw their analysis from U.S. v. Boyle, a Supreme Court case where "reasonable cause" and lack of "willful neglect" were the relevant standards. Thus, the Court views the reasoning of these Fifth Circuit cases as applicable in the context of the reasonable cause defenses that the Debtors are raising to the International Penalties.

And I needed to let these people do what they do, because everybody knew more about anything than I would personally know"), 709:1–20 (Sam testified that he delegated the specifics of the offshore system to French and that "I didn't confer with Michael French on every specific of how he and other lawyers were setting up trusts and doing the legal things that they did."), 722:13–725:2 (Sam, describing the process that went into preparing his tax returns from 1992 through 2013, and testifying that he did not carefully read his 1992 tax return because "I can't say I was competent to read it" and that he signed it because "it was prepared by people that knew what they were doing. [1355] Chatzky said that he believed such an opinion was issued, but no such opinion was admitted into evidence. Tr. Trans. 1170:1–11 (Chatzky). In fact, while Debtors' counsel attempted to refresh Chatzky's recollection using a draft opinion letter dated February 2, 1992, that draft is unsigned and was not offered into evidence. Accordingly, there is no evidence in the record as to whether an opinion regarding the Bulldog IOM Trust was ever finalized, signed and issued to Sam. It goes without saying, therefore, that we have no idea on this record what such an opinion, if ever finalized, signed and issued would have said.

[1357] Chatzky testified that he worked with Tedder's firm from time to time on particular clients, but that at some point in time they became partners in the same firm. While Chatzky could not be precise as to the timing, it was sometime between the April 1992 opinion letters just discussed and the May 19, 1993 opinion letters. Tr. Trans. 1134:121136:24 (Chatzky). Moreover, by February 22, 1996, Tedder and Chatzky were no longer law partners because Tedder "had a penchant for making statements to people that were either questionable or flatly untrue...." Id. at 1137:15–17. According to Chatzky, this made him uncomfortable, so the firm dissolved and Chatzky returned to practicing through his own firm, Chatzky & Associates. Id. at 1138:18–1139:9. After the dissolution of their firm, Chatzky testified that he no longer worked on common clients with Tedder, id. at 1139:16–20, and has never seen him, id. at 11411–5.

U.S.*], 350 U.S. [148] at 153, 76 S.Ct. [219], at 222 [100 L.Ed. 149 (1956)]. Similarly, it would be difficult if not impossible in many cases for a court to determine the precise dollar figure at which a civil sanction has accomplished its remedial purpose of making the Government whole, but beyond which the sanction takes on the quality of punishment. In other words, as we have observed above, the process of affixing a sanction that compensates the Government for all its costs inevitably involves an element of rough justice. Our upholding reasonable liquidated damages clauses reflects this unavoidable imprecision. Similarly, we have recognized that in the ordinary case fixed-penalty-plus-double-damages provisions can be said to do no more than make the Government whole.") [1499] The Debtors cite two district court cases—Callister Nebeker & McCullough v. U.S. and Crawford v. U.S. Dept. of the Treasury —that do not decide whether tax penalties under 26 U.S.C. § 6708 and 31 U.S.C. § 5314 are excessive due to lack of a sufficient factual record and neglect to discuss whether they are fines. Callister Nebeker & McCullough v. U.S., 2015 WL 5918494 (D.Utah Oct. 9, 2015); Crawford v. U.S. Dept. of the Treasury, 2015 WL 5697552, at *4 (S.D.Ohio Sept. 29, 2015). The Debtors also cite a case in which a district court judge lowered the criminal contempt fine imposed by a bankruptcy judge from $10,000 to $3,000. In re Swaffar, 253 B.R. 441, 451 (Bankr.E.D.Ark.2000). As the Eleventh Circuit has noted, the concerns at play when evaluating a judicially imposed fine are very different than those that are at play when evaluating a legislatively imposed fine.). U.S. v. 817 N.E. 29th Drive, Wilton Manors, Fla., 175 F.3d 1304, 1309 (11th Cir.1999).

The Debtors correctly point out that this report of the Joint Committee on Taxation is not true legislative history, as it was prepared after the passage of the Small Business Job Protection Act of 1996. See Estate of Wallace v. C.I.R., 965 F.2d 1038, 1050 n. 15 (11th Cir.1992) ("We cite the General Explanation not as an expression of legislative intent, as it was prepared by committee staff after enactment of the statute, but as a valuable aid to understanding the statute. We accord it no weight as binding authority on legislative intent."). However, the Fifth Circuit has noted in a tax context that the views of such Joint Committee Reports "are entitled to great respect." *McDonald v. Hence it does not directly represent the views of the legislators or an explanation available to them when acting on the bill. The Joint Committee's views, however, are entitled to great respect."). The Court also notes that while the statutory penalty amounts under 26 U.S.C. § 6038 were not increased until 1997, the 1996 General Explanation explicitly names § 6038 as one of the subsections that is being changed because of concerns regarding noncompliance with laws related to foreign trusts. See Taxpayer Relief Act of 1997, Pub.L. However, the Debtors' argument ignores the fact that Austin and Bajakajian were decided in the context of forfeitures, sanctions that are not just different in degree but different in kind from the International Penalties. The Debtors also fail to reconcile their approach with the Fifth Circuit's pronouncements in Wallace and Newell Recycling.

1548 This analysis is different for violations of § 6038. Although income from controlled foreign corporations is taxable to the controlled foreign corporation's owner under 26 U.S.C. § 951, violations of § 6038 result in a flat fine of $10,000 per violation. Although in certain cases this could make penalties under § 6038 more disproportional than penalties under § 6677, the Court notes that this is certainly not the case here. The minimum penalty under § 6677 is $10,000 per violation, and percentage-based penalties apply here because of the extent of the Wyly wealth that was placed offshore and that Debtors did not report on Form 3520–A. See 26 U.S.C. § 6677. Less than 5% of Sam's or Dee's liability for International Penalties is for violations of § 6038. See Computation Stipulations ¶¶ 9.A through, 10, 22.a through 23.

IRS Post–Trial Reply Brief [ECF No. 1120] at 71. The Debtors also note in their post-trial reply that their estimate could be revised to be even lower "when the stipulated income figures are worked through the 'tax return' software of the IRS for the appropriate years, after the Court renders its decision. Debtors' Post–Trial Reply Brief [ECF No. 1121] at 81 n.219. 1597 26 U.S.C. § 6501. It is unclear whether § 6501 applies to the IRS' claims for penalties. Although § 6501 is a limitation on the time period for assessment of "taxes" and not "penalties," 26 U.S.C. § 6665(a)(2) states that "[a]ny reference in this title to 'tax' imposed by this title shall be deemed also to refer to the additions to the tax, additional amounts, and the penalties provided by this chapter." 26 U.S.C. § 6663 is a part of the chapter to which § 6665 refers, and could thus be encompassed by the language of § 6501 referring to "taxes." Despite this reading, under Sage, it is arguable that there is no statute of limitations for collection of fraud penalties, as no statute of limitations appears on the face of § 6663 and the Sage court refused to apply language similar to § 6665 in order to expand the § 6501 statute of limitations. Sage, 908 F.2d at 25. However, it must be remembered that the Sage court reached this conclusion and allowed the IRS to assert penalties in part because of the Supreme Court's mandate that "[s]tatutes of limitations must receive a strict construction in favor of the government." Id. at 24 (citing Badaracco v. C.I.R., 464 U.S. 386, 104 S.Ct. 756, 78 L.Ed.2d 549 (1984)). Another issue is that even if § 6501 does create a statute of limitations applicable to the assessment of fraud penalties, these penalties may be sought "at any time" under the terms of § 6501(c)(1). An effectively unlimited statute of limitations may be subject to the same analysis as a lack of a statute of limitations where laches is concerned. Finally, no statute of limitations appears on the face of those statutes that impose the International Penalties. See 26 U.S.C. §§ 6038, 6048, 6677. But see 26 U.S.C. § 6501(c)(8)("(A) In general.—In the case of any information which is required to be reported to the Secretary pursuant to an election under section 1295(b) or under section 1298(f), 6038, 6038A, 6038B, 6038D, 6046, 6046A, or 6048, the time for assessment of any tax imposed by this title with respect to any tax return, event, or period to which such information relates shall not expire before the date which is 3 years after the date on which the Secretary is furnished the information required to be reported under such section. (B) Application to failures due to reasonable cause.—If the failure to furnish the information referred to in subparagraph (A) is due to reasonable cause and not willful neglect, subparagraph (A) shall apply only to the item or items related to such failure."). Regardless of whether § 6501 does or does not apply to certain of the IRS' claims, the Court still concludes that laches does not bar any of the IRS' claims because laches may not be invoked in order to prevent the collection of taxes and because the elements of laches have not been satisfied.

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Baylson, District Judge

1 Plaintiff Arthur Bedrosian initiated this case in order to obtain a refund of the $9,757.89 that he has paid to Defendant, the United States, for his allegedly "willful" violation of an Internal Revenue Service ("IRS") reporting requirement. The government counterclaimed for the full amount of the penalty, arguing that it was owed $1,007,345.48. After denying summary judgment for both parties, the undersigned presided over a one day bench trial at which Bedrosian defended his actions and the government attempted to frame them as satisfying the requisite "willful" standard. Both parties then filed post-trial briefs in which they proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law, and responded to two questions posed by the Court: (1) does any precedent exist for finding willfulness based on conduct similar to that of Bedrosian, and (2) did the government sustain its burden of proof regarding the calculation of the penalty amount. (ECF 62, 63.) Having considered the trial record and the post-trial briefing, we outline here our findings of fact and conclusions of law.

I. Findings of Fact

Bedrosian is a successful businessman who has spent his career in the pharmaceutical industry, rising in the ranks to the position he now holds—Chief Executive Officer at Lannett Company, Inc., a manufacturer and distributor of generic medications. (ECF 60, Trial Tr. at 26, 79-80.) In the early 1970s, when he was just getting started in the industry, Bedrosian held a position with Zenith Labs that required a significant amount of international travel. (Id. at 27.) Rather than rely solely on traveler's checks to make purchases abroad, in or about 1973 he decided to open a savings account with Swiss Credit Corporation in Switzerland. (Id. at 28-31.) At some point, Union Bank of Switzerland ("UBS") acquired Swiss Credit Corporation and Bedrosian's account was switched to UBS. (Id. at 31.) Bedrosian initially used the account in order to have access to funds while traveling abroad but, as the years went on, he began to use it more as a savings account. (Id. at 30-31.) He did not take a particularly active role in managing the account, but was kept abreast of its activities via certain information UBS would mail him and through annual meetings he would have with a UBS representative. (Id. at 40-41.) In 2005, UBS approached Bedrosian with a loan proposal that he accepted whereby it would lend him 750,000 Swiss Francs and convert his savings account into an investment account. (Id. at 42-43; Pl.'s Ex. 6.) That transaction resulted in a second account being created for Bedrosian at UBS, although he claims that he always considered them one account. (Trial Tr. at 57-58.) In 2008, UBS informed him that he had sixty days within which to repay the loan, close his accounts, and transfer all assets therein to another bank. (Id. at 44-45.) Bedrosian moved the funds to a different Swiss bank called Hyposwiss. (Id. at 44.)

Throughout this thirty five year period, from 1972 until 2007, Bedrosian used the services of an accountant named Seymour Handelman to prepare his income tax returns. (Id. at 47.) Bedrosian did not tell Handelman about his Swiss account until some point in the mid-1990s, at which time Handelman advised him that he had been breaking the law every year that he did not report the account on his tax return. (Id. at 49-50.) Bedrosian asked Handleman what he recommended doing about it, and Handelman stated that he could not "unbreak the law," and should therefore take no action. (Id. at 50-51.)

Handelman assured Bedrosian that his estate could deal with it upon his death, when his money was repatriated. Heeding Handleman's advice, Bedrosian continued to not report either Swiss account on his tax returns.

2 In 2007, Handelman died and Bedrosian began working with a new accountant, Sheldon Bransky. (Id. at 52-53.) The return that Bransky filed for Bedrosian in 2008, for tax year 2007, included, for the first time, an affirmative answer to the question asking whether "[a]t any time during 2007, [he had] an interest in or signature or other authority over a financial account in a foreign country." (Id. at 53-54; P9.) Switzerland is listed as the country in which the account was located. (Pl.'s Ex. 9.) Bedrosian also filed a Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts ("FBAR") for the first time in which he reported the existence of one of his two UBS accounts. (Govt. Ex. L.) The FBAR only listed his UBS account ending in 5316, which had assets totaling approximately $240,000, and did not report the account ending in 6167, which had assets totaling approximately $2 million. (Trial Tr. at 19, 56-67.) The 2007 FBAR was signed on October 14, 2008. (Pl.'s Ex. 10.) Bedrosian testified that he has no recollection of discussing the Swiss accounts with Bransky and that he is not sure how Bransky knew to check the "yes" box or file the FBAR. (Trial Tr. at 54-55.) Rather, Bedrosian stated that he simply gave Bransky the same materials that he gave Handleman year after year—a compilation of all the tax-related documents he received over the course of the year—and then signed the return that Bransky prepared. (Id.)

Around this time, following Handelman's death, Bedrosian became more aware of the seriousness of reporting foreign bank accounts and less comfortable with continuing the non-reporting practice Handelman had condoned. (Id. at 60-61.) He went to his personal lawyer, Steven Davis, in late 2008 and told him the history of what had happened with the UBS account and Handelman's advice. (Id. at 61-63.) Notably, at the time Bedrosian took these steps to rectify the issue, the government had not begun its investigation of him and he did not know that UBS had turned his information over to the IRS. (Id. at 64-65.) Davis brought a tax attorney colleague, Paul Ambrose, into the discussion and Ambrose advised Bedrosian to engage an accounting firm to go back and amend his returns from 2004 to the present. (Id. at 62.) From that point forward, Bedrosian heeded the advice of counsel, amended his returns, and paid taxes on the gains from his Swiss accounts. (Id. at 67-68.) The IRS alerted him in April 2011 that it would be auditing his returns, and thus began the process that culminated in this lawsuit. (Id. at 73.) Bedrosian was cooperative and forthcoming in his dealings with the IRS agents charged with investigating him. (Id. at 73-76.)

Much of the testimony at trial concerned whether Bedrosian knew that he had two accounts at UBS or was under the impression that he just had one. It is undisputed that he elected to stop receiving written communication from UBS regarding his accounts in 1993 and again in 2004 and that he got most, if not all, information about the accounts from an annual meeting that he had with a UBS representative in New York. (Govt. Ex. F.) It is also clear that he closed each account via separate letter to UBS, one dated November 5, 2008 and the other dated December 2, 2008. (Govt. Exs. J, K.) Having established the factual record, we turn to the legal implications of Bedrosian's conduct.

II. Conclusions of Law

In our memoranda on summary judgment and on the government's motion in limine to exclude evidence from the IRS investigation, we summarized the legal framework governing the key question of whether Bedrosian's violation of Section 5314 was "willful". See Bedrosian v. United States, No. 15-5853, 2017 WL 1361535 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 13, 2017); Bedrosian v. United States, No. 15-5853, 2017 WL 3887520 (E.D. Pa. Sept. 5, 2017). We reiterate, and expand on, that discussion for the parties and future litigants on the issue.

A. Standard of Review

Although the Third Circuit has not yet ruled on what standard of review applies to a determination of the validity of an IRS penalty under 31 U.S.C. § 5321, those courts that have considered the question have found the correct standard to be de novo. See United States v. Williams, No. 09-437, 2010 WL 3473311, at *1 (E.D. Va. Sept. 1, 2010), rev'd on other grounds, United States v. Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. 655 (4th Cir. 2012) (looking to enforcement actions brought by the government in other contexts which require a de novo review, as well as the fact that Section 5321 provides for no adjudicatory hearing before an FBAR penalty is assessed, to conclude that de novo review is appropriate); United States v. McBride, 908 F. Supp. 2d 1186, 1201 (D. Utah 2012) (applying de novo standard to whether underlying penalty was valid).

B. Burden of Proof

3 The government bears the burden of proving each element of its claim for a civil FBAR penalty by a preponderance of the evidence, including the key question here of whether an individual's failure to report was "willful." Williams, 2010 WL 3473311, at *1; McBride, 908 F. Supp. 2d at 1201-02 (explaining that "[a]s with [g]overnment penalty enforcement and collection cases generally, absent a statute that prescribes the burden of proof, imposition of a higher burden of proof is warranted only where 'particularly important individual interests or rights,' are at stake") (quoting Herman & MacLean v. Huddleston, 459 U.S. 375, 389 (1983)); United States v. Bohanec, No. 15-4347, ––– F. Supp. 3d. ––––, 2016 WL 7167860, at *6 (C.D. Cal. Dec. 8, 2016) (holding that because "[t]he monetary sanctions at issue [in an FBAR civil penalty action] do not rise to the level of 'particularly important individual interest or rights,' ... the preponderance of the evidence standard applies").

C. Analysis

i. Willfulness

Congress passed the Bank Secrecy Act ("BSA" or "Act") in 1970 in order to target the problem of the "unavailability of foreign and domestic bank records of customers thought to be engaged in activities entailing criminal or civil liability." California Bankers Ass'n v. Schultz, 416 U.S. 21, 26 (1974). The Act was intended to "require the maintenance of records, and the making of certain reports, which 'have a high degree of usefulness in criminal, tax, or regulatory investigations or proceedings.' " Id. (quoting 31 U.S.C. § 5311). To that end, it granted the Secretary of the Treasury authorization to promulgate regulations prescribing certain recordkeeping and reporting requirements for domestic banks as well as individuals. Id. One such reporting requirement is the FBAR, which arises out of the mandate of Section 5314(a) and its corresponding regulations that all United States citizens must report on an annual basis to the IRS any "financial interest in, or signature or other authority over, a bank, securities, or other financial account in a foreign country." 31 C.F.R. § 1010.350(a); 31 U.S.C. § 5314(a). Failure to timely file an FBAR for each foreign financial account in which a taxpayer has an interest of over $10,000 results in exposure to a civil money penalty that varies depending on the taxpayer's level of culpability. 31 C.F.R. § 1010.306(c); 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5). Specifically, non-willful violations of the FBAR reporting requirement result in a penalty not to exceed $10,000, whereas willful violations can lead to a penalty that is the greater of $100,000 or fifty percent of the balance in the account at the time of the violation. 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(B)(i), (a)(5)(C). A "reasonable cause" exception exists for non-willful violations, but not for willful ones. 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(C)(ii).

The parties have never disputed that Bedrosian meets all requirements of the relevant reporting laws—he is a U.S. citizen with a financial interest in a bank account in a foreign country that contained more than $10,000 during 2007. Where they disagree, and the only issue explored at trial, is whether Bedrosian's failure to file his 2007 FBAR was done with the requisite "willful" mental state. We discussed in our summary judgment memorandum that the precise definition of that term as used in Section 5321, the civil penalty provision, has not been clearly established by statute or precedent. But, we also noted that every federal court to have considered the issue has found the correct standard to be the one used in other civil contexts— that is, a defendant has willfully violated Section 5314 when he either knowingly or recklessly fails to file an FBAR. See, e.g., Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. at 658; Bohanec, 2016 WL 7167860, at *5; McBride, 908 F. Supp. 2d at 1204. That definition contrasts with the one proposed by Bedrosian, which is that in order for the government to sustain a willful FBAR penalty, it must meet the standard used in the criminal context and show that his actions amounted to a voluntary, intentional violation of a known legal duty. See Cheek v. United States, 498 U.S. 192, 201 (1991). Although on summary judgment we declined to hold what the appropriate standard of willfulness was, we indicated that the civil standard stood on far stronger precedential footing. Consistent with those dicta, we now hold that Section 5321's requisite willful intent is satisfied by a finding that the defendant knowingly or recklessly violated the statute. The government need not prove improper motive or bad purpose.

4 To further elucidate the definition of “willfulness” in this context, we note that acting with “willful blindness” to the obvious or known consequences of one's actions will satisfy the standard. See McBride, 908 F. Supp. 2d at 1205 (citing Global-Tech Appliances, Inc. v. SEB S.A., ––– U.S. ––––, 131 S.Ct. 2060, 2068-69 (2011)). Willful blindness is established when an individual “takes deliberate actions to avoid confirming a high probability of wrongdoing and [when he] can almost be said to have actually known the critical facts.” Global-Tech Appliances, Inc., 131 S.Ct. at 2070-71. In the tax reporting context, the government can show willful blindness by evidence that the taxpayer made a “conscious effort to avoid learning about reporting requirements.” Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. at 659-60.

In order for an individual to act “willfully” in a situation “involving a requirement to report or disclose certain information to the IRS,” he must engage in “conduct which is voluntary, rather than accidental or unconscious.” McBride, 908 F. Supp. 2d at 1205; see Brounstein v. United States, 979 F.2d 952, 955-56 (3d Cir. 1992) (in case involving willful failure to pay taxes, holding that “willfulness is ‘a voluntary, conscious and intentional decision to prefer other creditors over the Government’ ”). Further, reckless disregard satisfies the willfulness standard. McBride, 908 F. Supp. 2d at 1204. “While ‘the term recklessness is not self-defining,’ the common law has generally understood it in the sphere of civil liability as conduct violating an objective standard: action entailing ‘an unjustifiably high risk of harm that is either known or so obvious that it should be known.’ ” Safeco Ins. Co. of Am. v. Burr, 551 U.S. 47, 68 (2007) (quoting Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 836 (1994)). Finally, in terms of the type of evidence capable of establishing willfulness, the government can meet its burden “through inference from conduct meant to conceal or mislead sources of income or other financial information,” and may use “circumstantial evidence and reasonable inferences drawn from the facts because direct proof of the taxpayer's intent is rarely available.” McBride, 908 F. Supp. 2d at 1205 (quoting United States v. Sturman, 951 F.2d 1466, 1476-77 (6th Cir. 1991)).

At trial and in his trial brief Bedrosian acknowledged that we were likely to conclude that the civil standard of willfulness applied, and he focused his advocacy on the argument that his actions were far less egregious than those of defendants found liable in other cases for willfully violating the FBAR requirement. He summarized the facts of three cases in which the willful penalty was imposed and compared them to his own conduct, contending that the record did not support a finding that he had acted with the requisite intent. The government countered with evidence intended to show that Bedrosian was well aware that his 2007 FBAR was inadequate, such as his business acumen, the fact that Handelman had told him in the mid-1990s that his failure to report his Swiss accounts was illegal, and various indicia that he knew that he had two accounts at UBS rather than just the one that he reported. The government additionally argued that even if it was true that Bedrosian did not know he had two accounts at the time he filed his 2007 FBAR, he easily could have gotten that information by reaching out to UBS.

We start from the premise that the question of “[w]hether a person has willfully failed to comply with a tax reporting requirement is a question of fact.” Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. at 658; see United States v. House, 524 F.2d 1035, 1045 (3d Cir. 1975) (“The question of willfulness is uniquely for the trier of fact.”). Indeed, the Third Circuit has held that determinations of willfulness depend on consideration of the defendant's “state of mind, knowledge, intent and belief regarding the propriety of their actions.” E.E.O.C. v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 725 F.2d 211, 218 (3d Cir. 1983). Therefore, it is not enough to simply read the black letter definition of the term—knowing or reckless violation of a statutory duty—in a vacuum; rather, disposition of this case requires a fact-and context-specific inquiry into Bedrosian's actions.

5 Here, the narrative developed at trial, largely via the credible testimony of Bedrosian, is that of an educated and highly financially literate businessman who took a calculated risk for several years by not complying with his tax reporting obligations. He admitted as much—that Handelman told him he had been breaking the law every year he did not report his Swiss accounts, and that he nevertheless continued to fail to report them, relying on Handelman's questionable advice. Nevertheless, Bedrosian is not before this Court for any of those violations of the tax law; rather, he is here solely for the determination of whether his failure to file an accurate FBAR for tax year 2007 was willful. After a careful review of the record, the trial transcript, and the parties' post-trial briefing, we cannot conclude, based on a comparison of the facts of this case compared with those of cases in which a willful FBAR penalty was imposed, that the government has proved, by a preponderance of the evidence, that Bedrosian's violation of Section 5314 was willful.

As stated above, this inquiry requires a probing of the factual circumstances of this case to determine whether Bedrosian had the requisite mental state. Having done so, it is simply not sufficiently clear from the record developed that he was willful in submitting his inaccurate 2007 FBAR. Rather, his actions were at most negligent, which does not satisfy the willfulness standard. There is no question that Bedrosian could have easily discovered that what had previously been one UBS account was now two, via the statements he occasionally received from the bank and the meetings he had annually with a UBS representative. In addition, the fact that he signed his 2007 FBAR two weeks prior to sending two separate letters to UBS to close his accounts sways in favor of an inference that he was aware of the existence of the second account at the time he filed the FBAR. Nevertheless, as discussed below, even if he did know that he had a second account yet failed to disclose it on the FBAR, there is no indication that he did so with the requisite voluntary or intentional state of mind; rather, all evidence points to an unintentional oversight or a negligent act.

The government contends that we should not concern ourselves with "whether [Bedrosian's] conduct was as egregious as the few other cases that have been litigated involving the FBAR penalty," and that we should instead take a broader view including other civil cases where willfulness was at issue. (ECF 63, Govt. Post-Trial Brief at 6.) We agree that willfulness findings in the larger civil context may be useful comparators, but consider the other FBAR penalty cases as the most on point precedent. To that end, perhaps most important to this decision are the crucial differences between this case and those in which a civil FBAR penalty has been sustained. In Williams, for example, the defendant deposited over $7 million into two Swiss bank accounts and failed to report the income from those accounts to the IRS from 1993 to 2000. Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. at 656. In the fall of 2000, government authorities became aware of the accounts, the defendant retained counsel, and Swiss authorities froze both accounts. Even after facing significant government scrutiny regarding his compliance with federal reporting requirements, the defendant nevertheless filed an FBAR for tax year 2000 in which he did not disclose his interest in either Swiss account. The defendant also allocuted, in connection with a simultaneous criminal investigation, to having unlawfully failed to report the existence of the Swiss accounts on his 2000 FBAR. On these facts, the Fourth Circuit overturned the district court's finding that the defendant's violation of Section 5314 had not been willful, reasoning that the above-recited facts at least established reckless conduct. Id. at 660.

The defendant's actions in Williams stand in contrast to Bedrosian's in 2007 and 2008. Crucially, in Williams the defendant "acknowledged that he willfully failed to report the existence of the [Swiss] accounts to the IRS or Department of the Treasury as part of his larger scheme of tax evasion," via his guilty plea allocution. Id. Here, there obviously has been no such acknowledgement. In addition, where the defendant in Williams submitted the inaccurate FBAR at issue after he was already the target of a government investigation regarding his noncompliance with federal tax law, showing a continued interest in misleading the authorities, Bedrosian was fully cooperative and honest with the IRS from the moment it began investigating him.

6 Another of the few cases to have considered this issue is McBride, in which the defendant, cognizant of an imminent sizable increase in his company's revenue, "sought a way to reduce or defer the income taxes that would normally be paid on [the] revenue," and hired a financial management firm to help him do so. McBride, 908 F. Supp. 2d at 1189. The firm proposed a plan, which the defendant accepted, to move profits of his company to offshore entities, thereby resulting in approximately $2.7 million in otherwise taxable profits of the company to be routed directly to the defendant. Importantly, when faced with the IRS' investigation, the defendant repeatedly lied and refused to produce requested documents. Id. at 1200. Again, the willful finding in McBride is hard to map onto the instant facts, which are significantly less egregious and show nothing close to the carefully planned and complex tax evasion scheme perpetrated by the defendant in that case.

United States v. Bussell, No. 15-2034, 2015 WL 9957826 (C.D. Cal. Dec. 8, 2015), a case not briefed by the parties but one in which the court granted summary judgment for the government on an individual's willful violation of the FBAR requirement, is similarly distinguishable from this case. In Bussell, the court found that the defendant had "clearly acted with reckless disregard [of the statutory duty]" because she had been convicted of bankruptcy fraud and tax fraud for failing to disclosing offshore accounts, was subjected to civil penalties for her failures to disclose the accounts, was aware of the duty to report them on her FBAR and nevertheless did not. Id. at *5. Again, here there is nothing close to that level of evidence showing Bedrosian's willful violation of the FBAR requirement.

The government urges us to consider other civil cases, outside of the FBAR context, in which there were findings of willfulness. It cites to Greenberg v. United States, 46 F.3d 239 (3d Cir. 1994), in which the court considered whether an individual had willfully failed to pay certain employer withholding taxes, which determination depended on the individual's knowledge that his company had not paid the taxes at the time he disbursed company funds to employees and other creditors. Id. at 244. The defendant was indisputably aware that the company was delinquent in remitting withholding taxes when he decided that he "must pay more urgent bills right away in order to keep the business going and would pay the taxes later." Id. at 241. In contrast, here, Bedrosian's knowledge that his 2007 FBAR was inaccurate is far less clear—he undoubtedly did not give the form the requisite attention, but it is not apparent that he submitted it knowing that it omitted the second UBS account. The government's evidence going to that point relies on inferential leaps on which we are unwilling to hang a finding that Bedrosian was willful. Furthermore, while the court's analysis of willfulness in the context of Section 6672 of the Internal Revenue Code is surely relevant to the instant determination, as it arises in the civil tax penalty context, we find the specific FBAR penalty cases more persuasive because they deal with the same unique reporting requirement at issue here.

In summary, the only evidence supporting a finding that Bedrosian willfully violated Section 5314 is: (1) the inaccurate form itself, lacking reference to the account ending in 6167, (2) the fact that he may have learned of the existence of the second account at one of his meetings with a UBS representative, which is supported by his having sent two separate letters closing the accounts, (3) Bedrosian's sophistication as a businessman, and (4) Handelman's having told Bedrosian in the mid-1990s that he was breaking the law by not reporting the UBS accounts. None of these indicate "conduct meant to conceal or mislead" or a "conscious effort to avoid learning about reporting requirements," even if they may show negligence. Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. at 658.

7 It is obvious that Bedrosian should have handled the situation differently and, in 2007-2008, should have been more careful about reviewing the 2007 FBAR and in being aware of the fact that he had not one but two accounts at UBS. Nevertheless, the facts show that he did check the box indicating he had a foreign account on his 2007 tax return, he did identify Switzerland as the country in which the account as located, and he did file an FBAR for 2007 stating he had assets in a foreign account. His error was in failing to list the second account. Furthermore, he approached his personal lawyer and retained an accounting firm to file amended returns and rectify the issue prior to learning that the government was investigating him and prior to learning that UBS was turning his information over to the IRS. Although we apply the lower, civil standard of willfulness here, we nevertheless do not see Bedrosian's as the sort of conduct intended by Congress or the IRS to constitute a willful violation. This is especially so in light of the dearth of precedent finding a willful violation on comparable facts. Because we find that the government failed to meet its burden as to the willfulness requirement, we decline to engage in an analysis concerning the calculation of the penalty amount.

ii. Illegal Exaction

Having concluded that the government has not established that Bedrosian was "willful" in his violation of Section 5314, we must determine whether Bedrosian has made out a claim for illegal exaction. An illegal exaction claim "involves money that was 'improperly paid, exacted, or taken from the claimant in contravention of the Constitution, a statute, or a regulation.' " Norman v. United States, 429 F.3d 1081, 1095 (Fed. Cir. 2005) (quoting Eastport S.S. Corp. v. United States, 178 Ct. Cl. 599, 605 (1967)). Where a taxpayer is able to establish that he paid taxes that were improperly collected by the government, he succeeds on such a claim. Id. Here, we found that the government failed to meet its burden to show that Bedrosian willfully violated Section 5314; therefore, we conclude that any money penalty exacted from Bedrosian under Section 5321(a)(5)(C), which permits the Secretary of the Treasury to, "[i]n the case of any person willfully violating, or willfully causing any violation of, any provision of section 5314," impose a penalty in the amount of the greater of $100,000 or 50% of the balance in the non-reported account, was illegally exacted. See 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(C), (D); Kipple v. United States, 102 Fed. Cl. 773, 777 (2012) (holding that "a necessary implication of 31 U.S.C. § 3720(A) [pertaining to the amount by which a person's tax refund may be reduced where that person owes a debt to a federal agency] is that an illegal exaction would arise if there was no legally enforceable debt"). The remedy must be a return of the money Bedrosian has paid. See Kipple, 102 Fed. Cl. at 777.

III. Conclusion

For the reasons explained above, the government has not met its burden to establish that Bedrosian willfully violated Section 5314. Consequently, the amount that Bedrosian paid in partial satisfaction of his allegedly willful violation of that section—$9,757.89—was illegally exacted from him and the Government owes him that sum.

Synopsis
Background: United States brought action against gambler to recover penalty imposed for failure to file foreign bank and financial accounts report (FBAR). The United States District Court for the Northern District of California, William Alsup, J., entered summary judgment in United States' favor, and gambler appealed.

Holdings: The Court of Appeals held that:

[1] money transmitter that acted as intermediary between gambler's bank account and online poker sites was “financial institution,” but

[2] gambler's accounts with online poker cardrooms did not fall within definition of “bank, securities, or other financial account.”

Affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded.

MEMORANDUM **

Defendant–Appellant John C. Hom appeals the district court’s grant of summary judgment in favor of the Government in this tax case. It is undisputed that Hom failed to file a tax form known as the Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts Report (“FBAR”) (Treasury Form TD F 90–22.1) for three accounts he held in 2006, and one account he held in 2007. Hom was assessed a total penalty of $40,000 ($10,000 per violation). When Hom failed to pay, the Government filed this lawsuit against Hom. The district court granted summary judgment against Hom, and Hom appealed.

The issue before us is whether Hom’s accounts with FirePay, PokerStars, and PartyPoker required the filing of FBAR forms under 31 U.S.C § 5314, which provides that the Secretary of the Treasury “shall require” U.S. persons to “keep records and file reports ... [when those persons] make[ ] a transaction or maintain[ ] a relation for any person with a foreign financial agency.” Under the regulation in effect at the time, the key questions are whether Hom’s accounts were “bank, securities, or other financial account[s]” and whether those accounts were “in a foreign country.” See 31 C.F.R. § 103.24 (2006). If both questions are answered in the affirmative, the accounts required the filing of FBAR forms.

“[F]inancial agency” is defined in 31 U.S.C § 5312(a)(1) as “a person acting for a person ... as a financial institution.” “[F]inancial institution” is in turn defined 654 to include a number of specific types of businesses, including “a commercial bank,” “a private banker,” and “a licensed sender of money or any other person who engages as a business in the transmission of funds." 31 U.S.C. § 5312(a)(2).

[1] Hom's FirePay account fits within the definition of a financial institution for purposes of FBAR filing requirements because FirePay is a money transmitter. See 31 U.S.C. § 5312(a)(2)(R); 31 C.F.R. § 103.11(uu)(5) (2006). FirePay acted as an intermediary between Hom's Wells Fargo account and the online poker sites. Hom could carry a balance in his FirePay account, and he could transfer his FirePay funds to either his Wells Fargo account or his online poker accounts. It also appears that FirePay charged fees to transfer funds. As such, FirePay acted as "a licensed sender of money or any other person who engages as a business in the transmission of funds" under 31 U.S.C. § 5312(a)(2)(R) and therefore qualifies as a "financial institution." See 31 C.F.R. § 103.11(uu)(5) (2006). Hom's FirePay account is also "in a foreign country" because FirePay is located in and regulated by the United Kingdom. See IRS, FBAR Reference Guide, https://www.irs.gov/pub/irs-utl/irsfbarreferenceguide.pdf (last visited July 19, 2016) ("Typically, a financial account that is maintained with a financial institution located outside of the United States is a foreign financial account.").

[2] In contrast, Hom's PokerStars and PartyPoker accounts do not fall within the definition of a "bank, securities, or other financial account." PartyPoker and PokerStars primarily facilitate online gambling. Hom could carry a balance on his PokerStars account, and indeed he needed a certain balance in order to "sit" down to a poker game. But the funds were used to play poker and there is no evidence that PokerStars served any other financial purpose for Hom. Hom's PartyPoker account functioned in essentially same manner.

The Government argues that these entities were functioning as banks,[1] but this argument lacks support. Neither the statute nor the regulations define banking. In discerning the plain meaning of the text, we interpret words in light of their "ordinary, contemporary, common meaning" unless they are otherwise defined. Perrin v. United States, 444 U.S. 37, 42, 100 S.Ct. 311, 62 L.Ed.2d 199 (1979). Merriam–Webster dictionary defines bank as, "an establishment for the custody, loan, exchange, or issue of money, for the extension of credit, and for facilitating the transmission of funds." Merriam–Webster Dictionary, Bank, http://www.merriamwebster.com/dictionary/bank (last visited July 19, 2016).[2] There is no evidence that PartyPoker 655 and PokerStars were established for any of those purposes, rather than merely for the purpose of facilitating poker playing.[3]

For the foregoing reasons, we REVERSE in part, AFFIRM in part, and remand.

Each party shall bear its own costs on appeal.

 This disposition is not appropriate for publication and is not precedent except as provided by Ninth Circuit Rule 36–3.

[1] The Government's belated attempt to argue that PokerStars and PartyPoker are "casinos" and thus qualify as financial institutions, is too little, too late. Not only did the Government not raise this argument below, it explicitly disclaimed reliance on that theory. We decline to address this argument raised for the first time on appeal because "[o]ur discretion to affirm on grounds other than those relied on by the district court extends to issues raised in a manner providing the district court an opportunity to rule on it." Mansourian v. Regents of Univ. of Cal., 602 F.3d 957, 974 (9th Cir. 2010).

[2] The next two definitions in Merriam-Webster for "bank" do relate specifically to gambling establishments. See Merriam–Webster, Bank ("2: a person conducting a gambling house or game; specifically: dealer [and] 3: a supply of something held in reserve: as [ ] the fund of supplies (as money, chips, or pieces) held by the banker or dealer for use in a game."). The Government, however, did not advance the argument that these latter definitions of "bank" were what Congress intended, nor would that argument have been particularly persuasive given that Congress separately lists banks and casinos in the definition of financial institution. See 31 U.S.C. § 5312(a)(2)(X).

[3] The Fourth Circuit's decision in United States v. Clines, 958 F.2d 578, 579 (4th Cir. 1992), is not to the contrary. There, the court, in upholding a defendant's conviction for failing to file FBARs, explained, "By holding funds for third parties and disbursing them at their direction, [the entity at issue] functioned as a bank." Id. at 582. The Government seizes upon that single sentence to argue that holding funds alone is sufficient to qualify an entity as a bank, but this reading fails to consider that the entity at issue in Clines engaged in many traditional banking functions beyond merely holding funds. See id. at 580 (explaining that the services the entity provided the defendant and his business partners included "bookkeeping, accounting, and financial management responsibilities ... [as well as] investment of funds and management of accounts").

Synopsis

Background: Senator and several individuals alleged to be subject to Foreign Account Tax Compliance Act (FATCA) and Bank Secrecy Act's foreign bank account reporting (FBAR) requirement brought action against Department of the Treasury, Internal Revenue Service (IRS), and Financial Crimes Enforcement Network, seeking to enjoin enforcement of FATCA, intergovernmental agreements (IGA) that facilitate foreign financial institutions' (FFI) disclosures of financial account information to the United States Government, and the FBAR. The United States District Court for the Southern District of Ohio at Dayton. No. 3:15-cv-00250, Thomas M. Rose, J., 2016 WL 1642968, dismissed action for lack of standing. Plaintiffs appealed.

Holdings: The Court of Appeals, Boggs, Circuit Judge, held that:

[1] plaintiffs lacked standing to challenge FATCA's individual-reporting requirements and passthru penalty;

[2] plaintiffs lacked standing to challenge penalty imposed upon FFIs for noncompliance with FATCA;

[3] plaintiffs lacked Article III standing to challenge the constitutionality of IGAs;

[4] plaintiffs lacked Article III standing to bring pre-enforcement challenge to FBAR; and

Affirmed.

OPINION

BOGGS, Circuit Judge.

In 2010, Congress passed the Foreign Account Tax Compliance Act (FATCA), a law aimed at reducing tax evasion by United States taxpayers holding funds in foreign accounts. FATCA imposes account-reporting requirements (and hefty penalties for noncompliance) on both individual taxpayers and foreign financial institutions (FFIs). FFIs are further required to deduct and withhold a "tax" equal to 30% of every payment made by the FFI to a noncompliant (or "recalcitrant") account holder. To implement FATCA worldwide, the United States Department of the Treasury (Treasury) and the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) have concluded intergovernmental agreements (IGAs), which facilitate FFIs' disclosure of financial-account information to the United States government, with more than seventy countries. Separately from FATCA and the IGAs, the Bank Secrecy Act imposes a foreign bank account reporting (FBAR) requirement on Americans living abroad who have aggregate foreign-account balances over $10,000; willful failure to file an FBAR invites a penalty of 50% of the value of the reportable accounts or $100,000, whichever is greater.

Plaintiffs—who include Senator Rand Paul and several individuals who claim to be subject to FATCA and the FBAR—sought to enjoin the enforcement of FATCA, the IGAs, and the FBAR, and they now appeal the dismissal of their lawsuit for lack of standing. For the reasons that follow, we affirm the judgment of the district court.

I

A. The Parties

Plaintiffs' original verified complaint asserts claims against three defendants: Treasury, which administers FATCA and the FBAR; the IRS (an office of Treasury that also administers FATCA and the FBAR); and the United States Financial Crimes Enforcement Network (FinCEN), a Treasury Department bureau with administrative authority over the FBAR. Each of the seven plaintiffs alleges a unique set of harms:

Mark Crawford

Plaintiff Mark Crawford is an American citizen living in Albania with a residence in Dayton, Ohio. Crawford owns Aksioner, a brokerage firm in Albania that is a partner of Saxo Bank in Copenhagen. Crawford alleges injury because Saxo will not allow Aksioner to accept clients who are United States citizens "in part because the bank does not wish to assume the burdens that would be foisted on it by FATCA." Crawford also claims that Aksioner—which he owns—denied Crawford's own application for a brokerage account, and that Crawford 444 has suffered financial harm because FATCA is "forcing him to turn away prospective American clients living in Albania."

Senator Rand Paul

Senator Rand Paul claims that he "has been denied the opportunity to exercise his constitutional right as a member of the U.S. Senate to vote against the FATCA IGAs." Senator Paul claims that he would vote against the IGAs if they were submitted to the Senate for advice and consent under Article II, Section 2, of the United States Constitution, or if they were submitted to the whole Congress for approval as "congressional-executive agreements." Senator Paul does not otherwise challenge FATCA, and he does not in any way challenge the FBAR.

Roger Johnson

Plaintiff Roger Johnson is an American citizen living in Brno, Czech Republic. Johnson is married to Katerina Johnson, a Czech citizen with whom Johnson previously shared joint financial accounts before they separated their accounts to avoid subjecting Katerina's account information to disclosure under FATCA.

Stephen J. Kish

Plaintiff Stephen J. Kish is a Canadian citizen living in Toronto. Kish was also an American citizen at the time Plaintiffs' complaint was filed, but he has since renounced his American citizenship. Kish and his wife, a Canadian citizen, share a joint bank account at a Canadian bank. Kish alleges that "FATCA has at times caused some discord between" Kish and his wife because Kish's wife "strongly opposes the disclosure of her personal financial information from [the] joint bank account to the U.S. government." Kish's wife, however, is neither a plaintiff nor a proposed plaintiff in this litigation.

Daniel Kuettel

Plaintiff Daniel Kuettel is a Swiss citizen and former American citizen living in Bremgarten, Switzerland. Kuettel and his wife—a citizen of Switzerland and the Philippines—have a daughter (a citizen of the United States, the Philippines, and Switzerland) and a son (a citizen of the Philippines and Switzerland), both minors. Kuettel alleges that he renounced his citizenship in 2012 “because of difficulties caused by FATCA.” For instance, Kuettel alleges that before renunciation, his efforts to refinance his mortgage with Swiss banks were unsuccessful but that he “was able to refinance his home with a Swiss bank shortly thereafter.” Kuettel also alleges that he has a college-savings account for his daughter in his own name at a Swiss bank and wishes to transfer it to his daughter, but that he has refrained from doing so for fear that if he does, either he or his daughter or the account will be subject to the FBAR penalty “if the IRS determines that his daughter has ‘wilfully’ failed to file an FBAR.” Kuettel alleges that his daughter is incapable of filing the FBAR or of renouncing her United States citizenship because “she is only ten years old and too young to shoulder such an obligation,” and Kuettel does not wish to file the FBAR on his daughter’s behalf as FinCEN would ordinarily require the parent of a minor child to do.

Donna-Lane Nelson

Plaintiff Donna-Lane Nelson is a Swiss citizen and former American citizen living in both Geneva, Switzerland, and Argèles-sur-Mer, France. Nelson claims that she renounced her citizenship when, after FATCA was enacted, her Swiss bank (UBS) “notified her that she would not be 445 able to open a new account if she ever closed her existing one[,] because she was an American.” Nelson subsequently married an American citizen with whom she shares a joint bank account at BNP Paribas in France. Nelson alleges that she “has had her private financial account information disclosed to the IRS and the Treasury Department despite the fact that she is not a U.S. citizen,” although Plaintiffs’ pleadings provide no further insight as to the nature of this alleged disclosure, such as who made it, when it was made, or what it contained. Nelson has also had to prove or explain to UBS, BNP Paribas, and Raiffeisen (another European bank) that she is not a United States citizen.

L. Marc Zell

Plaintiff L. Marc Zell is an American and Israeli citizen living in Israel. Zell, an attorney, alleges that “[b]ecause of FATCA, [he] and his firm have been required by their Israeli banking institutions to complete IRS withholding forms ... as a precondition for opening trust accounts for both U.S. and non-U.S. persons and entities” (emphasis added). Zell alleges that the “Israeli banking officials have stated that they will require such submissions regardless of whether the beneficiary is a U.S. person ... because the trustee is or may be a U.S. person,” and that, as a result, “banks have required [him] and his firm to close the trust account in some cases, and in other instances the banks have refused to open the requested trust account.” Zell alleges that he holds in trust certain client securities that are required by Israeli financial regulations to be “held by a qualified Israeli financial institution,” but Zell’s Israeli financial institution has requested Zell to transfer the securities elsewhere “because both he and the beneficiary in this instance are U.S. citizens.” Finally, Zell alleges that his non-United States clients have been required by Israeli banks “to fill out the IRS forms even though they have no connection with the United States,” and that “banking officials have stated that the mere fact a U.S. person trustee or his law firm is acting as a fiduciary is reason enough to require non-U.S. person beneficiaries to” report their identities and assets to the United States. Zell alleges that in “a few such instances,” the client-beneficiary has terminated the attorney-client relationship, “resulting in palpable financial loss” to Zell and his firm.

Proposed Additional Plaintiffs

In addition to these seven plaintiffs, Plaintiffs’ Proposed Amended Complaint sought to add three new plaintiffs: Plaintiff Johnson’s wife Katerina Johnson, Plaintiff Kuettel’s daughter Lois Kuettel, and Plaintiff Nelson’s husband Richard Adams. The amended complaint also includes statements, absent from the original complaint, that some of Plaintiffs’ bank balances exceeded the threshold amounts at which FATCA or FBAR requirements might apply, but the amended complaint otherwise recites the same claims and substantially the same facts as the original complaint. Importantly, none of the original plaintiffs or proposed plaintiffs alleges that they have faced direct consequences such as the imposition or threatened imposition of a financial penalty for noncompliance with FATCA, the IGAs, or the FBAR.

B. FATCA, the IGAs, and the FBAR

Plaintiffs assert challenges against five sets of laws: (1) FATCA’s individual-reporting requirements; (2)

FATCA's "FFI Penalty"; (3) FATCA's "Passthru Penalty"; (4) the IGAs; and (5) the FBAR Willfulness Penalty.

446 1. FATCA's Individual-Reporting Requirements

FATCA requires United States taxpayers with "specified foreign financial assets" to file a special report with their annual tax returns that discloses the name and address of the financial institution that maintains each specified account; the name and address of any issuers of specified stocks or securities; information necessary to identify other specified instruments, contracts, or interests and their issuers; and the maximum value of each specified asset during the taxable year. 26 U.S.C. § 6038D(b)–(c). The reporting requirement applies to any United States taxpayer when the "aggregate value of all [specified] assets exceeds $50,000 (or such higher dollar amount as the secretary may prescribe)." § 6038D(a) (emphasis added). Notably, the Secretary of the Treasury has prescribed higher dollar amounts for many taxpayers depending on their marital status, maximum asset value during the tax year, and place of residence. The following individual-reporting thresholds have been in place since at least 2012:

	Asset Value on Last Day of Tax Year	Asset Value at Any Time During Tax Year
If living in the United States
Unmarried; married filing separately	$50,000	$75,000
Married filing jointly	$100,000	$150,000
If living outside the United States
Unmarried; married filing separately	$200,000	$300,000
Married filing jointly	$400,000	$600,000

See 26 C.F.R. § 1.6038D-2(a); see also Treasury Insp. Gen. for Tax Admin., U.S. Dept. of Treasury, "The Internal Revenue Service Has Made Progress in Implementing the Foreign Account Tax Compliance Act," Fig. 1., Ref. No. 2015-30-085 (Sept. 23, 2015).

Plaintiffs' pleadings below and principal brief on appeal acknowledge only the $50,000 and $75,000 values applicable to single filers residing in the United States. See, e.g., Appellants' Br. 2. Plaintiffs' reply brief obliquely acknowledges the $200,000/$300,000 threshold values that would seem to apply to most of the Plaintiffs on account of their overseas residences, noting that "the secretary has recently increased the triggering amount for individuals living abroad," but Plaintiffs argue that "the threshold could be lowered to the statutory minimum at any time, thus triggering reporting for Plaintiffs." Reply Br. 7. Failure to report carries a penalty of up to $10,000 per violation plus 40% of the amount of any underpaid tax "attributable to" the assets for which disclosure was required. 26 U.S.C. §§ 6038D(d) ("[S]uch person shall pay a penalty of....") (emphasis added), 6662(j)(3). No penalty is due, however, if failure to report is "due to reasonable cause and not due to willful neglect." Id. § 6038D(g).

Plaintiffs seek to enjoin the statutory reporting requirement, 26 U.S.C. § 6038D; the regulation that implements the reporting requirement, 26 C.F.R. § 1.6038D-4(a)(5); a regulation that requires disclosing the opening or closing of a specified foreign account, 26 C.F.R. § 1.6038D-4(a)(6); and a regulation that requires disclosing "income, gain, loss, deduction, or credit recognized ... with respect to" specified assets, 26 C.F.R. § 1.6038D-4(a)(8).

447 2. FATCA's Institutional-Reporting Requirements, the FFI Penalty, and the Passthru Penalty

FATCA also imposes an institutional-reporting requirement on FFIs,[1] which an FFI can satisfy in one of three ways as set forth in 26 U.S.C. § 1471(b)(1), (b)(2), and (b)(3). First, the FFI may enter into an agreement with Treasury whereby the FFI agrees, among other things, to take the following five actions:

(1) "to obtain such information regarding each holder of each account maintained by such institution as is necessary to determine which (if any) of such accounts are United States accounts";[2]

(2) to make annual reports to Treasury providing details on United States accounts, including the "name, address, and [Taxpayer Identification Number] of each account holder which is a specified United States person and, in the case of any account holder which is a United States owned foreign entity, the name, address, and [Taxpayer Identification Number] of each substantial United States owner of such entity"; the account number; the account balance or value; and "the gross receipts and gross withdrawals or payments from the account";

(3) "to deduct and withhold a tax equal to 30 percent of ... any passthru payment[3] which is made by such institution to a recalcitrant account holder[4]

or another foreign financial 448 institution which does not meet the requirements of this subsection"—the so-called Passthru Penalty;

(4) to attempt to obtain a waiver from each account holder of any foreign law that would (but for such a waiver) prohibit the disclosure of the required information to the United States; and

(5) to close the accounts of any account holders from which such a waiver "is not obtained ... within a reasonable period of time." 26 U.S.C. § 1471(b)(1).

Second, the FFI "may be treated by the Secretary as meeting the requirements of" FATCA if the FFI either "complies with such procedures as the Secretary may prescribe to ensure that such institution does not maintain United States accounts" or "is a member of a class of institutions with respect to which the Secretary has determined that the application of [FATCA's reporting requirement] is not necessary." 26 U.S.C. § 1471(b)(2). As we discuss below, FFIs subject to the jurisdiction of countries that have signed IGAs with Treasury may be deemed compliant under 26 U.S.C. § 1471(b)(2) by virtue of their (and their country's) compliance with an IGA.

Third, the FFI may "elect" to withhold a tax from payments sent to the FFI from "accounts held by recalcitrant account holders or foreign financial institutions which do not meet the requirements of this subsection" rather than agreeing to withhold the 30% tax from the FFI's payments to recalcitrant account holders or noncompliant FFIs. 26 U.S.C. § 1471(b)(3).

If an FFI fails to meet FATCA's institutional-reporting requirement in one of these three ways, then the FFI is subject to having "a tax equal to 30 percent" deducted and withheld from all withholdable payments sent to the FFI. 26 U.S.C. § 1471(a). Plaintiffs assert and the government does not dispute that this tax—the so-called "FFI Penalty"—applies to United States-sourced income payable to the FFI as well as foreign-sourced income payable to the FFI from other FFIs. See 26 C.F.R. § 1.1471-2; Compl. 29; Appellees' Br. 4.

In short, if an FFI is not subject to the jurisdiction of a country that has concluded an IGA, the FFI must either comply with FATCA (and withhold the Passthru Penalty from payments it makes to recalcitrant account holders and noncompliant FFIs) or elect to have a 30% tax withheld from incoming payments from recalcitrant account holders or noncompliant FFIs; otherwise, the FFI becomes noncompliant itself and thus subject to the FFI Penalty of 30% of all withholdable payments[5] it receives from any source whatsoever.

Plaintiffs seek to enjoin the enforcement of the reporting requirement, the withholding provisions, the regulations implementing these provisions, and the IRS's use of Form 8966, "FATCA Report," on which FFIs make FATCA disclosures. Plaintiffs also seek to enjoin the enforcement of the Passthru Penalty, which is the 30% "tax"[6] that FFIs deduct and withhold from payments to recalcitrant account holders or noncompliant FFIs under 26 U.S.C. § 1471(b)(1)(D). See also 26 C.F.R. §§ 1.1471-4(a)(1), 1.1471-4T(b)(1).

449 3. The IGAs

Treasury, on behalf of the United States, has reached agreements with dozens of foreign governments to "facilitate the implementation of FATCA." 26 C.F.R. § 1.1471-1(b)(79). These intergovernmental agreements (IGAs) take two forms: "Model 1" IGAs and "Model 2" IGAs.

Under a Model 1 IGA, the foreign government agrees to collect the financial information that FATCA would otherwise require FFIs to report, and the foreign government itself reports that information directly to the IRS. Notably, the Model 1 IGA makes clear that as long as the foreign government "complies with its obligations under" the IGA, any FFI within that government's jurisdiction that also complies with its own obligations under the IGA (such as sending accountholder information to the foreign government) "shall be treated as complying with" FATCA[7] and is exempt from FATCA reporting, penalties, and withholding. See, e.g., U.S. Dept. of Treasury FATCA Resource Center, Model 1A IGA Reciprocal, Preexisting TIEA or DTC, Art. 4, § 1, (Nov. 30, 2014), http://www.treasury.gov/resource-center/tax-policy/treaties/Documents/FATCA-Reciprocal-Model-1A-Agreement-Preexisting-TIEA-or-DTC-11-30-14.pdf.

Treasury has signed Model 1 IGAs with Canada (in force June 27, 2014), Czech Republic (in force December 18, 2014), Israel (in force August 29, 2016), France (in force October 14, 2014), and Denmark (in force September 30, 2015). Plaintiffs' original complaint, in which they sought to enjoin the Canadian, Czech, and Israeli IGAs, was filed July 14, 2015; Plaintiffs sought leave to file their proposed amended complaint, which would also enjoin the French and the Danish IGAs, on October 30, 2015. Neither complaint mentions that although all the above-mentioned Model 1 IGAs were signed on June 30, 2014, the Israeli IGA was not yet in force at the time of filing either complaint. U.S. Dept. of Treasury FATCA Resource Center, https://www.irs.gov/pub/irs-drop/a-16-27.pdf. Indeed, the Israeli Knesset did not approve regulations implementing FATCA until August 4, 2016. Nevertheless, Treasury has declared that any foreign jurisdiction that signed an IGA before November 30, 2014, would be treated "as if [it had] an IGA in effect" and would thus be exempt from FATCA reporting, penalties, and withholding—including penalties against recalcitrant account holders—"as long as the jurisdiction is taking the steps necessary to bring the IGA into force within a reasonable period of time." See IRS Announcement 2016-27, https://www.irs.gov/pub/irs-drop/a-16-27.pdf; IRS Announcement 2013-43, https://www.irs.gov/pub/irs-drop/n-13-43.pdf. One such announcement set December 31, 2016, as the date by which jurisdictions whose IGAs were not yet in force owed "a detailed explanation" to Treasury. See IRS Announcement 2016-27 at 2–3. The result of the Treasury notices and the pending IGA is that from the time Plaintiffs' complaint was filed until well after the district-court record closed, neither FATCA nor any IGA had any legal effect in Israel.

Under a Model 2 IGA, the foreign government agrees to modify its laws to the extent necessary to enable its FFIs to report their United States account information directly to the IRS. Treasury has signed a Model 2 IGA with Switzerland (in force June 2, 2014), in which the Swiss government has agreed to "direct all Reporting Swiss Financial Institutions" to "register with the IRS" and comply with 450 applicable FATCA provisions. Swiss IGA Art. 3 § 1. One provision of the Swiss IGA, Article 5, is not yet in force because it requires that a separate "Protocol"—an amendment to a bilateral tax treaty that was signed by the United States and Switzerland in 2009—first come into force, but the United States Senate has not yet approved that Protocol, leaving Article 5 inoperative. Article 5 would authorize the United States to make "group requests" to the Swiss Federal Department of Finance or its designee for aggregated reportable-account information. Swiss IGA Art. 2 § 1; Art. 5. Despite the fact that Article 5 is inoperative, however, the Swiss Model 2 IGA, somewhat like the Model 1 IGAs, provides that Swiss FFIs that register with the IRS and comply with an "FFI Agreement" (essentially, an agreement between an individual Swiss FFI and the United States government to report United States account information) "shall be treated as complying with" FATCA and are thus exempt from any provisions of FATCA beyond those incorporated into the IGA or FFI Agreement. Swiss IGA Art. 6. Swiss FFIs' obligations are lighter under the IGA than under FATCA: for example, as long as a Swiss FFI complies with the registration and reporting requirements in Article 3 of the IGA, it is not required to withhold the passthru tax from recalcitrant account holders or to close any account holders' accounts. Swiss IGA Art. 7 § 1.

Plaintiffs seek to invalidate the Canadian, Czech, Israeli, French, Danish, and Swiss IGAs.

4. The FBAR Willfulness Penalty

The last set of laws at issue is the foreign-bank-account-reporting (FBAR) requirement of the Bank Secrecy Act, which requires any United States person with "a financial interest in or signature authority over at least one financial account located outside of the United States" to file FinCEN Form 114 (also referred to as the FBAR) with Treasury annually. Reporting is required for accounts held during the previous calendar year if "the aggregate value of all foreign financial accounts exceeded $10,000 at any time during the calendar year reported." See 31 U.S.C. § 5314; 31 C.F.R. §§ 1010.306(c), .350. The FBAR appears to have nothing to do with FATCA or the IGAs other than that presumably most if not all individuals subject to FATCA's reporting requirement are also required to file an FBAR, since the reporting threshold for the FBAR is lower than any reporting threshold for FATCA.

Nevertheless, Plaintiffs challenge the FBAR's willful-failure-to-report penalty ("Willfulness Penalty"), which provides that "[t]he Secretary of the Treasury may impose" a penalty equal to the greater of $100,000 or half the value in the reportable account(s) at the time of the violation. 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(A), (C) (emphasis added). The ordinary penalty (absent a showing of willfulness), which Plaintiffs do not challenge, is $10,000 per violation. Id. § 5321(a)(5)(B)(i). Plaintiffs also seek to enjoin the FBAR account-balance-reporting requirement —that is, the requirement to complete FinCEN Form 114.

C. Counts Enumerated in the Complaint

In both the original complaint and the proposed amended complaint, Plaintiffs brought eight counts against Defendants. A brief summary of the counts is provided here as relevant background, although Plaintiffs need not demonstrate that they are likely to prevail as to any of these counts in order to have standing to bring them.

451 Counts 1 & 2: The IGAs Were Unconstitutionally Executed

Plaintiffs claim in Count 1 that the IGAs are "unconstitutional sole executive agreements" that exceed the scope of the President's constitutional power because they are not authorized by Congress through the ordinary legislative process. Compl. 37. Plaintiffs claim that the only constitutionally permissible means by which the executive branch may make international agreements are by the Treaty Clause, an Act of Congress, a provision in an existing treaty, or the President's independent constitutional foreign-affairs power—which Plaintiffs claim does not include the power to impose a tax or to create a tax-collection mechanism like the IGAs.

Alternatively, in Count 2, Plaintiffs claim that the IGAs are impermissible because they are "inconsistent with legislation enacted by Congress in the exercise of its constitutional authority"—namely, FATCA—to the extent that they, among other things, allow FFIs to report to their national governments rather than to the IRS. Amended Compl. 49 (quoting State Department Foreign Affairs Manual). Plaintiffs thus claim that the IGAs "override" FATCA and "must be held unlawful and set aside" because "Treasury and the IRS have acted contrary to the President's constitutional power" in entering into the IGAs.

Count 3: The FATCA, IGA, and FBAR Reporting Requirements Violate the Equal Protection Clause

Plaintiffs claim that compared to the various data reported to the IRS about foreign accounts under FATCA, the IGAs, and the FBAR, "[t]he only financial information reported to the IRS about domestic accounts is the amount of interest paid to the accounts during a calendar year." Plaintiffs thus claim that United States citizens living abroad are treated differently than United States citizens living in the United States, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment Equal Protection Clause (as incorporated against the federal government through the Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause). See United States v. Ovalle, 136 F.3d 1092, 1095 n.2 (6th Cir. 1998).

Counts 4–6: The FFI Penalty, Passthru Penalty, and FBAR Willfulness Penalty Impose Unconstitutionally Excessive Fines

In Count 4, Plaintiffs challenge the FFI Penalty, which is imposed directly upon FFIs for noncompliance with FATCA, as an unconstitutionally excessive fine, claiming that "[t]he penalty is used as a hammer to coerce compliance by [FFIs] everywhere in the world." Plaintiffs claim that the penalty is unconstitutional because it "is grossly disproportional to the gravity of the offense it seeks to punish." In Count 5, Plaintiffs lodge the same attack against the Passthru Penalty, which FFIs apply to recalcitrant account holders under FATCA. In Count 6, Plaintiffs lodge the same attack against the FBAR Willfulness Penalty.

Counts 7 & 8: The Institutional-Reporting Requirements of FATCA and the IGAs Violate Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment Right to Privacy

In Count 7, Plaintiffs claim that FATCA's requirement that FFIs report account data to the United States constitutes a warrantless search in violation of Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable searches and seizures. In Count 8, Plaintiffs claim that the IGAs' requirement that FFIs report account data either to their governments or 452 to the United States likewise violates the Fourth Amendment.

D. Procedural History

Plaintiffs filed their original complaint in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Ohio on July 14, 2015. Plaintiffs moved for a preliminary injunction, which the district court denied, holding that Plaintiffs were not likely to succeed on the merits because they lacked standing and, alternatively, because they had brought allegations that failed as a matter of law. On October 30, 2015, Plaintiffs moved for leave to amend their complaint. The government filed both a motion to dismiss and an opposition to Plaintiffs' motion for leave to amend.

On April 26, 2016, the district court granted the government's motion to dismiss for lack of standing, declined to reach the government's motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, and denied Plaintiffs' motion for leave to amend. The district court denied leave to amend only after considering the new plaintiffs and their new claims and after determining that even if leave to amend were granted, Plaintiffs still would not have standing to sue, rendering leave to amend futile. This timely appeal followed.

In the interest of simplicity, we will discuss whether Plaintiffs have standing in light of the facts pleaded in both the original complaint and the proposed amended complaint. For the reasons that follow, the district court rightly held that none of the plaintiffs had standing to sue, and that granting leave to amend would not cure the defect in standing.

II

A. Elements of Standing

[1] Federal courts have constitutional authority to decide only "cases" and "controversies." U.S. Const. art. III § 2; see Muskrat v. United States, 219 U.S. 346, 31 S.Ct. 250, 55 L.Ed. 246 (1911). The requirement of standing is "rooted in the traditional understanding of a case or controversy." Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, ––– U.S. ––––, 136 S.Ct. 1540, 1547, 194 L.Ed.2d 635 (2016). To bring suit, Plaintiffs must have "alleged such a personal stake in the outcome of the controversy as to assure that concrete adverseness which sharpens the presentation of issues" before the court. Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 204, 82 S.Ct. 691, 7 L.Ed.2d 663 (1962).

[2] The "irreducible constitutional minimum" of standing is that for each claim, each plaintiff must allege an actual or imminent injury that is traceable to the defendant and redressable by the court. Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560–62, 112 S.Ct. 2130, 119 L.Ed.2d 351 (1992) (holding wildlife-conservation organizations lacked standing to seek injunctive relief against the Secretary of the Interior's interpretation of the Endangered Species Act where organization members' harm was the endangering of wild animals in Sri Lanka but where the members had no current plans to go to Sri Lanka to observe the animals); see Friends of the Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Envtl. Servs., 528 U.S. 167, 185, 120 S.Ct. 693, 145 L.Ed.2d 610 (2000) (agreeing that "a plaintiff must demonstrate standing separately for each form of relief sought").

1. Injury

[3] The injury must be an "injury in fact," meaning "an invasion of a legally protected interest which is (a) concrete and particularized, and (b) 'actual or imminent, not "conjectural" or "hypothetical." ' " Lujan, 504 U.S. at 560, 112 S.Ct. 2130 (emphasis added) (citations omitted) (first quoting Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 751, 104 S.Ct. 3315, 82 L.Ed.2d 556 (1984); then 453 quoting Whitmore v. Arkansas, 495 U.S. 149, 155, 110 S.Ct. 1717, 109 L.Ed.2d 135 (1990) (quoting Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 95, 102, 103 S.Ct. 1660, 75 L.Ed.2d 675 (1983))).

[4] There is no "legally protected interest" in maintaining the privacy of one's bank records from government access. United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435, 442, 96 S.Ct. 1619, 48 L.Ed.2d 71 (1976) (holding bank clients had no legitimate expectation of privacy in banking information revealed to a third party); United States v. Warshak, 631 F.3d 266, 288 (6th Cir. 2010) (noting that Miller involved "business records" as opposed to "confidential communications").

[5] The requirement that an injury be "concrete and particularized" has two discrete parts: concreteness, which is the requirement that the injury be "real," and not "abstract," Spokeo, 136 S.Ct. at 1548, and particularization, which is the requirement that the plaintiff "personally [have] suffered some actual or threatened injury" as opposed to bringing a generalized grievance. Valley Forge Christian College v. Americans United for Separation of Church and State, Inc., 454 U.S. 464, 472, 102 S.Ct. 752, 70 L.Ed.2d 700 (1982) (emphasis added).

[6] [7] Concreteness. "Abstract, intellectual problems," FEC v. Akins, 524 U.S. 11, 20, 118 S.Ct. 1777, 141 L.Ed.2d 10 (1998), "abstract concern," Diamond v. Charles, 476 U.S. 54, 67, 106 S.Ct. 1697, 90 L.Ed.2d 48 (1986), and "[a]bstract injury," Lyons, 461 U.S. at 101, 103 S.Ct. 1660, do not present concrete injuries. That said, concrete is not synonymous with tangible: intangible harms such as those produced by defamation or the denial of individual rights may certainly be concrete enough to constitute an injury in fact. Spokeo, 136 S.Ct. at 1549.

[8] Particularization. Additionally, "a plaintiff raising only a generally available grievance about government—claiming only harm to his and every citizen's interest in proper application of the Constitution and laws, and seeking relief that no more directly and tangibly benefits him than it does the public at large—does not state an Article III case or controversy." Lujan, 504 U.S. at 573–74, 112 S.Ct. 2130 (emphasis added); see also Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 487, 43 S.Ct. 597, 67 L.Ed. 1078 (1923) (denying municipal taxpayer standing to challenge federal spending measure because the taxpayer's "interest in the moneys of the Treasury—partly realized from taxation and partly from other sources—is shared with millions of others; is comparatively minute and indeterminable"); Hollingsworth v. Perry, ––– U.S. ––––, 133 S.Ct. 2652, 2662, 186 L.Ed.2d 768 (2013) ("[A]n asserted right to have the Government act in accordance with law is not sufficient, standing alone[.]").

[9] [10] Legislative standing. The general rule that individual legislators lack standing to sue in their official capacity as congressman or senator follows from the requirement that an injury must be concrete and particularized. See Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811, 816, 821, 117 S.Ct. 2312, 138 L.Ed.2d 849 (1997) (in action by members of Congress to challenge the Line Item Veto Act, "loss of political power"—as opposed to loss of a private right—was not a concrete injury, and any institutional injury to Congress arising from the Act was not particularized to any individual plaintiff). An apparent exception to the general rule against legislative standing arises when the legislators are suing on a vote-nullification theory and allege that if their votes had been given effect, those votes would have been sufficient to defeat or enact a specific legislative 454 action. Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 438, 59 S.Ct. 972, 83 L.Ed. 1385 (1939) (holding that where forty-member Kansas State Senate had deadlocked twenty-to-twenty in voting on a proposed constitutional amendment, the twenty senators who had voted against the amendment had standing to challenge the constitutionality of the lieutenant governor's tie-breaking vote in favor of the amendment, because the lieutenant governor's vote effectively nullified the plaintiffs' votes and the plaintiffs' votes would have been sufficient to prevent ratification of the amendment); see also Baird v. Norton, 266 F.3d 408, 410 (6th Cir. 2001) (holding that a Michigan House member and a Michigan state senator lacked standing to challenge gaming compacts that were approved by a concurrent-resolution procedure requiring only a majority of votes cast rather than by the ordinary legislative process that would have required a majority of the votes of all members in each house).

We held in Baird that to the extent that the legislators complained of the deprivation of procedural safeguards built into the ordinary legislative process, they had "at most, a generalized grievance shared by all Michigan residents alike," and thus lacked the sort of particularized injury in fact that standing requires. Baird, 266 F.3d at 411. And we held that the legislators could not show a Coleman-like vote-nullification injury because their votes "would not have been sufficient to defeat either the concurrent resolution ... or legislation to similar effect." Id. at 412. In such circumstances, legislators' remedy lies not with the courts but with the legislative process, for, as the Supreme Court noted in Raines, the legislature could simply "vote to repeal" offending legislation. 521 U.S. at 824, 117 S.Ct. 2312.

[11] Actual or imminent. Standing can derive from an imminent, rather than an actual, injury, but only when "the threatened injury is real, immediate, and direct." Davis v. FEC, 554 U.S. 724, 734, 128 S.Ct. 2759, 171 L.Ed.2d 737 (2008) (holding candidate for House of Representatives had standing to challenge election regulation exempting opponents of self-financing candidates from certain campaign-contribution limits where plaintiff candidate had declared his candidacy and was demonstrably a self-financing candidate whose opponents would imminently receive expanded access to campaign funding).

In a pre-enforcement challenge to a federal statute, the Supreme Court has held that a plaintiff satisfies the injury requirement of standing by alleging "an intention to engage in a course of conduct arguably affected with a constitutional interest, but proscribed by a statute, and [that] there exists a credible threat of prosecution thereunder." Susan B. Anthony List v. Driehaus, ––– U.S. ––––, 134 S.Ct. 2334, 2342, 189 L.Ed.2d 246 (2014) (quoting Babbitt v. Farm Workers, 442 U.S. 289, 298, 99 S.Ct. 2301, 60 L.Ed.2d 895 (1979)); see also Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 95 S.Ct. 2197, 45 L.Ed.2d 343 (1975); Village of Arlington Heights v. Metro. Hous. Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 264, 97 S.Ct. 555, 50 L.Ed.2d 450 (1977) (holding that one of the plaintiffs had standing to challenge a discriminatory zoning law where an injunction against the law would have produced "at least a 'substantial probability,' Warth, 422 U.S. at 504, 95 S.Ct. 2197, that" the plaintiff's desired housing project would "materialize").

[12] [13] The mere possibility of prosecution, however—no matter how strong the plaintiff's intent to engage in forbidden conduct may be—does not amount to a "credible threat" of prosecution. Instead, the threat of prosecution "must be certainly impending to constitute injury in fact." 455 Clapper v. Amnesty Int'l USA, 568 U.S. 398, 133 S.Ct. 1138, 1147, 185 L.Ed.2d 264 (2013) (quoting Whitmore, 495 U.S. at 158, 110 S.Ct. 1717). Putting the Supreme Court's language in Warth, Driehaus, and Clapper together: to have standing to bring a pre-enforcement challenge to a federal statute, there must be a substantial probability that the plaintiff actually will engage in conduct that is arguably affected with a constitutional interest, and there must be a certain threat of prosecution if the plaintiff does indeed engage in that conduct.

[14] Further, lawsuits that do not challenge "specifically identifiable Government violations of law," but instead challenge "particular programs agencies establish to carry out their legal obligations are ... rarely if ever appropriate for federal-court adjudication." Lujan, 504 U.S. at 568, 112 S.Ct. 2130 (citation omitted).

[15] Past injury is also inadequate to constitute an injury in fact when the plaintiff seeks injunctive relief but not does suffer "any continuing, present adverse effects." Lyons, 461 U.S. at 102, 103 S.Ct. 1660 (quoting O'Shea v. Littleton, 414 U.S. 488, 495–96, 94 S.Ct. 669, 38 L.Ed.2d 674 (1974)).

[16] Third-party standing. Generally, "a plaintiff must 'assert his own legal rights and interests, and cannot rest his claim to relief on the legal rights or interests of third parties.' " Coyne ex rel. Ohio v. Am. Tobacco Co., 183 F.3d 488, 494 (6th Cir. 1999) (quoting Warth, 422 U.S. at 499, 95 S.Ct. 2197; see also Ovalle, 136 F.3d at 1100–01; Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400, 410, 111 S.Ct. 1364, 113 L.Ed.2d 411 (1991)). The rare "third-party standing" exception to this requirement allows federal courts to hear cases in which a plaintiff can "show that (1) it has suffered an injury in fact; (2) it has a close relationship to the third party; and (3) there is some hindrance to the third party's ability to protect his or her own interests." Mount Elliott Cemetery Ass'n v. City of Troy, 171 F.3d 398, 404 (6th Cir. 1999); see also Connection Distrib. Co. v. Reno, 154 F.3d 281, 295 (6th Cir. 1998). Plaintiffs have expressly stated that they "rely neither on third-party standing nor [on] the harms of others," Appellants' Br. 24, but the Government contends that without invoking third-party standing, Plaintiffs would have no way to attack the FFI Penalty, which is imposed only on financial institutions that are not parties to this litigation.

2. Causation

[17] Even if a plaintiff alleges an actual or imminent injury that is concrete and particularized, the plaintiff must also show that the injury is "fairly traceable to the defendant's allegedly unlawful conduct." Allen, 468 U.S. at 751, 104 S.Ct. 3315 (holding parents of schoolchildren lacked standing to sue IRS to challenge private schools' tax exemptions where the parents' alleged harm of increased school segregation was caused by the private schools' choice to racially discriminate and was not fairly traceable to the IRS). When a plaintiff's alleged injury is the result of "the independent action of some third party not before the court," the plaintiff generally lacks standing to seek its redress. Simon v. E. Ky. Welfare Rights Org., 426 U.S. 26, 42, 96 S.Ct. 1917, 48 L.Ed.2d 450 (1976); see also Lujan, 504 U.S. at 560–61, 112 S.Ct. 2130; Shearson v. Holder, 725 F.3d 588, 592 (6th Cir. 2013); Ammex, Inc. v. United States, 367 F.3d 530, 533 (6th Cir. 2004) (holding that a retailer lacked standing to challenge a federal excise tax assessed against a third-party fuel supplier, even where the retailer was required by contract to pay the supplier an amount equal to the excise tax upfront at the time of purchase, since the "alleged injury ... 456 in the form of increased fuel costs was not occasioned by the Government").

[18] Neither is injury caused by market conditions fairly traceable to a regulation that happens to regulate that market. Warth, 422 U.S. at 506, 95 S.Ct. 2197 (holding Rochester-area residents lacked standing to challenge suburb's zoning as unconstitutionally excluding low- and moderate-income residents where plaintiffs were unable to allege other than in conclusory terms that they had been injured; where none of the plaintiffs personally owned property in the suburb or had been denied a variance or permit by the suburb; and where the plaintiffs' "inability to reside in [the suburb was] the consequence of the economics of the area housing market, rather than respondents' assertedly illegal acts").

[19] Nor is an injury fairly traceable to the defendant's conduct if the plaintiffs have "inflict[ed] [the] harm on themselves based on their fears of hypothetical future harm." Clapper, 133 S.Ct. at 1151.

[20] As we noted above, Plaintiffs do not rely on third-party standing. Rather, Plaintiffs argue that they have suffered "indirect" harm. An indirect harm is an injury caused to a plaintiff when the defendant's unlawful conduct harms a third party who in turn causes the plaintiff's harm—unlike in third-party standing cases, a plaintiff claiming indirect harm is seeking to vindicate the plaintiff's own rights and not a third party's. Appellants' Br. 23 (citing Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 124, 93 S.Ct. 705, 35 L.Ed.2d 147 (1973)). Plaintiffs rely heavily on Roe: they argue that the law challenged in Roe directly harmed abortionists, not women seeking abortions, but that the indirect harm to women seeking abortions was nevertheless fairly traceable to the law. Plaintiffs argue that in Roe, the doctors had only two options (provide abortions and thus break the law, or comply with the law by declining to provide abortions); Plaintiffs argue that in this case, similarly, FFIs have only two options: disregard FATCA and thus become subject to the 30% FFI Penalty, or comply with FATCA by refusing to do business with certain United States persons.

[21] But Plaintiffs' analogy overlooks a third option available here and not in Roe: FFIs may comply with FATCA and do business with United States persons —without imposing additional requirements on their clients beyond what FATCA and the IGAs themselves require.[8] As we will 457 discuss, several of Plaintiffs' alleged harms arise not from FFIs' acting under the command of FATCA or an IGA, but rather from the FFIs' voluntary choice to go above and beyond FATCA and the IGAs. FFIs may do so, for example, by gathering FATCA-compliance-related information from non-United States persons, or by choosing not to do business with certain individuals, whether to protect their own interests in FATCA compliance or for some other reason. See, e.g., Amended Compl. 12 ("[R]ather than reporting information about U.S. clients, Saxo Bank is turning away U.S. citizens like Mark."). And although an injury "produced by" a defendant's "determinative or coercive effect" upon a third party (such as the injury of inability to obtain an abortion, produced by the determinative effect of the challenged law in Roe upon abortionists) may suffice for standing, an injury that results from the third party's voluntary and independent actions or omissions does not. Bennett v. Spear, 520 U.S. 154, 169, 117 S.Ct. 1154, 137 L.Ed.2d 281 (1997).

3. Redressability

Finally, a plaintiff must also plead facts sufficient to establish that the court is capable of providing relief that would redress the alleged injury. Lujan, 504 U.S. at 561–62, 112 S.Ct. 2130.

B. Burden of Proof and Standard of Review

[22] [23] [24] Each plaintiff has the burden "clearly to allege facts demonstrating that he is a proper party to invoke judicial resolution of the dispute." Warth, 422 U.S. at 518, 95 S.Ct. 2197. "[W]e assess standing as of the time a suit is filed." Clapper, 133 S.Ct. at 1157. And standing must remain "extant at all stages of review." Arizonans for Official English v. Arizona, 520 U.S. 43, 67, 117 S.Ct. 1055, 137 L.Ed.2d 170 (1997) (quoting Preiser v. Newkirk, 422 U.S. 395, 401, 95 S.Ct. 2330, 45 L.Ed.2d 272 (1975)).

[25] [26] "Standing cannot be 'inferred argumentatively from averments in the pleadings,' " FW/PBS, Inc. v. City of Dallas, 493 U.S. 215, 231, 110 S.Ct. 596, 107 L.Ed.2d 603 (1990) (quoting Grace v. American Central Ins. Co., 109 U.S. 278, 284, 3 S.Ct. 207, 27 L.Ed. 932 (1883)), or even from the government's concession of standing, "but rather 'must affirmatively appear in the record.' " FW/PBS, 493 U.S. at 231–36, 110 S.Ct. 596 (quoting Mansfield C. & L.M.R. Co. v. Swan, 111 U.S. 379, 392, 4 S.Ct. 510, 28 L.Ed. 462 (1884)) (holding certain plaintiffs did not have standing to attack ordinance governing sexually oriented businesses where the record did not reveal that any one of these plaintiffs was subject to the ordinance, even though the city attorney conceded at oral argument before the Supreme Court that "one or two" of them had had their licenses denied under the ordinance). The Supreme Court has "always insisted on strict compliance with this jurisdictional standing requirement," Raines, 521 U.S. at 819, 117 S.Ct. 2312. And the inquiry into whether plaintiffs have standing is "especially rigorous" where, as here, "reaching the merits of the dispute would force [a court] to decide whether an action taken by one of the other two branches of the Federal Government was unconstitutional." Clapper, 133 S.Ct. at 1147 (quoting Raines, 521 U.S. at 819–20, 117 S.Ct. 2312).

[27] We review de novo the district court's dismissal for lack of standing, we accept as true all the material allegations in the Plaintiffs' complaints, and we construe Plaintiffs' complaints in Plaintiffs' favor. See Jenkins v. McKeithen, 395 U.S. 411, 421–22, 89 S.Ct. 1843, 23 L.Ed.2d 404 (1969); 458 Haines v. Fed. Motor Carrier Safety Admin., 814 F.3d 417, 423 (6th Cir. 2016).

C. No Plaintiff Has Standing as to Any Claim

1. No Plaintiff Has Standing to Challenge FATCA

[28] No Plaintiff has standing to challenge FATCA's individual-reporting requirements or the Passthru Penalty because no Plaintiff (or proposed Plaintiff) has alleged either an actual injury that is fairly traceable to FATCA or an imminent threat of prosecution from noncompliance with FATCA.

First, no Plaintiff has alleged any actual enforcement of FATCA such as a demand for compliance with the individual-reporting requirement, the imposition of a penalty for noncompliance, or an FFI's deduction of the Passthru Penalty from a payment to or from a foreign account.

Second, no Plaintiff can satisfy the Driehaus test for standing to bring a pre-enforcement challenge to FATCA because no Plaintiff claims to hold enough foreign assets to be subject to the individual-reporting requirement, and, as a result, no Plaintiff can claim that there is a "credible threat" of either prosecution for failing to comply with FATCA or imposition of a Passthru Penalty by an FFI. All but two of the Plaintiffs either fail to state the value of their foreign assets altogether or allege only that they have foreign accounts with an aggregate value "greater than $10,000"—but FATCA's individual-reporting requirement applies only to individuals with at least $50,000 worth of assets held in foreign accounts, with significantly higher thresholds in some cases. See, e.g., Amended Compl. 12, 19, 21, 28, 30, 34.

The two exceptions are Johnson and Zell. Johnson has alleged that "[t]he aggregate value of [his] foreign accounts has been greater than $75,000 in 2014 and 2015[,] which subjects him to both FATCA individual reporting and FBAR reporting." Id. at 16. But Johnson lives outside the United States and would thus have to hold foreign accounts with an aggregate value in excess of $200,000 to be subject to the individual-reporting requirement. That Treasury might someday lower the threshold from $200,000 to $50,000 (the statutory minimum) or $75,000 or any other level does not change the fact that, now and at the time Plaintiffs filed suit, Johnson is not subject to FATCA. Nor is it of any consequence that Johnson's foreign banks may be subject to FATCA's institutional-reporting requirement on account of Johnson's ownership of accounts exceeding $75,000 in value. Johnson cannot challenge the individual-reporting requirement or the Passthru Penalty without showing that Johnson himself is subject to those provisions, and based on the facts as stated in Plaintiffs' pleadings, Johnson is not.

[29] Further, Johnson—like all Plaintiffs—lacks standing to challenge FATCA's FFI Penalty (the penalty imposed upon financial institutions for their noncompliance with FATCA) because such a challenge would require either that the foreign banks themselves bring suit or that Plaintiffs rely on third-party standing, and Plaintiffs have made clear that they do not.

As for Zell, he alleges that he "had signatory authority over accounts with an aggregate year-end balance of greater than $200,000 in 2014, which would subject him to FATCA individual reporting." Id. at 34 (emphasis added). But, although the Israeli IGA imposes a reporting requirement for trust accounts like Zell's, FATCA itself does not require reporting where, as here, the trust accounts are held entirely for the benefit of non-United States persons. And although the Israeli IGA appears as of August 2016 to be in force in 459 Israel, it was not in force prior to then. Zell could not have been subject to FATCA's individual-reporting requirement, either at the time Plaintiffs' complaint was filed or at the time Plaintiffs sought leave to amend their complaint, based either on Zell's own accounts (for which he alleges only an aggregate value exceeding $10,000) or on Zell's "signatory authority" over his clients' trust accounts, because only the Israeli IGA, not FATCA itself, required (or requires) reporting of accounts based on signatory authority, and the Israeli IGA was not in effect when Plaintiffs filed or sought to amend their complaint.

Finally, some Plaintiffs allege other harms arising from FATCA apart from its individual-reporting requirement or its Passthru Penalty. But none of these alleged harms are injuries that are fairly traceable to FATCA. Crawford alleges that Saxo Bank's decision not to allow Crawford (or Aksioner, Crawford's brokerage firm) to accept United States clients, is an injury; even if it is, however, it is not fairly traceable to FATCA but rather, as in Allen and Ammex, to Saxo Bank's own independent actions. The Johnsons' decision to separate their own assets to avoid disclosing Katerina Johnson's financial affairs to the United States government when there is no allegation that FATCA has actually compelled any such disclosure, similarly, is traceable to the Johnsons' own independent actions, not to FATCA.

Nelson alleges that she has "had her private financial account information disclosed to the IRS and the Treasury Department despite the fact that she is not a U.S. citizen." Amended Compl. 28. But Nelson has stated no facts whatsoever indicating that her account information was disclosed because of FATCA—and thus any injury resulting from this disclosure cannot fairly be traced to FATCA.

In Plaintiffs' complaint, Adams and Zell have alleged that they have had difficulty obtaining banking services from foreign banks. Zell specifically alleges that he has been told to move securities out of an Israeli bank and that he has been informed that his non-United States clients are required to complete IRS forms at the request of Israeli banks. But, again, a foreign bank's choice either not to do business with Adams or Zell, or (as in Zell's case) to require Zell's non-United States clients to make financial or other disclosures even though these clients are not subject to FATCA, is a choice voluntarily made by the bank and is not fairly traceable to FATCA. And the resulting choice of any of Zell's clients not to do business with Zell is fairly traceable to the clients or perhaps to the Israeli banks, but is not fairly traceable to FATCA. Likewise with Kuettel, who alleges that he had difficulty refinancing his mortgage until after he renounced his American citizenship: such difficulty cannot serve as the basis for standing because it is, at best, past injury that is insufficient to warrant injunctive relief (it is past injury because Kuettel has renounced his American citizenship and no longer claims to have difficulty refinancing his mortgage), and, in any event, it is traceable only to the foreign banks and not to FATCA because nothing in FATCA prevented the foreign banks from refinancing Kuettel's mortgage.

Several plaintiffs allege injuries that are not concrete. Kish, for example, alleges that "FATCA has at times caused some discord between" him and his wife. Id. at 19. But marital discord, particularized though it may be, is not the sort of concrete injury that can give rise to standing. Neither is Crawford or Johnson's discomfort with FATCA's reporting requirements, or Nelson's "resent[ment]," id. at 28, at having to prove to European banks 460 that she is no longer a United States citizen in order to obtain banking services.

[30] In sum, no Plaintiff has standing to challenge FATCA's individual-reporting requirements, the Passthru Penalty, or the FFI Penalty, because no Plaintiff has suffered direct harm that is fairly traceable to any of these challenged provisions, and because no Plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts to show a credible threat of prosecution for noncompliance with any of these challenged provisions. At best, Plaintiffs' claimed injuries are the second-order effects of government regulation on the market for international banking services. But "consequence[s] of the economics" of holding foreign assets are not, on their own, injuries in fact for the purpose of demonstrating Article III standing. Warth, 422 U.S. at 506, 95 S.Ct. 2197. Because the burden of establishing standing falls squarely on the plaintiff, and because we are constrained to examine the district-court pleadings alone to determine whether standing existed at the time the complaint was filed, we hold that no Plaintiff has standing to challenge FATCA.

2. No Plaintiff Has Standing to Challenge the IGAs

[31] [32] Senator Paul challenges the constitutionality of the IGAs. Senator Paul alleges harm because he "has been denied the opportunity to exercise his constitutional right as a member of the U.S. Senate to vote against the FATCA IGAs." Id. at 444. But, as in Raines, any incursion upon Senator Paul's political power is not a concrete injury like the loss of a private right, and any diminution in the Senate's lawmaking power is not particularized but is rather a generalized grievance. Unlike in Coleman, in which the plaintiff-legislators' votes would have been sufficient to defeat the contested legislation, Senator Paul has not pleaded that his vote on its own would have been sufficient to forestall the IGAs. Rather, Senator Paul has a remedy in the legislature, which is to seek repeal or amendment of FATCA itself, under the aegis of which Treasury is executing the IGAs.[9] Senator Paul therefore lacks legislative standing to challenge the IGAs. None of the other Plaintiffs have alleged injuries that are traceable to the IGAs. The other Plaintiffs thus also lack standing to challenge the IGAs.

3. No Plaintiff Has Standing to Challenge the FBAR

[33] Although most Plaintiffs have alleged foreign account balances over $10,000 so as to be subject to the FBAR requirement, no Plaintiff has alleged both an intent to violate the FBAR requirement and a credible threat of the imposition of a failure-to-file penalty, as Driehaus would require in order for there to be standing to bring a pre-enforcement challenge to the FBAR penalty. Other than Zell, no Plaintiff has alleged any intent to violate the FBAR requirement. Zell has alleged that he "is not currently complying with" the FBAR. Amended Compl. 34. But Zell has not alleged any facts that would show a credible threat of enforcement against him. Even if there were a credible threat of enforcement, the FBAR penalty is a discretionary penalty under 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(A). Zell has not alleged any facts that show that the Willfulness Penalty, as opposed to the lower ordinary penalty (which Plaintiffs do not challenge, see Part I.B.4, supra), would be imposed for Zell's noncompliance with the FBAR.

461 Further, no Plaintiff has alleged any actual injury arising from the FBAR other than Lois Kuettel. Lois has alleged that she would like to have a college-savings account placed in her name that her father is currently holding for her benefit in his own name, but that her father does not want to transfer the account to her for fear that it will trigger an FBAR requirement for Lois. This injury, however, is traceable to Daniel Kuettel's personal choice not to transfer the account, and not to the FBAR.

In sum, none of the plaintiffs have standing to sue, and the district court was correct to dismiss their suit.

III

The District Court Properly Denied Leave to Amend

[34] [35] We generally review a district court's decision to deny leave to file an amended complaint, other than amendments as a matter of course under Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a)(1), for abuse of discretion. United States ex rel. Bledsoe v. Cmty. Health Sys., 342 F.3d 634, 644 (6th Cir. 2003). When a district court bases its denial of a motion to amend "on the legal conclusion that the proposed amendment would not survive a motion to dismiss," however, we review the district court's decision de novo. Greenberg v. Life Ins. Co. of Va., 177 F.3d 507, 522 (6th Cir. 1999). Here, even if Plaintiffs were granted leave to amend their complaint in order to bring claims by Katerina Johnson, Lois Kuettel, and Richard Adams, and in order to plead additional facts such as some of the Plaintiffs' account balances, no plaintiff would have standing to bring any of the claims in the proposed amended complaint for the reasons set forth above. The district court thoroughly reviewed all of the proposed new parties and proposed new claims in the amended complaint, and the district court properly held that leave to amend would be futile. Accordingly, we affirm the ruling of the district court denying Plaintiff's motion for leave to amend.

CONCLUSION

FATCA imposes far-reaching reporting obligations on individuals and financial institutions, which, like many government regulations, undoubtedly exact monetary and other costs of compliance. The IGAs, to be sure, are part of an unprecedented scheme of international tax enforcement. And the FBAR Willfulness Penalty, if it were to be imposed, is admittedly steep: it could theoretically bring a $100,000 fine for failure to report a foreign account with a balance of $10,000.01. None of these considerations, however, help these Plaintiffs at this time to clear the initial jurisdictional hurdle of standing.

Accordingly, we AFFIRM the judgment of the district court, and we DENY as moot Defendants' motion to strike.

Footnotes

[1] A "foreign financial institution" (FFI) is "any financial institution which is a foreign entity." 26 U.S.C. § 1471(d)(4). Financial institutions include any entity that "accepts deposits in the ordinary course of a banking or similar business," "holds financial assets for the account of others" "as a substantial portion of its business," or "is engaged (or holding itself out as being engaged) primarily in the business of investing, reinvesting, or trading in securities ..., partnership interests, commodities ..., or any interest" in the same. 26 U.S.C. § 1471(d)(5). FATCA thus reaches across the globe, although its extraterritorial reach is not directly at issue in this litigation, nor is it at issue at all in the present appeal, which concerns only the Plaintiffs' standing to sue.

[2] A "United States account" is "any financial account which is held by one or more specified United States persons or United States owned foreign entities," subject to certain exceptions not applicable here. 26 U.S.C. § 1471(d)(1)(A). United States persons include citizens and residents of the United States, domestic partnerships and corporations, estates other than foreign estates, and trusts subject to primary administrative supervision by a court of the United States where a United States person has authority to control "all substantial decisions" of the trust. 26 U.S.C. § 7701.

[3] A "passthru payment" is defined as "any withholdable payment or other payment to the extent attributable to a withholdable payment." 26 U.S.C. § 1471(d)(7). Withholdable payments include "(i) any payment of interest (including any original issue discount), dividends, rents, salaries, wages, premiums, annuities, compensations, remunerations, emoluments, and other fixed or determinable annual or periodical gains, profits, and income, if such payment is from sources within the United States, and (ii) any gross proceeds from the sale or other disposition of any property of a type which can produce interest or dividends from sources within the United States." Id. § 1473(1)(A). The "withholding agent" with respect to each withholdable payment is obligated to deduct and withhold the 30% tax. Withholding agents include "all persons, in whatever capacity acting, having the control, receipt, custody, disposal, or payment of any withholdable payment." Id. § 1473(4).

[4] "Recalcitrant account holder" means any account holder that fails to comply with an FFI's "reasonable requests" for information necessary to determine which accounts are United States accounts; fails to provide name, address, Taxpayer Identification Number, and account-number information to an FFI for United States accounts; or fails, upon an FFI's request, to waive the applicability of a foreign law that would (but for a valid and effective waiver by the account holder) otherwise prohibit disclosure of such information. 26 U.S.C. § 1471(d)(6).

[6] We decline to address whether the 30% deduction is a tax or a penalty.

[7] The IGAs are the principal means by which an FFI may be treated as complying with FATCA under 26 U.S.C. § 1471(b)(2), discussed above.

[8] Plaintiffs' Roe analogy also fails when individual account holders are compared to the plaintiffs in Roe: the account holders' options are not "close your account or pay the penalty," but rather "close your account, pay the penalty, or keep your account open while filing the required paperwork to do so." This is unlike Roe where a woman seeking an abortion that was not otherwise permitted had no "third option": the only options were to seek an illicit abortion or to decline to have the abortion in the first place. A similar analogy could be drawn to highway-speed laws: a motorist wishing to travel quickly, perhaps to transport perishable goods or to visit an ill relative, has only the option to speed (and risk a traffic citation) or to comply with the law (and risk having spoiled goods or missing the death of a relative). In such a situation, the motorist might well be able to argue that the injury of having spoiled goods or missing the death of the relative was fairly traceable to the speed-limit law. But this situation would not be like the Plaintiffs' situation here—rather, it would be analogous to the Plaintiffs' situation here if the motorist had a third option of speeding upon condition of filing paperwork with the state attesting to the reasons why speeding is necessary. Perhaps if that paperwork itself were difficult to file, an injury could arise from the time and trouble spent filing it—but, notably, Plaintiffs stated at oral argument that they do not assert that the time and trouble of filing FATCA paperwork is itself an injury for standing purposes.

[9] We note that Senator Paul introduced a bill to repeal FATCA in April 2017. S. 869, 115th Cong. (2017).

PROCEEDINGS (in chambers): ORDER GRANTING IN PART AND DENYING IN PART THE GOVERNMENT'S MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT REDUCING PENALTY ASSESSMENT TO JUDGMENT [Docket No. 23]; ORDER GRANTING IN PART AND DENYING IN PART DEFENDANT'S MOTION FOR JUDGMENT ON THE PLEADINGS [Docket No. 27]

THE HONORABLE S. JAMES OTERO, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

1 These matters are before the Court on Plaintiff the United States of America's ("Plaintiff" or the "Government") Motion for Summary Judgment Reducing Penalty Assessments to Judgment ("Motion"), filed October 27, 2015, and Defendant Letantia Bussell's ("Defendant") Motion for Judgment on the Pleadings ("Defendant's Motion"), filed November 3, 2015. Defendant opposed the Motion ("Opposition")[1] on November 16, 2015, and the Government replied ("Reply") on November 18, 2015. The Government opposed Defendant's Motion ("Government's Opposition") on November 9, 2015, and Defendant did not Reply. The Court found these matters suitable for disposition without oral argument and vacated the hearings set for December 7, 2015. See Fed.R.Civ.P. 78(b). For the following reasons, the Motion is GRANTED IN PART and DENIED IN PART. Defendant's Motion is GRANTED IN PART and DENIED IN PART.

I. FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

A. Factual Background

Defendant was married to John Bussell ("Mr.Bussell") from 1972 until his death in 2002. (Index of Exs. and Decls. in Supp. of Pl.'s Mot. ("Index"), ECF No. 24–1, Ex. 11 ¶ 3.) Defendant is a licensed physician who specializes in dermatology. Bussell v. Comm'r, 130 T.C. 222, 224 (2008). Defendant has maintained a dermatology practice in Beverly Hills, California since 1979. Id. From 1981 through approximately 1995, when Defendant filed for bankruptcy, Defendant conducted her medical practice through various corporations, including Letantia Bussell M.D. Inc. Id.

Before Mr. Bussell and Defendant (collectively, the "Bussells") filed for bankruptcy in 1995, the Bussells restructured Defendant's medical practice to conceal her interest in the practice. (Index, Ex. 21 at IOE_000104–105.)[2] The Bussells funneled Defendant's profits between 1993 and 1995, which totaled $1,149,048, into a non-interest bearing account with Sanwa Bank ("Sanwa Account"). The Bussells maintained control over the Sanwa Account, but the Sanwa Account was under the name of BBL Medical Management, Inc. ("BBL"). (Index, Ex. 21, at IOE_000105.) In January 1996, Defendant transferred the balance of the Sanwa Account to a personal bank account at Swiss Bank Corp. Bussell v. Comm'r, T.C. Memo.2005–77, 2005 WL 775755 at *4 (April 7, 2005). Swiss Bank Corp. later became known as UBS AG. (Index, Ex. 11 ¶ 2.) The Defendant failed to disclose the funds from the Sanwa Account and her interest in the Swiss account in her 1996 tax return. Id.

B. The Subject Account and Defendant's Tax Filings

2 On January 29, 1997, the Bussells opened a second bank account with Swiss Bank Corp., account no. xxxx3235 (the "Subject Account"). (See Index, Ex. 4; Ex. 11 ¶ 2.) As part of the process of opening the Subject Account, the Bussells signed a Swiss Bank Corp. document naming themselves as the beneficial owners of the account. (See Index, Ex. 4. at IOE_000011.) The Bussells also signed a Swiss Bank Corp. document entitled "General power of attorney" granting Todd John Bussell, their son, signature authority over the Subject Account. (Index, Ex. 4 at IOE_000015.) Defendant also had signature authority over the Subject Account. (Index, Ex. 4 at IOE_000014.)

On October 15, 2007, Defendant filed her individual income tax return for the 2006 tax year. (See Index, Ex. 4.) In her 2006 tax return, Defendant did not report the interest income earned from the Subject Account. (Index, Ex. 11 ¶ 6.) Furthermore, Defendant did not file a Treasury Department Form 90–22.1, Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts ("FBAR Form"), disclosing her financial interest in the Subject Account for the 2006 tax year. (Index, Ex. 11 ¶ 6.) During 2006, the Subject Account had a balance that exceeded $10,000. (Index, Ex. 11 ¶ 4.) On December 31, 2006, the Subject Account had a balance of $2,241,027. (Index, Ex. 11 ¶ 5.)

On October 23, 2007, Todd Bussell wrote to UBS AG and asked the bank to liquidate the Subject Account, as well as a second account, and requested that the balances be transferred to two accounts at Finter Bank Zurich. Todd Bussell requested that 50% of the balances be transferred to an account with Wakaduku Foundation as the beneficiary ("Wakaduku Account"), and the other 50% transferred to an account with Valmadera Foundation as the beneficiary ("Valmadera Account"). (Plaintiff's Proposed Statement of Uncontroverted Facts ("PSUF"), ECF No. 23–1, ¶ 16; See also Index, Ex. 5 at IOE 000018.)

Several transfers then occurred between the Subject Account and the other accounts. On November 1, 2007, the Subject Account had zero balance. (Index, Ex. 5 at IOE 000021.) On November 9, 2007, the Subject Account had a closing balance of $2,918,299.28. (Index Ex. 5 at IOE 000021.) Pursuant to Todd Bussell's request, on November 13, 2007, UBS AG made three separate payments to the Wakaduku Account and the Valmadera Account. (Index Ex. 5 at IOE 000022.) By November, 14, 2007, the Subject Account had zero balance again. (Index Ex. 5 at IOE 000022.)

C. History of Legal Proceedings Against the Bussells

On May 3, 2000, an Indictment was filed against the Bussells in the Central District of California. (Index, Ex. 18 at IOE_000074.) On January 31, 2002, a Redacted First Superseding Indictment (the "Indictment") was filed against the Bussells in which the Government brought various counts related to bankruptcy fraud and attempted tax evasion. (PSUF ¶ 3.)

On February 6, 2002, a jury convicted Defendant of the following: (1) one count of violating 18 U.S.C. § 371 (conspiracy to commit an offense against or defraud the United States); (2) two counts of violating 18 U.S.C. § 152(1) (concealment of assets in bankruptcy); (3) two counts of violating 18 U.S.C. § 152(3) (false declaration and statement as to avoid material matters); and (4) one count of violating 26 U.S.C. § 7201 and 18 U.S.C. § 2 (evading payment of income tax). (PSUF ¶ 3.)

After the conviction, on or about April 29, 2002, the Internal Revenue Service ("IRS") issued a jeopardy levy with regard to the Bussells' income tax liabilities for 1983, 1984, 1986, and 1987. (Index, Ex. 21, at IOE_000107.) The IRS also approved a jeopardy assessment against the Bussells for the 1996 tax year ("1996 Assessment"). The total amount of the jeopardy levy/assessment was $3.4 million, with $1,283,522 attributable to the 1996 tax year and the remaining $2,116,478 to the 1980s. (Index, Ex. 21, at IOE_000107.) The government explained that it levied a jeopardy assessment in part because:

> 3 [I]n 1996 [Defendant] received $1,149,048 from financial accounts which were previously undisclosed and not reported on [Defendant's] Individual Income Tax Return Form 1040 for this period. These funds were concealed as part of the conspiracy to commit bankruptcy fraud.

(Index, Ex. 21, at IOE_000115.)

On August 23, 2002, Defendant filed a complaint in federal district court seeking review of the 1996 Assessment pursuant to 26 U.S.C. § 7429(b). (PSUF ¶ 4.) On December 11, 2002, the Court issued an order granting the Government's motion for summary judgment and denying Defendant's motion for summary judgment. (PSUF ¶ 5.) The Court held that the IRS's jeopardy determination was reasonable because Defendant's criminal history demonstrated that she had failed to report income and engaged in a scheme to hide assets from the IRS in an attempt to defeat the collection of unpaid taxes. (PSUF ¶ 5.)

While the jeopardy case was pending, Defendant filed a petition with the United States Tax Court (the "Tax Court") seeking a redetermination of deficiency in the Bussells' 1996 taxes, as well as a redetermination of the civil tax fraud penalty imposed by the IRS pursuant to 26 U.S.C. § 6663(a). (PSUF ¶ 7.) The Tax Court concluded that the Bussells maintained, and failed to report, two foreign bank accounts in their 1996 tax return, a Swiss account and a "Syntex" bank account. Bussell v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, T.C. Memo.2005–77, 2005 WL 775755 at *4 (April 7, 2005). The Tax Court held that Defendant was liable for the civil fraud penalty imposed pursuant to 26 U.S.C. § 6663(a), a decision that was affirmed by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals. (PSUF ¶ 8.)

D. Procedural History of the Instant Case

On June 5, 2013, the IRS assessed against the Defendant an FBAR penalty in the amount of $1,221,806 ("Assessment") for her alleged willful failure to disclose and report her interest in the Subject Account for the 2006 tax year. (Index, Ex. 1.) On March 19, 2015, the Government initiated the instant action to recover from the Defendant the Assessment and to reduce the Assessment to a judgment against Defendant. (See generally Compl., ECF No. 1; Mot., ECF No. 23.) The Government seeks a judgment ordering Defendant to pay $1,361,694.41, which includes the Assessment, the penalty for failure-to-pay the Assessment, and interest as of January 23, 2015, plus any accruing interest thereafter. (See generally Compl.; Index, Ex. 2.)

II. DISCUSSION

A. Legal Standard for Judgment on the Pleadings

"After the pleadings are closed but within such time as not to delay the trial, any party may move for judgment on the pleadings." Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(c) ("Rule 12(c)"). "The principal difference between motions filed pursuant to [Federal Rule of Civil Procedure] 12(b) and Rule 12(c) is the time of filing. Because the motions are functionally identical, the same standard of review applicable to a Rule 12(b) motion applies to its Rule 12(c) analog." Dworkin v. Hustler Magazine Inc., 867 F.2d 1188, 1192 (9th Cir.1989). In considering a motion for judgment on the pleadings, "[a]ll allegations of material fact are taken as true and construed in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party." Buckey v. Cnty. of L.A., 968 F.2d 791, 794 (9th Cir.1992) (citation omitted). A complaint should not be dismissed "unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief." Gibson v. United States, 781 F.2d 1334, 1337 (9th Cir.1986) (citation omitted). Judgment on the pleadings is proper when "there is no issue of material fact in dispute, and the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law." Fleming v. Pickard, 581 F.3d 922, 925 (9th Cir.2009).

B. Legal Standard for Summary Judgment Motion

4 Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56(a) mandates that "[t]he court shall grant summary judgment if the movant shows that there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law." Fed.R.Civ.P. 56(a). The moving party bears the initial burden of establishing the absence of a genuine issue of material fact. See Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 323 (1986). "When the party moving for summary judgment would bear the burden of proof at trial, it must come forward with evidence which would entitle it to a directed verdict if the evidence went uncontroverted at trial. In such a case, the moving party has the initial burden of establishing the absence of a genuine issue of fact on each issue material to its case." C.A.R. Transp. Brokerage Co. v. Darden Rests., Inc., 213 F.3d 474, 480 (9th Cir.2000) (citations omitted).

In contrast, when the nonmoving party bears the burden of proving the claim or defense, the moving party does not need to produce any evidence or prove the absence of a genuine issue of material fact. See Celotex, 477 U.S. at 325. Rather, the moving party's initial burden "may be discharged by 'showing'–that is, pointing out to the District Court–that there is an absence of evidence to support the nonmoving party's case." Id. "Summary judgment for a defendant is appropriate when the plaintiff 'fails to make a showing sufficient to establish the existence of an element essential to [his] case, and on which [he] will bear the burden of proof at trial.' " Cleveland v. Policy Mgmt. Sys. Corp., 526 U.S. 795, 805–06 (1999) (quoting Celotex, 477 U.S. at 322).

Once the moving party meets its initial burden, the "party asserting that a fact cannot be or is genuinely disputed must support the assertion." Fed.R.Civ.P. 56(c)(1). "The mere existence of a scintilla of evidence in support of the [nonmoving party]'s position will be insufficient; there must be evidence on which the jury could reasonably find for the [nonmoving party]." Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 252 (1986); accord Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 586 (1986) ("[O]pponent must do more than simply show that there is some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts."). Further, "[o]nly disputes over facts that might affect the outcome of the suit ... will properly preclude the entry of summary judgment [and f]actual disputes that are irrelevant or unnecessary will not be counted." Anderson, 477 U.S. at 248. At the summary judgment stage, a court does not make credibility determinations or weigh conflicting evidence. See Id. at 249. A court is required to draw all inferences in a light most favorable to the nonmoving party. Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 587.

In the instant case, the Government argues that it is entitled to summary judgment, ordering Defendant to pay an FBAR penalty of $1,361,694.41, because Defendant willfully violated the FBAR tax regulations by failing to report or otherwise disclose her interest in the Subject Account for 2006. (Mot.2.) Defendant responds by alleging a series of affirmative defenses. The Court begins by considering the Government's argument and then turns to the Defendant's affirmative defenses, as alleged in her briefing on the Government's Motion as well as Defendant's Motion for Judgment on the Pleadings.

C. Section 5314 Violation

Section 5314 of Title 31 of the United States Code authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to require United States citizens to report certain transactions with foreign financial agencies. 31 U.S.C. § 5314. Under the implementing regulations of § 5314, "[e]ach United States person having a financial interest in, or signature or other authority over, a bank, securities, or other financial account in a foreign country shall report such relationship" to the IRS for each year in which such relationship exists, and shall provide such information on the FBAR Form. 31 C.F.R. § 1010.350(a). United States citizens who have an interest in a foreign bank, securities, or other financial account must report that interest to the IRS by June 30 of the year following any calendar year in which the aggregate balance of such account exceeded, at any time during the year, $10,000. 31 C.F.R. § 1010.306(c). If any person willfully fails to timely report interest in a foreign bank, securities, or other financial account to the IRS, then the maximum penalty shall be increased to the greater of either (1) $100,000, or (2) fifty percent of the balance in the account at the time of the violation. 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(C)-(D).

1. FBAR Violation

5 The Court grants summary judgment to the Government on the issue of whether Defendant violated the FBAR tax regulations. Defendant stipulates and agrees not to argue against the allegations that (1) Defendant is a United States citizen, (2) in 2006, Defendant had a financial interest in the Subject Account,[3] (3) in 2006, the Subject Account had a balance that exceeded $10,000, and (4) Defendant failed to report her interest in the Subject Account for the 2006 tax year. (See generally Index, Ex. 11.)

The Government's Motion is GRANTED to the extent that the Defendant violated § 5314 and its implementing regulations by failing to report her interest in the Subject Account for the 2006 tax year.

2. Willfulness

The Court further finds that the Government is entitled to summary judgment on the issue of Defendant's willfulness. Defendant stipulates and agrees not to argue against the allegations that (1) Defendant willfully failed to file an FBAR Form reporting her financial interest in the Subject Account for the 2006 tax year, and (2) Defendant willfully failed to report her financial interest in the Subject Account on her 2006 federal income tax return. (See generally Index, Ex. 11.)

Moreover, the record demonstrates that Defendant was willful in failing to report her financial interest in the Subject Account. Although § 5321(a)(5) does not define willfulness, courts adjudicating civil tax matters have held that an individual is willful where he/she exhibits a reckless disregard of a statutory duty. See Safeco Ins. Co. of Am. v. Burr, 551 U.S. 47, 57 (2007). Here, Defendant clearly acted with reckless disregard. Defendant has been convicted of bankruptcy fraud and tax fraud for her failure to disclose offshore accounts, and Defendant has been subjected to civil penalties for her failure to disclose offshore bank accounts. (See generally, supra Section I(C).) Defendant is aware of her statutory duty to report offshore accounts. Nevertheless, Defendant filed her 2006 tax return without reporting the Subject Account, and without filing an FBAR Form. Instead of reporting the Subject Account, Defendant liquidated the Subject Account shortly after filing her tax returns.

Accordingly, the Government's Motion is GRANTED to the extent that Defendant willfully failed to report her interest in the Subject Account for 2006. Pursuant to 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(C)-(D), the IRS assessed an FBAR penalty against Defendant. [4]

3. Affirmative Defenses

Defendant spends the bulk of her Opposition and her Motion for Judgment on the Pleadings asserting the following affirmative defenses against the penalty Assessment: (1) because the Subject Account was the subject of prior legal proceedings against Defendant, the Assessment violates the constitutional protection against double jeopardy, (2) the Assessment is precluded by the applicable statute of limitations ("SOL"), (3) the Assessment is fundamentally unfair, as against Defendant's due process rights, (4) laches bar the Assessment, (5) the Assessment violates the Ex Post Facto Clause, (6) the Assessment violates the Excessive Fines Clause of the Eight Amendment, and (7) the Government's use of banking evidence in this case is not permitted by a United States treaty with Switzerland. (Def.'s Opp'n Pl.'s Mot. Summ. J. ("Opp'n"), EFC No. 29, 1.) The Court considers each of the defenses in turn and ultimately reduces the FBAR penalty judgment, based on Eighth Amendment concerns. [5]

a. Double Jeopardy

6 Defendant begins by contending that the present Assessment action by the Government violates the Fifth Amendment's protection against double jeopardy. Defendant asserts that the funds from the Sanwa Account, which amounted to $1,149,048, were transferred to the Subject Account in 1997, and that she has already been punished for her failure to report these funds. (See Def.'s Mot. for J. on the Pleadings ("Def.'s Mot."), ECF No. 27, 1; Def.'s Opp'n Pl.'s Mot. Summ. J. ("Opp'n"), EFC No. 29, 3.)

The Court finds that no reasonable jury could find that the Subject Account was the subject of Defendant's prior legal proceedings, and therefore, GRANTS summary judgment to the Government and DENIES Defendant's Motion on this affirmative defense. The Bussells had at least two accounts in Switzerland, and the Defendant conflates these two accounts in her briefing. The Bussells transferred the full balance of the Sanwa Account to "a Swiss account" at Swiss Bank Corp, and the last transfer to this Swiss account was on or about June 11, 1996. Bussell v. Commissioner, T.C. Memo.2005–77, 2005 WL 775755 at *4–5 (April 7, 2005). The Bussells then opened the Subject Account, a second Swiss account, on January 29, 1997. (See Index, Ex. 4.) The funds from the Sanwa Account, which were the subject of prior penalties, could not have been transferred to the Subject Account because the Sanwa Account funds were transferred to the first account in 1996, six months before the Subject Account even existed.

b. Statute of Limitations

The Court next determines whether the IRS assessed the FBAR penalty outside the applicable SOL. The Secretary of the Treasury may assess a civil penalty for willfully failing to timely report financial interests in foreign accounts "at any time before the end of the 6–year period beginning on the date of the transaction with respect to which the penalty is assessed." 31 U.S.C. § 5321(b)(1). Pursuant to 31 C.F.R. § 1010.306(c), the deadline to report any interest in foreign accounts is "June 30 of the year following any calendar year in which the aggregate balance of such account exceeded, at any time during the year, $10,000."

The Defendant argues that the SOL began to run no later than June 30, 2002, because the Government has known about the Subject Account ever since it issued a jeopardy assessment on April 29, 2002 for funds Defendant deposited in the Subject Account. (Opp'n 3.) The Defendant also argues that, because the SOL began to run on June 30, 2002, the last day to assess an FBAR penalty would have been on June 30, 2008. (Opp'n 3.)

The Court disagrees with Defendant, GRANTS summary judgment to the Government, and DENIES Defendant's Motion on this affirmative defense. The SOL began to run on June 30, 2007, not June 30, 2002. The former date represents the Defendant's statutory deadline for reporting her financial interest in the Subject Account for the 2006 tax year. See Moore v. United States, No. 13–CV–02063–RAJ, 2015 WL 1510007 at* 2 (April 1, 2015) (holding that the six-year limitations period for assessing an FBAR civil penalty for 2005 would have run on July 1, 2012, six years after the June 30, 2006 deadline for submitting an FBAR for 2005). The IRS assessed Defendant's FBAR penalty on June 5, 2013, which is less than a month before June 30, 2013, the last day to assess an FBAR penalty against Defendant, based on a violation that took place on June 30, 2007.

c. Due Process

The Court next determines whether the Assessment violates Defendant's due process rights. Although procedural due process is a notoriously difficult right to define, this right generally expresses the principle that a litigant is entitled to fundamental fairness in court and administrative proceedings. See Lassiter v. Dep't of Soc. Servs. of Durham Cnty., 452 U.S. 18, 25 (1981).

7 Here, Defendant's due process argument is essentially a restatement of the SOL defense. According to Defendant, the Assessment is fundamentally unfair because the Government delayed the instant action. (Opp'n 6.) Defendant contends that the Government knew of the Subject Account in 2002, but the Government waited until 2013 to issue the Assessment. (Opp'n 6.) Defendant also argues that the IRS chose 2006 as the assessment year because in 2004 "Congress ... increased the maximum penalty from $100,000 to a theoretical number" allowing the IRS to maximize the penalty. (Opp'n 6.)

The Court GRANTS summary judgment to the Government and DENIES Defendant's Motion on the due process defense. Even if a jury could find that the Government had knowledge of the Subject Account in 2002, the Government's instant claim did not arise until June 30, 2007, when the Defendant failed to timely report the Subject Account in her 2006 tax return.

d. Laches

Defendant goes on to contend that the IRS unreasonably delayed the Assessment and that the Defendant is therefore, entitled to the affirmative defense of laches. (Opp'n 6.) Defendant's laches affirmative defense fails for the same reasons as the due process defense. The Government's claim here did not arise until 2007, and the Court GRANTS summary judgment to the Government and DENIES Defendant's Motion on the laches defense.

e. Ex Post Facto

The Court next considers Defendant's claim that the IRS Assessment violates the Ex Post Facto Clause of the Constitution. "The Constitution of the United States, Article 1, Section 9, prohibits the Legislature of the United States from passing any ex post facto law." Calder v. Bull, 3 U.S. 386, 389 (1798). An ex post facto law is one which imposes a punishment for an act which was not punishable when it was committed, or imposes additional punishment. Id. at 390.

Defendant argues that because Congress amended the applicable tax statute in 2004, the Assessment amounts to an ex post facto penalty, because the Government had knowledge of the Subject Account in 2002. In 2004, Congress increased the maximum penalty for willful FBAR violations from $100,000 to up to 50 percent of the highest aggregate balance in the account during the taxable year at the time of the violation. 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(C)(i). The Government responds that the Ex Post Facto Clause does not apply because Defendant's willful violation of the law occurred more than two years after the law was amended in 2004.

The Court GRANTS summary judgment to the Government and DENIES Defendant's Motion on the ex post facto defense. The Government imposed the FBAR penalty based on Defendant's conduct related to her 2007 tax return, which was filed more than two years after the applicable law was amended in 2004.

f. Excessive Fines

Defendant next contends that the Assessment violates the Excessive Fines Clause of the Eighth Amendment to the Constitution. See United States v. Bajakajian, 524 U.S. 321, 328–29 (1998). Unlike the bulk of Defendant's affirmative defenses, this argument has some merit.

In Bajakajian, the Supreme Court held that "a punitive forfeiture violates the Excessive Fines Clause if it is grossly disproportional to the gravity of a defendant's offense." Id. at 334. Although the Bajakajian court did not set a rigid set of factors to consider in conducting the proportionality inquiry, the Supreme Court did consider: (1) the nature and extent of the crime, (2) whether the violation was related to other illegal activities, (3) the other penalties that may be imposed for the violation, and (4) the extent of the harm caused. See id. at 337–340; see also United States v. $100,348.00 in U.S. Currency, 354 F.3d 1110, 1122 (9th Cir.2004); Balice v. United States Dep't of Agric., 203 F.3d 684, 698–99 (9th Cir.2000).

8 Although it is a somewhat close call, the Court holds that an FBAR penalty of $1,221,806 violates the Excessive Fines Clause. For the reasons set out below, the Court reduces the Government's Assessment to $1,120,513, to comport with Eighth Amendment requirements.

i. Nature of Offense and Relationship to Other Illegal Activities

Defendant argues that the Assessment is excessive because Defendant's offense is solely a reporting offense, not a serious crime. Furthermore, Defendant argues that there is nothing to show that the funds themselves were involved in or derived from any kind of illegal activity. (Opp'n 16; Def's Mot. 11.)

The Court concludes that the nature of Defendant's alleged offense and the relationship of the offense to other illegal activities do not favor either the Defendant or the Government's position on the applicability of the Excessive Fines Clause. On the one hand, Defendant's offense, tax evasion, is not as serious as some crimes that ultimately trigger civil forfeiture actions. On the other hand, Defendant clearly fits into the class of persons targeted by the Bank Secrecy Act, namely those evading taxes through the use of offshore bank accounts. See Bajakajian, 524 U.S. at 338. In Bajakajian, the Supreme Court emphasized that the civil forfeiture at issue violated the Eighth Amendment because the defendant, Bajakajian, did not fit into the class of persons for whom the forfeiture statute was principally designed: money launderers, drug traffickers, and tax evaders. Id. Moreover, in the instant case, Defendant has not carried her burden to show that the money at issue was derived from a lawful source, which would trigger stronger Eight Amendment protections. See Balice, 203 F.3d at 684.

ii. Maximum Criminal and Civil Penalties

The maximum criminal penalty for Defendant's crime, tax evasion, militates in favor of finding that the Government's Assessment violates the Excessive Fines Clause. See Bajakajian, 524 U.S. at 338. Under 31 U.S.C § 5322(a), the maximum authorized penalty for a willful criminal violation of 31 U.S.C. § 5314 is a five year sentence and a $250,000 fine. 31 U.S.C § 5322(a). Defendant's FBAR penalty is $1,221,806, which is almost five times the maximum amount allowed in the criminal statute.

In conducting the Eighth Amendment inquiry, the Court also considers the maximum penalty authorized by the civil statute applicable to Defendant's conduct. See Bajakajian, 524 U.S. at 33740. Under 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(C), the IRS can assess a civil penalty of up to 50% of the balance of an account at issue, for a willful violation of the tax statute. Under this provision, Defendant should have been subjected to a maximum penalty of $1,120,513.00, which is $101,293 less than the Assessment amount.

iii. Harm Caused

Defendant argues that the only harm here is her alleged failure to report the Subject Account to the Government. (Opp'n 16.) Defendant further contends that her omission cannot be considered fraud because the Government was already aware of the Subject Account, and any harm caused by the failure to pay taxes is minimal. (Opp'n 16.)

The Court disagrees with Defendant's contentions. In Bajakajian, the harm caused was minimal because there was no fraud on the Government and no loss to the public. The Government charged Bajakajian with attempting to leave the United States without reporting that he was transporting more than $10,000 in currency outside the United States, as required by 31 U.S.C. § 5316(a)(1)(A). Had his crime gone undetected, the Government would have been deprived of the information that $357,144.00 had left the country. Here, on the other hand, the Defendant willfully committed fraud by failing to report her interests in the Subject Account in her 2006 tax return. This action imposed a tax loss on the public. See Vasudeva v. United States, 214 F.3d 1155, 1161–62 (9th Cir.2000).

iv. Conclusion on Defendant's Excessive Fines Claim

9 After weighing each of the factors relevant to the Excessive Fines inquiry, the Court concludes that the Assessment imposed by the Government raises some Eighth Amendment concerns because the Assessment exceeds the maximum penalty set out in the applicable criminal and civil statutes. The Court GRANTS IN PART and DENIES IN PART the Government's Motion for Summary Judgment, GRANTS Defendant's Motion on the Eighth Amendment claim, and decreases the penalty imposed from $1,221,806 to $1,120,513. Cf. 18 U.S.C. § 983(g)(4) (2006) ("If the court finds that the forfeiture is grossly disproportional to the offense it shall reduce or eliminate the forfeiture as necessary to avoid a violation of the Excessive Fines Clause of the Eighth Amendment of the Constitution.") This amount represents the maximum amount permitted under the applicable civil statute.

g. Treaty with Switzerland

Defendant's Motion vaguely asserts that the Government illegitimately obtained information concerning Defendant's Swiss Account from the Swiss government. (Def's Mot. 8.) Defendant contends that, pursuant to a treaty between the United States and Switzerland, the United States government can only receive information from the Swiss government pertaining to tax violations.

To the extent Defendant attempts to make out an affirmative defense based on the treaty between the United States and Switzerland, the Court GRANTS summary judgment to the Government and DENIES Defendant's Motion on this affirmative defense. The instant case is clearly a tax collection case, and it is unclear how the Government's conduct runs aground of the treaty.

IV. RULING

For the foregoing reasons, the Court DENIES IN PART and GRANTS IN PART the Government's Motion for Summary Judgment. Defendant also filed a Motion for Judgment on the Pleadings while the Government's Motion for Summary Judgment was pending before this Court. The Court DENIES IN PART and GRANTS IN PART Defendant's Motion. The Court notes that the Defendant is liable for interest on the penalty amount of $1,120,513. (Mot.14.) Within ten (10) days from the date of this order, the Government shall file a proposed judgment consistent with the Court's findings and conclusions.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

[1] Defendant exceeded the twenty-page limit, in violation of the Court's Initial Standing Order. In the interest of considering the Motion on its merits, the Court adjudicates the two pages that exceeded the twenty page limit, but cautions Defendant to carefully read and comply with the Court's Standing Order.

[2] Pursuant to Federal Rule of Evidence 201, the Court takes judicial notice of Exhibits 18 through 23 of the Index of Exhibits filed concurrently with the Government's Request for Judicial Notice. [3] Defendant named herself as the beneficial owner of the Subject Account, and Defendant also had signature authority over the Subject Account. (See Index, Ex. 4.) Thus, Defendant had a financial interest in the Subject Account.

[4] Defendant stipulates and agrees not to argue against the allegation that the maximum balance in the Subject Account for the 2006 tax year was $2,241,027. (Index, Ex. 11 ¶ 5.)

[5] Defendants did not expressly plead in their answer defenses based on due process, the ex post facto clause, or the improper use of evidence based on a treaty with Switzerland. (See Answer, ECF No. 9.) In the interest of deciding this case on the merits, the Court addresses and ultimately denies these defenses.

Synopsis
Background: Consumers brought class actions against insurers in connection with automobile or homeowners policies, alleging violation of Fair Credit Reporting Act (FCRA) via failure to transmit adverse action notices reflecting negative credit reports. The United States District Court for the District of Oregon, Anna J. Brown, J., granted summary judgment for insurers in both actions, 2003 WL 22722061, and consumers appealed. Appeals were consolidated. The Court of Appeals, per curiam, 140 Fed.Appx. 746, and after withdrawing its prior opinion at 416 F.3d 1097, per Reinhardt, Circuit Judge, 435 F.3d 1081, reversed and remanded. Certiorari was granted.

Holdings: The Supreme Court, Justice Souter, held that:

[1] willful failure covered violation committed in reckless disregard of FCRA notice obligation, abrogating Wantz v. Experian Information Solutions, 386 F.3d 829, and Phillips v. Grendahl, 312 F.3d 357;

[2] initial rates charged for new insurance policies may be "adverse actions" under FCRA; and

[3] one insurer did not violate FCRA, and while the other insurer might have, it did not act recklessly.

Reversed and remanded.

Justice Stevens filed opinion concurring in part and concurring in judgment in which Justice Ginsburg joined.

Justice Thomas filed opinion concurring in part in which Justice Alito joined.

*2202 *47 Syllabus [*]

The Fair Credit Reporting Act (FCRA) requires notice to a consumer subjected to "adverse action ... based in whole or in part on any information contained in a consumer [credit] report." 15 U.S.C. § 1681m(a). As applied to insurance companies, "adverse action" is "a denial or cancellation of, an increase in any charge for, or a reduction or other adverse or unfavorable change in the terms of coverage or amount of, any insurance, existing or applied for." § 1681a(k)(1)(B)(i). FCRA provides a private right of action against businesses that use consumer reports but fail to comply. A negligent violation entitles a consumer to actual damages, § 1681*o* (a), and a willful one entitles the consumer to actual, statutory, and even punitive damages, § 1681n(a).

Petitioners in No. 06–100 (GEICO) use an applicant's credit score to select the appropriate subsidiary insurance company and the particular rate at which a policy may be issued. GEICO sends an adverse action notice only if a neutral credit score would have put the applicant in a lower priced tier or company; the applicant is not otherwise told if he would have gotten better terms with a better credit score. Respondent Edo's credit score was taken into account when GEICO issued him a policy, but GEICO sent no adverse action notice because his company and tier placement would have been the same with a *2203 neutral score. Edo filed a proposed class action, alleging willful violation of § 1681m(a) and seeking statutory and punitive damages under § 1681n(a). The District Court granted GEICO summary judgment, finding no adverse action because the premium would have been the same had Edo's credit history not been considered. Petitioners in No. 06–84 (Safeco) also rely on credit reports to set initial insurance premiums. Respondents Burr and Massey—whom Safeco offered higher than the best rates possible without sending adverse action notices—joined a proposed class action, alleging willful violation of § 1681m(a) and seeking statutory and punitive damages under § 1681n(a). The District Court granted Safeco summary judgment on the ground that offering a single, initial rate for insurance 48 cannot be "adverse action." The Ninth Circuit reversed both judgments. In GEICO's case, it held that an adverse action occurs whenever a consumer would have received a lower rate had his consumer report contained more favorable information. Since that would have happened to Edo, GEICO's failure to give notice was an adverse action. The court also held that an insurer willfully fails to comply with FCRA if it acts in reckless disregard of a consumer's FCRA rights, remanding for further proceedings on the reckless disregard issue. Relying on its decision in GEICO's case, the Ninth Circuit rejected the District Court's position in the Safeco case and remanded for further proceedings.

Held:

1. Willful failure covers a violation committed in reckless disregard of the notice obligation. Where willfulness is a statutory condition of civil liability, it is generally taken to cover not only knowing violations of a standard, but reckless ones as well. See, e.g., McLaughlin v. Richland Shoe Co., 486 U.S. 128, 133, 108 S.Ct. 1677, 100 L.Ed.2d 115. This construction reflects common law usage. The standard civil usage thus counsels reading § 1681n(a)'s phrase "willfully fails to comply" as reaching reckless FCRA violations, both on the interpretive assumption that Congress knows how this Court construes statutes and expects it to run true to form, see Commissioner v. Keystone Consol. Industries, Inc., 508 U.S. 152, 159, 113 S.Ct. 2006, 124 L.Ed.2d 71, and under the rule that a common law term in a statute comes with a common law meaning, absent anything pointing another way, Beck v. Prupis, 529 U.S. 494, 500–501, 120 S.Ct. 1608, 146 L.Ed.2d 561. Petitioners claim that § 1681n(a)'s drafting history points to a reading that liability attaches only to knowing violations, but the text as finally adopted points to the traditional understanding of willfulness in the civil sphere. Their other textual and structural arguments are also unpersuasive. Pp. 2208 – 2210.

2. Initial rates charged for new insurance policies may be adverse actions. Pp. 2210 – 2214.

(a) Reading the phrase "increase in any charge for ... any insurance, existing or applied for," § 1681a(k)(1)(B)(i), to include a disadvantageous rate even with no prior dealing fits with the ambitious objective of FCRA's statement of purpose, which uses expansive terms to describe the adverse effects of unfair and inaccurate credit reporting and the responsibilities of consumer reporting agencies. See § 1681(a). These descriptions do nothing to suggest that remedies for consumers disadvantaged by unsound credit ratings should be denied to first-time victims, and the legislative histories of both FCRA's original enactment and a 1996 amendment reveal no reason to confine attention to customers and businesses with prior dealings. Finally, nothing about insurance *2204 contracts suggests that Congress meant to differentiate applicants 49 from existing customers when it set the notice requirement; the newly insured who gets charged more owing to an erroneous report is in the same boat with the renewal applicant. Pp. 2210 – 2212.

(b) An increased rate is not "based in whole or in part on" a credit report under § 1681m(a) unless the report was a necessary condition of the increase. In common talk, "based on" indicates a but-for causal relationship and thus a necessary logical condition. Though some textual arguments point another way, it makes more sense to suspect that Congress meant to require notice and prompt a consumer challenge only when the consumer would gain something if the challenge succeeded. Pp. 2212.

(c) In determining whether a first-time rate is a disadvantageous increase, the baseline is the rate that the applicant would have received had the company not taken his credit score into account (the "neutral score" rate GEICO used in Edo's case). That baseline comports with the understanding that § 1681m(a) notice is required only when the credit report's effect on the initial rate is necessary to put the consumer in a worse position than other relevant facts would have decreed anyway. Congress was more likely concerned with the practical question whether the consumer's rate actually suffered when his credit report was taken into account than the theoretical question whether the consumer would have gotten a better rate with the best possible credit score, the baseline suggested by the Government and respondent-plaintiffs. The Government's objection to this reading is rejected. Although the rate initially offered for new insurance is an "increase" calling for notice if it exceeds the neutral rate, once a consumer has learned that his credit report led the insurer to charge more, he need not be told with each renewal if his rate has not changed. After initial dealing between the consumer and the insurer, the baseline for "increase" is the previous rate or charge, not the "neutral" baseline that applies at the start. Pp. 2213 – 2214.

3. GEICO did not violate the statute, and while Safeco might have, it did not act recklessly. Pp. 2214 – 2216.

(a) Because the initial rate GEICO offered Edo was what he would have received had his credit score not been taken into account, GEICO owed him no adverse action notice under § 1681m(a). Pp. 2214 – 2215.

(b) Even if Safeco violated FCRA when it failed to give Burr and Massey notice on the mistaken belief that § 1681m(a) did not apply to initial applications, the company was not reckless. The common law has generally understood "recklessness" in the civil liability sphere as conduct violating an objective standard: action entailing "an unjustifiably high risk of harm that is either known or so obvious that it should be known." Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 836, 114 S.Ct. 1970, 128 L.Ed.2d 811. There being no 50 indication that Congress had something different in mind, there is no reason to deviate from the common law understanding in applying the statute. See Beck v. Prupis, supra, at 500–501, 120 S.Ct. 1608. Thus, a company does not act in reckless disregard of FCRA unless the action is not only a violation under a reasonable reading of the statute, but shows that the company ran a risk of violating the law substantially greater than the risk associated with a reading that was merely careless. The negligence/recklessness line need not be pinpointed here, for Safeco's reading of the statute, albeit erroneous, was not objectively unreasonable. Section 1681a(k)(1)(B)(i) is silent on the point from *2205 which to measure "increase," and Safeco's reading has a foundation in the statutory text and a sufficiently convincing justification to have persuaded the District Court to adopt it and rule in Safeco's favor. Before these cases, no court of appeals had spoken on the issue, and no authoritative guidance has yet come from the Federal Trade Commission. Given this dearth of guidance and the less-than-pellucid statutory text, Safeco's reading was not objectively unreasonable, and so falls well short of raising the "unjustifiably high risk" of violating the statute necessary for reckless liability. Pp. 2214 – 2216.

Opinion

Justice SOUTER delivered the opinion of the Court. [*]

52 The Fair Credit Reporting Act (FCRA or Act) requires notice to any consumer subjected to "adverse action ... based in whole or in part on any information contained in a consumer [credit] report." 15 U.S.C. §

1681m(a). Anyone who "willfully fails" to provide notice is civilly liable to the consumer. § 1681n(a). The questions in these consolidated cases are whether willful failure covers a violation committed in reckless disregard of the notice obligation, and, if so, whether petitioners Safeco and GEICO committed reckless violations. We hold that reckless action is covered, that GEICO did not violate the statute, and that while Safeco might have, it did not act recklessly.

Congress enacted FCRA in 1970 to ensure fair and accurate credit reporting, promote efficiency in the banking system, and protect consumer privacy. See 84 *2206 Stat. 1128, 15 U.S.C. § 1681; TRW Inc. v. Andrews, 534 U.S. 19, 23, 122 S.Ct. 441, 151 L.Ed.2d 339 (2001). The Act requires, among other things, that "any person [who] takes any adverse action with respect to any consumer that is based in whole or in part on any information contained in a consumer report" must notify the affected consumer.[1] 53 15 U.S.C. § 1681m(a). The notice must point out the adverse action, explain how to reach the agency that reported on the consumer's credit, and tell the consumer that he can get a free copy of the report and dispute its accuracy with the agency. Ibid. As it applies to an insurance company, "adverse action" is "a denial or cancellation of, an increase in any charge for, or a reduction or other adverse or unfavorable change in the terms of coverage or amount of, any insurance, existing or applied for." § 1681a(k)(1)(B)(i).

FCRA provides a private right of action against businesses that use consumer reports but fail to comply. If a violation is negligent, the affected consumer is entitled to actual damages. § 1681*o* (a) (2000 ed., Supp. IV). If willful, however, the consumer may have actual damages, or statutory damages ranging from $100 to $1,000, and even punitive damages. § 1681n(a) (2000 ed.).

Petitioner GEICO[2] writes auto insurance through four subsidiaries: GEICO General, which sells "preferred" policies at low rates to low-risk customers; Government Employees, which also sells "preferred" policies, but only to government employees; GEICO Indemnity, which sells standard policies to moderate-risk customers; and GEICO Casualty, which sells nonstandard policies at higher rates to high-risk customers. Potential customers call a toll-free number answered by an agent of the four affiliates, who takes information and, with permission, gets the applicant's credit score.[3] 54 This information goes into GEICO's computer system, which selects any appropriate company and the particular rate at which a policy may be issued.

For some time after FCRA went into effect, GEICO sent adverse action notices to all applicants who were not offered "preferred" policies from GEICO General or Government Employees. GEICO changed its practice, however, after a method to "neutralize" an applicant's credit score was devised: the applicant's company and tier placement is compared with the company and tier placement he would have been assigned with a "neutral" credit score, that is, one calculated without reliance *2207 on credit history.[4] Under this new scheme, it is only if using a neutral credit score would have put the applicant in a lower priced tier or company that GEICO sends an adverse action notice; the applicant is not otherwise told if he would have gotten better terms with a better credit score.

Respondent Ajene Edo applied for auto insurance with GEICO. After obtaining Edo's credit score, GEICO offered him a standard policy with GEICO Indemnity (at rates higher than the most favorable), which he accepted. Because Edo's company and tier placement would have been the same with a neutral score, GEICO did not give Edo an adverse action notice. Edo later filed this proposed class action against GEICO, alleging willful failure to give notice in violation of § 1681m(a); he claimed no actual harm, but sought statutory and punitive damages under § 1681n(a). The District Court granted summary judgment for GEICO, finding 55 there was no adverse action when "the premium charged to [Edo] ... would have been the same even if GEICO Indemnity did not consider information in [his] consumer credit history." Edo v. GEICO Casualty Co., CV 02–678–BR, 2004 WL 3639689, *4, 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28522, *12 (D.Ore., Feb. 23, 2004), App. to Pet. for Cert. in No. 06–100, p. 46a.

Like GEICO, petitioner Safeco [5] relies on credit reports to set initial insurance premiums, [6] as it did for respondents Charles Burr and Shannon Massey, who were offered higher rates than the best rates possible. Safeco sent them no adverse action notices, and they later joined a proposed class action against the company, alleging willful violation of § 1681m(a) and seeking statutory and punitive damages under § 1681n(a). The District Court ordered summary judgment for Safeco, on the understanding that offering a single, initial rate for insurance cannot be "adverse action."

The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed both judgments. In GEICO's case, it held that whenever a consumer "would have received a lower rate for his insurance had the information in his consumer report been more favorable, an adverse action has been taken against him." Reynolds v. Hartford Financial Servs. Group, Inc., 435 F.3d 1081, 1093 (2006). Since a better credit score would have placed Edo with GEICO General, not GEICO Indemnity, the appeals court held that GEICO's failure to give notice was an adverse action.

The Ninth Circuit also held that an insurer "willfully" fails to comply with FCRA if it acts with "reckless disregard" of a consumer's rights under the Act. Id., at 1099. It explained that a company would not be acting recklessly if it "diligently and in good faith attempted to fulfill its statutory 56 obligations" and came to a "tenable, albeit erroneous, interpretation of the statute." Ibid. The court went on to say that "a deliberate failure to determine *2208 the extent of its obligations" would not ordinarily escape liability under § 1681n, any more than "reliance on creative lawyering that provides indefensible answers." Ibid. Because the court believed that the enquiry into GEICO's reckless disregard might turn on undisclosed circumstances surrounding GEICO's revision of its notification policy, the Court of Appeals remanded the company's case for further proceedings. [7]

In the action against Safeco, the Court of Appeals rejected the District Court's position, relying on its reasoning in GEICO's case (where it had held that the notice requirement applies to a single statement of an initial charge for a new policy). Spano v. Safeco Corp., 140 Fed.Appx. 746 (2005). The Court of Appeals also rejected Safeco's argument that its conduct was not willful, again citing the GEICO case, and remanded for further proceedings.

We consolidated the two matters and granted certiorari to resolve a conflict in the Circuits as to whether § 1681n(a) reaches reckless disregard of FCRA's obligations, [8] and to clarify the notice requirement in § 1681m(a). 548 U.S. 942, 127 S.Ct. 36, 165 L.Ed.2d 1014 (2006). We now reverse in both cases.

II

[1] [2] GEICO and Safeco argue that liability under § 1681n(a) for "willfully fail[ing] to comply" with FCRA goes only to acts 57 known to violate the Act, not to reckless disregard of statutory duty, but we think they are wrong. We have said before that "willfully" is a "word of many meanings whose construction is often dependent on the context in which it appears," Bryan v. United States, 524 U.S. 184, 191, 118 S.Ct. 1939, 141 L.Ed.2d 197 (1998) (internal quotation marks omitted); and where willfulness is a statutory condition of civil liability, we have generally taken it to cover not only knowing violations of a standard, but reckless ones as well, see McLaughlin v. Richland Shoe Co., 486 U.S. 128, 132–133, 108 S.Ct. 1677, 100 L.Ed.2d 115 (1988) ("willful," as used in a limitation provision for actions under the Fair Labor Standards Act, covers claims of reckless violation); Trans World Airlines, Inc. v. Thurston, 469 U.S. 111, 125–126, 105 S.Ct. 613, 83 L.Ed.2d 523 (1985) (same, as to a liquidated damages provision of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967); cf. United States v. Illinois Central R. Co., 303 U.S. 239, 242–243, 58 S.Ct. 533, 82 L.Ed. 773 (1938) ("willfully," as used in a civil penalty provision, includes " 'conduct marked by careless disregard whether or not one has the right so to act' " (quoting United States v. Murdock, 290 U.S. 389, 395, 54 S.Ct. 223, 78 L.Ed. 381 (1933))). This construction reflects common law usage, which treated actions in "reckless disregard" of the law as "willful" violations. See W. Keeton, D. Dobbs, R. Keeton, & D. Owen, Prosser and Keeton on Law of Torts § 34, p. 212 (5th ed.1984) (hereinafter Prosser and Keeton) ("Although efforts have been *2209 made to distinguish" the terms "willful," "wanton," and "reckless," "such distinctions have consistently been ignored, and the three terms have been treated as meaning the same thing, or at least as coming out at the same legal exit"). The standard civil usage thus counsels reading the phrase "willfully fails to comply" in § 1681n(a) as reaching reckless FCRA violations,[9] and this is so both on 58 the interpretive assumption that Congress knows how we construe statutes and expects us to run true to form, see Commissioner v. Keystone Consol. Industries, Inc., 508 U.S. 152, 159, 113 S.Ct. 2006, 124 L.Ed.2d 71 (1993), and under the general rule that a common law term in a statute comes with a common law meaning, absent anything pointing another way, Beck v. Prupis, 529 U.S. 494, 500–501, 120 S.Ct. 1608, 146 L.Ed.2d 561 (2000).

GEICO and Safeco argue that Congress did point to something different in FCRA, by a drafting history of § 1681n(a) said to show that liability was supposed to attach only to knowing violations. The original version of the Senate bill that turned out as FCRA had two standards of liability to victims: grossly negligent violation (supporting actual damages) and willful violation (supporting actual, statutory, and punitive damages). S. 823, 91st Cong., 1st Sess., § 1 (1969). GEICO and Safeco argue that since a "gross negligence" standard is effectively the same as a "reckless disregard" standard, the original bill's "willfulness" standard must have meant a level of culpability higher than "reckless disregard," or there would have been no requirement to show a different state of mind as a condition of the potentially much greater liability; thus, "willfully fails to comply" must have referred to a knowing violation. Although the gross negligence standard was reduced later in the legislative process to simple negligence (as it now appears in § 1681*o*), the provision 59 for willful liability remains unchanged and so must require knowing action, just as it did originally in the draft of § 1681n.

Perhaps. But Congress may have scaled the standard for actual damages down to simple negligence because it thought gross negligence, being like reckless action, was covered by willfulness. Because this alternative reading is possible, any inference from the drafting sequence is shaky, and certainly no match for the following clue in the text as finally adopted, which points to the traditional understanding of willfulness in the civil sphere.

The phrase in question appears in the preamble sentence of § 1681n(a): "Any person who willfully fails to comply with any requirement imposed under this subchapter *2210 with respect to any consumer is liable to that consumer ... ." Then come the details, in paragraphs (1)(A) and (1)(B), spelling out two distinct measures of damages chargeable against the willful violator. As a general matter, the consumer may get either actual damages or "damages of not less than $100 and not more than $1,000." § 1681n(a)(1)(A). But where the offender is liable "for obtaining a consumer report under false pretenses or knowingly without a permissible purpose," the statute sets liability higher: "actual damages ... or $1,000, whichever is greater." § 1681n(a)(1)(B).

If the companies were right that "willfully" limits liability under § 1681n(a) to knowing violations, the modifier "knowingly" in § 1681n(a)(1)(B) would be superfluous and incongruous; it would have made no sense for Congress to condition the higher damages under § 1681n(a) on knowingly obtaining a report without a permissible purpose if the general threshold of any liability under the section were knowing misconduct. If, on the other hand, "willfully" covers both knowing and reckless disregard of the law, knowing violations are sensibly understood as a more serious subcategory of willful ones, and both the preamble and the subsection have distinct jobs to do. See 60 United States v. Menasche, 348 U.S. 528, 538–539, 75 S.Ct. 513, 99 L.Ed. 615 (1955) (" '[G]ive effect, if possible, to every clause and word of a statute' " (quoting Montclair v. Ramsdell, 107 U.S. 147, 152, 2 S.Ct. 391, 27 L.Ed. 431 (1883))).

The companies make other textual and structural arguments for their view, but none is persuasive. Safeco thinks our reading would lead to the absurd result that one could, with reckless disregard, knowingly obtain a consumer report without a permissible purpose. But this is not so; action falling within the knowing subcategory does not simultaneously fall within the reckless alternative. Then both GEICO and Safeco argue that the reference to acting "knowingly and willfully" in FCRA's criminal enforcement provisions, §§ 1681q and 1681r, indicates that "willfully" cannot include recklessness. But we are now on the criminal side of the law, where the paired modifiers are often found, see, e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 1001 (2000 ed. and Supp. IV) (false statements to federal investigators); 20 U.S.C. § 1097(a) (embezzlement of student loan funds); 18 U.S.C. § 1542 (2000 ed. and Supp. IV) (false statements in a passport application). As we said before, in the criminal law "willfully" typically narrows the otherwise sufficient intent, making the government prove something extra, in contrast to its civil law usage, giving a plaintiff a choice of mental states to show in making a case for liability, see n.

9, supra. The vocabulary of the criminal side of FCRA is consequently beside the point in construing the civil side.

Before getting to the claims that the companies acted recklessly, we have the antecedent question whether either company violated the adverse action notice requirement at all. In both cases, respondent-plaintiffs' claims are premised on initial rates charged for new insurance policies, which are not "adverse" actions unless quoting or charging a first-time 61 premium is "an increase in any charge for ... any insurance, existing or applied for." 15 U.S.C. § 1681a(k)(1)(B)(i).

In Safeco's case, the District Court held that the initial rate for a new insurance policy cannot be an "increase" because there is no prior dealing. The phrase "increase in any charge for ... insurance" is readily understood to mean a change in *2211 treatment for an insured, which assumes a previous charge for comparison. See Webster's New International Dictionary 1260 (2d ed.1957) (defining "increase" as "[a]ddition or enlargement in size, extent, quantity, number, intensity, value, substance, etc.; augmentation; growth; multiplication"). Since the District Court understood "increase" to speak of change just as much as of comparative size or quantity, it reasoned that the statute's "increase" never touches the initial rate offer, where there is no change.

The Government takes the part of the Court of Appeals in construing "increase" to reach a first-time rate. It says that regular usage of the term is not as narrow as the District Court thought: the point from which to measure difference can just as easily be understood without referring to prior individual dealing. The Government gives the example of a gas station owner who charges more than the posted price for gas to customers he does not like; it makes sense to say that the owner increases the price and that the driver pays an increased price, even if he never pulled in there for gas before. See Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 26.[10] The Government implies, then, that reading "increase" requires a choice, and the chosen reading should be the broad one in order to conform to what Congress had in mind.

[3] 62 We think the Government's reading has the better fit with the ambitious objective set out in the Act's statement of purpose, which uses expansive terms to describe the adverse effects of unfair and inaccurate credit reporting and the responsibilities of consumer reporting agencies. See § 1681(a) (inaccurate reports "directly impair the efficiency of the banking system"; unfair reporting methods undermine public confidence "essential to the continued functioning of the banking system"; need to "insure" that reporting agencies "exercise their grave responsibilities" fairly, impartially, and with respect for privacy). The descriptions of systemic problem and systemic need as Congress saw them do nothing to suggest that remedies for consumers placed at a disadvantage by unsound credit ratings should be denied to first-time victims, and the legislative histories of FCRA's original enactment and of the 1996 amendment reveal no reason to confine attention to customers and businesses with prior dealings. Quite the contrary.[11] Finally, there is nothing about insurance contracts to suggest that Congress might have meant to differentiate applicants from existing customers when it set the notice requirement; the newly insured who gets charged more owing to an erroneous report is in the same boat with the renewal applicant.[12] We therefore *2212 hold 63 that the "increase" required for "adverse action," 15 U.S.C. § 1681a(k)(1)(B)(i), speaks to a disadvantageous rate even with no prior dealing; the term reaches initial rates for new applicants.

Although offering the initial rate for new insurance can be an "adverse action," respondent-plaintiffs have another hurdle to clear, for § 1681m(a) calls for notice only when the adverse action is "based in whole or in part on" a credit report. GEICO argues that in order to have adverse action "based on" a credit report, consideration of the report must be a necessary condition for the increased rate. The Government and respondent-plaintiffs do not explicitly take a position on this point.

To the extent there is any disagreement on the issue, we accept GEICO's reading. In common talk, the phrase "based on" indicates a but-for causal relationship and thus a necessary logical condition. Under this most natural reading of § 1681m(a), then, an increased rate is not "based in whole or in part on" the credit report unless the report was a necessary condition of the increase.

As before, there are textual arguments pointing another way. The statute speaks in terms of basing the action "in part" as well as wholly on the credit report, and this phrasing could mean that adverse action is "based on" a credit report whenever the report was considered in the rate-setting process, even without being a necessary condition for the rate increase. But there are good reasons to think Congress preferred GEICO's necessary-condition reading.

If the statute has any claim to lucidity, not all "adverse actions" require notice, only those "based ... on" information in a credit report. Since the statute does not explicitly call for notice when a business acts adversely merely after consulting a report, conditioning the requirement on action "based ... on" a report suggests that the duty to report arises from some practical consequence of reading the report, 64 not merely some subsequent adverse occurrence that would have happened anyway. If the credit report has no identifiable effect on the rate, the consumer has no immediately practical reason to worry about it (unless he has the power to change every other fact that stands between himself and the best possible deal); both the company and the consumer are just where they would have been if the company had never seen the report.[13] And if examining reports that make no difference was supposed to trigger a reporting requirement, it would be hard to find any practical point in imposing the "based ... on" restriction. So it makes more sense to suspect that Congress meant to require notice and prompt a challenge by the consumer only when the consumer would gain something if the challenge succeeded.[14]

To sum up, the difference required for an increase can be understood without reference to prior dealing (allowing a 65 first-time applicant to sue), and considering the credit report must be a necessary condition for the difference. The remaining step in determining a duty to notify in cases like these is identifying the benchmark for determining whether a first-time rate is a disadvantageous increase. And in dealing with this issue, the pragmatic reading of "based ... on" as a condition necessary to make a practical difference carries a helpful suggestion.

The Government and respondent-plaintiffs argue that the baseline should be the rate that the applicant would have received with the best possible credit score, while GEICO contends it is what the applicant would have had if the company had not taken his credit score into account (the "neutral score" rate GEICO used in Edo's case). We think GEICO has the better position, primarily because its "increase" baseline is more comfortable with the understanding of causation just discussed, which requires notice under § 1681m(a) only when the effect of the credit report on the initial rate offered is necessary to put the consumer in a worse position than other relevant facts would have decreed anyway. If Congress was this concerned with practical consequences when it adopted a "based ... on" causation standard, it presumably thought in equally practical terms when it spoke of an "increase" that must be defined by a baseline to measure from. Congress was therefore more likely concerned with the practical question whether the consumer's rate actually suffered when the company took his credit report into account than the theoretical question whether the consumer would have gotten a better rate with perfect credit.[15]

66 The Government objects that this reading leaves a loophole, since it keeps first-time applicants who actually deserve better-than-neutral credit scores from getting notice, even when errors in credit reports saddle them with unfair rates. This is true; the neutral-score baseline will leave some consumers without a notice *2214 that might lead to discovering errors. But we do not know how often these cases will occur, whereas we see a more demonstrable and serious disadvantage inhering in the Government's position.

Since the best rates (the Government's preferred baseline) presumably go only to a minority of consumers, adopting the Government's view would require insurers to send slews of adverse action notices; every young applicant who had yet to establish a gilt-edged credit report, for example, would get a notice that his charge had been "increased" based on his credit report. We think that the consequence of sending out notices on this scale would undercut the obvious policy behind the notice requirement, for notices as common as these would take on the character of formalities, and formalities tend to be ignored. It would get around that new insurance usually comes with an adverse action notice, owing to some legal quirk, and instead of piquing an applicant's interest about the accuracy of his credit record, the commonplace notices would mean just about nothing and go the way of junk mail. Assuming that Congress meant a notice of adverse 67 action to get some attention, we think the cost of closing the loophole would be too high.

While on the subject of hypernotification, we should add a word on another point of practical significance. Although the rate initially offered for new insurance is an "increase" calling for notice if it exceeds the neutral rate, did Congress intend the same baseline to apply if the quoted rate remains the same over a course of dealing, being repeated at each renewal date?

We cannot believe so. Once a consumer has learned that his credit report led the insurer to charge more, he has no need to be told over again with each renewal if his rate has not changed. For that matter, any other construction would probably stretch the word "increase" more than it could bear. Once the gas station owner had charged the customer the above-market price, it would be strange to speak of the same price as an increase every time the customer pulled in. Once buyer and seller have begun a course of dealing, customary usage does demand a change for "increase" to make sense.[16] Thus, after initial dealing between the consumer and the insurer, the baseline for "increase" is the previous rate or charge, not the "neutral" baseline that applies at the start.

IV

A

[4] In GEICO's case, the initial rate offered to Edo was the one he would have received if his credit score had not been 68 taken into account, and GEICO owed him no adverse action notice under § 1681m(a).[17]

Safeco did not give Burr and Massey any notice because it thought § 1681m(a) did not apply to initial applications, a mistake that left the company in violation of the statute if Burr and Massey received higher rates "based in whole or in part" on their credit reports; if they did, Safeco would be liable to them on a showing of reckless conduct (or worse). The first issue we can forget, however, for although the record does not reliably indicate what rates they would have obtained if their credit reports had not been considered, it is clear enough that if Safeco did violate the statute, the company was not reckless in falling down in its duty.

[5] While "the term recklessness is not self-defining," the common law has generally understood it in the sphere of civil liability as conduct violating an objective standard: action entailing "an unjustifiably high risk of harm that is either known or so obvious that it should be known."[18] Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 836, 114 S.Ct. 1970, 128 L.Ed.2d 811 (1994); see Prosser and Keeton 69 § 34, at 213–214. The Restatement, for example, defines reckless disregard of a person's physical safety this way:

> "The actor's conduct is in reckless disregard of the safety of another if he does an act or intentionally fails to do an act which it is his duty to the other to do, knowing or having reason to know of facts which would lead a reasonable man to realize, not only that his conduct creates an unreasonable risk of physical harm to another, but also that such risk is substantially greater than that which is necessary to make his conduct negligent." 2 Restatement (Second) of Torts § 500, p. 587 (1963–1964).
> It is this high risk of harm, objectively assessed, that is the essence of recklessness at common law. See Prosser and Keeton § 34, at 213 (recklessness requires "a known or obvious risk that was so great as to make it highly probable that harm would follow").

There being no indication that Congress had something different in mind, we have no reason to deviate from the common law understanding in applying the statute. See Prupis, 529 U.S., at 500–501, 120 S.Ct. 1608. Thus, a company subject to FCRA does not act in reckless disregard of it unless the action is not only a violation under a reasonable reading of the statute's terms, but shows that the company ran a risk of violating the law substantially greater than the risk associated with a reading that was merely careless.

[6] Here, there is no need to pinpoint the negligence/recklessness line, for Safeco's reading of the statute, albeit erroneous, was not objectively unreasonable. As we said, § 1681a(k)(1)(B)(i) is silent on the point from which to measure "increase." On the rationale that "increase" presupposes prior dealing, Safeco took the definition as excluding initial rate offers for new insurance, and so sent no adverse action notices to Burr and Massey. While we disagree with Safeco's analysis, we recognize *2216 that its reading has a foundation 70 in the statutory text, see supra, at 2216, and a sufficiently convincing justification to have persuaded the District Court to adopt it and rule in Safeco's favor.

This is not a case in which the business subject to the Act had the benefit of guidance from the courts of appeals or the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) that might have warned it away from the view it took. Before these cases, no court of appeals had spoken on the issue, and no authoritative guidance has yet come from the FTC[19] (which in any case has only enforcement responsibility, not substantive rulemaking authority, for the provisions in question, see 15 U.S.C. §§ 1681s(a)(1), (e)). Cf. Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 202, 121 S.Ct. 2151, 150 L.Ed.2d 272 (2001) (assessing, for qualified immunity purposes, whether an action was reasonable in light of legal rules that were "clearly established" at the time). Given this dearth of guidance and the less-than-pellucid statutory text, Safeco's reading was not objectively unreasonable, and so falls well short of raising the "unjustifiably high risk" of violating the statute necessary for reckless liability.[20]

71 The Court of Appeals correctly held that reckless disregard of a requirement of FCRA would qualify as a willful violation within the meaning of § 1681n(a). But there was no need for that court to remand the cases for factual development. GEICO's decision to issue no adverse action notice to Edo was not a violation of § 1681m(a), and Safeco's misreading of the statute was not reckless. The judgments of the Court of Appeals are therefore reversed in both cases, which are remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

Justice STEVENS, with whom Justice GINSBURG joins, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

While I join the Court's judgment and Parts I, II, III–A, and IV–B of the Court's opinion, I disagree with the reasoning in Parts III–B and III–C, as well as with Part IV–A, which relies on that reasoning.

*2217 An adverse action taken after reviewing a credit report "is based in whole or in part on" that report within the meaning of 15 U.S.C. § 1681m(a). That is true even if the company would have made the same decision without looking at the report, because what the company actually did is more relevant than what it might have done. I find nothing in the statute making the examination of a credit report a "necessary condition" of any resulting increase. Ante, at 2211. The more natural reading is that reviewing a report is only a sufficient condition.

72 The Court's contrary position leads to a serious anomaly. As a matter of federal law, companies are free to adopt whatever "neutral" credit scores they want. That score need not (and probably will not) reflect the median consumer credit score. More likely, it will reflect a company's assessment of the creditworthiness of a run-of-the-mill applicant who lacks a credit report. Because those who have yet to develop a credit history are unlikely to be good credit risks, "neutral" credit scores will in many cases be quite low. Yet under the Court's reasoning, only those consumers with credit scores even lower than what may already be a very low "neutral" score will ever receive adverse action notices.[1]

While the Court acknowledges that "the neutral-score baseline will leave some consumers without a notice that might lead to discovering errors," ante, at 2213 – 2214, it finds this unobjectionable because Congress was likely uninterested in "the theoretical question whether the consumer would have gotten a better rate with perfect credit," Ibid.[2] The Court's decision, however, disserves not only those consumers with "gilt-edged credit report[s]," ante, at 2214, but also the much larger category of consumers with better-than-"neutral" scores. I find it difficult to believe that Congress 73 could have intended for a company's unrestrained adoption of a "neutral" score to keep many (if not most) consumers from ever hearing that their credit reports are costing them money.

In my view, the statute's text is amenable to a more sensible interpretation.

Justice THOMAS, with whom Justice ALITO joins, concurring in part.

I agree with the Court's disposition and most of its reasoning. Safeco did not send notices to new customers because it took the position that the initial insurance rate it offered a customer could not be an "increase in any charge for ... insurance" under 15 U.S.C. § 1681a(k)(1)(B)(i). The Court properly holds that regardless of the merits of this interpretation, it is not an unreasonable one, and Safeco therefore did not act willfully. Ante, at 2214 – 2216. I 2218 do not join Part III–A of the Court's opinion, however, because it resolves the merits of Safeco's interpretation of § 1681a(k)(1)(B)(i)—an issue not necessary to the Court's conclusion and not briefed or argued by the parties.

[1] So far as it matters here, the Act defines "consumer report" as "any written, oral, or other communication of any information by a consumer reporting agency bearing on a consumer's credit worthiness, credit standing, [or] credit capacity ... which is used or expected to be used or collected in whole or in part for the purpose of serving as a factor in establishing the consumer's eligibility for ... credit or insurance to be used primarily for personal, family, or household purposes." 15 U.S.C. § 1681a(d)(1) (footnote omitted). The scope of this definition is not at issue.

[2] The specific petitioners are subsidiary companies of the GEICO Corporation; for the sake of convenience, we call them "GEICO" collectively.

[3] The Act defines a "credit score" as "a numerical value or a categorization derived from a statistical tool or modeling system used by a person who makes or arranges a loan to predict the likelihood of certain credit behaviors, including default." 15 U.S.C. § 1681g(f)(2)(A) (2000 ed., Supp. IV). Under its contract with its credit information providers, GEICO learned credit scores and facts in the credit reports that significantly influenced the scores, but did not have access to the credit reports themselves.

[4] A number of States permit the use of such "neutral" credit scores to ensure that consumers with thin or unidentifiable credit histories are not treated disadvantageously. See, e.g., N.Y. Ins. Law Ann. §§ 2802(e), (e)(1) (West 2006) (generally prohibiting an insurer from "consider[ing] an absence of credit information," but allowing it to do so if it "treats the consumer as if the applicant or insured had neutral credit information, as defined by the insurer").

[5] Again, the actual petitioners are subsidiary companies, of Safeco Corporation in this case; for convenience, we call them "Safeco" collectively.

[6] The parties do not dispute that the credit scores and credit reports relied on by GEICO and Safeco are "consumer reports" under 15 U.S.C. § 1681a(d)(1).

[7] Prior to issuing its final opinion in this case, the Court of Appeals had issued, then withdrawn, two opinions in which it held that GEICO had "willfully" violated FCRA as a matter of law. Reynolds v. Hartford Financial Servs. Group, Inc., 416 F.3d 1097 (C.A.9 2005); Reynolds v. Hartford Financial Servs. Group, Inc., 426 F.3d 1020 (C.A.9 2005).

[8] Compare, e.g., Cushman v. Trans Union Corp., 115 F.3d 220, 227 (C.A.3 1997) (adopting the "reckless disregard" standard), with Wantz v. Experian Information Solutions, 386 F.3d 829, 834 (C.A.7 2004) (construing "willfully" to require that a user "knowingly and intentionally violate the Act"); Phillips v. Grendahl, 312 F.3d 357, 368 (C.A.8 2002) (same).

[9] It is different in the criminal law. When the term "willful" or "willfully" has been used in a criminal statute, we have regularly read the modifier as limiting liability to knowing violations. See Ratzlaf v. United States, 510 U.S. 135, 137, 114 S.Ct. 655, 126 L.Ed.2d 615 (1994); Bryan v. United States, 524 U.S. 184, 191–192, 118 S.Ct. 1939, 141 L.Ed.2d 197 (1998); Cheek v. United States, 498 U.S. 192, 200–201, 111 S.Ct. 604, 112 L.Ed.2d 617 (1991). This reading of the term, however, is tailored to the criminal law, where it is characteristically used to require a criminal intent beyond the purpose otherwise required for guilt, Ratzlaf, supra, at 136–137, 114 S.Ct. 655; or an additional " 'bad purpose,' " Bryan, supra, at 191, 118 S.Ct. 1939; or specific intent to violate a known legal duty created by highly technical statutes, Cheek, supra, at 200–201, 111 S.Ct. 604. Thus we have consistently held that a defendant cannot harbor such criminal intent unless he "acted with knowledge that his conduct was unlawful." Bryan, supra, at 193, 118 S.Ct. 1939. Civil use of the term, however, typically presents neither the textual nor the substantive reasons for pegging the threshold of liability at knowledge of wrongdoing. Cf. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 836–837, 114 S.Ct. 1970, 128 L.Ed.2d 811 (1994) (contrasting the different uses of the term "recklessness" in civil and criminal contexts).

10 Since the posted price seems to be addressed to the world in general, one could argue that the increased gas price is not the initial quote. But the same usage point can be made with the example of the clothing model who gets a call from a ritzy store after posing for a discount retailer. If she quotes a higher fee, it would be natural to say that the uptown store will have to pay the "increase" to have her in its ad.

11 See S.Rep. No. 91–517, p. 7 (1969) ("Those who ... charge a higher rate for credit or insurance wholly or partly because of a consumer report must, upon written request, so advise the consumer ..."); S.Rep. No. 103–209, p. 4 (1993) (adverse action notice is required "any time the permissible use of a report results in an outcome adverse to the interests of the consumer"); H.R.Rep. No. 103–486, p. 26 (1994) ("[W]henever a consumer report is obtained for a permissible purpose ..., any action taken based on that report that is adverse to the interests of the consumer triggers the adverse action notice requirements").

12 In fact, notice in the context of an initially offered rate may be of greater significance than notice in the context of a renewal rate; if, for instance, insurance is offered on the basis of a single, long-term guaranteed rate, a consumer who is not given notice during the initial application process may never have an opportunity to learn of any adverse treatment.

13 For instance, if a consumer's driving record is so poor that no insurer would give him anything but the highest possible rate regardless of his credit report, whether or not an insurer happened to look at his credit report should have no bearing on whether the consumer must receive notice, since he has not been treated differently as a result of it.

14 The history of the Act provides further support for this reading. The originally enacted version of the notice requirement stated: "Whenever ... the charge for ... insurance is increased either wholly or partly because of information contained in a consumer report ..., the user of the consumer report shall so advise the consumer ... ." 15 U.S.C. § 1681m(a) (1976 ed.). The "because of" language in the original statute emphasized that the consumer report must actually have caused the adverse action for the notice requirement to apply. When Congress amended FCRA in 1996, it sought to define "adverse action" with greater particularity, and thus split the notice provision into two separate subsections. See 110 Stat. 3009–426 to 3009–427, 3009–443 to 3009–444. In the revised version of § 1681m(a), the original "because of" phrasing changed to "based ... on," but there was no indication that this change was meant to be a substantive alteration of the statute's scope.

15 While it might seem odd, under the current statutory structure, to interpret the definition of "adverse action" (in § 1681a(k)(1)(B)(i)) in conjunction with § 1681m(a), which simply applies the notice requirement to a particular subset of "adverse actions," there are strong indications that Congress intended these provisions to be construed in tandem. When FCRA was initially enacted, the link between the definition of "adverse action" and the notice requirement was clear, since "adverse action" was defined within § 1681m(a). See 15 U.S.C. § 1681m(a) (1976 ed.). Though Congress eventually split the provision into two parts (with the definition of "adverse action" now located at § 1681a(k)(1)(B)(i)), the legislative history suggests that this change was not meant to alter Congress's intent to define "adverse action" in light of the notice requirement. See S.Rep. No. 103–209, at 4 ("The Committee bill ... defines an 'adverse action' as any action that is adverse to the interests of the consumer and is based in whole or in part on a consumer report"); H.R.Rep. No. 103–486, at 26 ("[A]ny action based on [a consumer] report that is adverse to the interests of the consumer triggers the adverse action notice requirements").

16 Consider, too, a consumer who, at the initial application stage, had a perfect credit score and thus obtained the best insurance rate, but, at the renewal stage, was charged at a higher rate (but still lower than the rate he would have received had his credit report not been taken into account) solely because his credit score fell during the interim. Although the consumer clearly suffered an "increase" in his insurance rate that was "based on" his credit score, he would not be entitled to an adverse action notice under the baseline used for initial applications.

17 We reject Edo's alternative argument that GEICO's offer of a standard insurance policy with GEICO Indemnity was an "adverse action" requiring notice because it amounted to a "denial" of insurance through a lower cost, "preferred" policy with GEICO General. See § 1681a(k)(1)(B)(i) (defining "adverse action" to include a "denial ... of ... insurance"). An applicant calling GEICO for insurance talks with a sales representative who acts for all the GEICO companies. The record has no indication that GEICO tells applicants about its corporate structure, or that applicants request insurance from one of the several companies or even know of their separate existence. The salesperson takes information from the applicant and obtains his credit score, then either denies any insurance or assigns him to one of the companies willing to provide it; the other companies receive no application and take no separate action. This way of accepting new business is clearly outside the natural meaning of "denial" of insurance.

[18] Unlike civil recklessness, criminal recklessness also requires subjective knowledge on the part of the offender. Brennan, 511 U.S., at 836–837, 114 S.Ct. 1970; ALI, Model Penal Code § 2.02(2)(c) (1985).

[19] Respondent-plaintiffs point to a letter, written by an FTC staff member to an insurance company lawyer, that suggests that an "adverse action" occurs when "the applicant will have to pay more for insurance at the inception of the policy than he or she would have been charged if the consumer report had been more favorable." Letter from Hannah A. Stires to James M. Ball (Mar. 1, 2000), http://www.ftc.gov/os/statutes/fcra/ball.htm (as visited May 17, 2007, and available in Clerk of Court's case file). But the letter did not canvass the issue, and it explicitly indicated that it was merely "an informal staff opinion ... not binding on the Commission." Ibid.

[20] Respondent-plaintiffs argue that evidence of subjective bad faith must be taken into account in determining whether a company acted knowingly or recklessly for purposes of § 1681n(a). To the extent that they argue that evidence of subjective bad faith can support a willfulness finding even when the company's reading of the statute is objectively reasonable, their argument is unsound. Where, as here, the statutory text and relevant court and agency guidance allow for more than one reasonable interpretation, it would defy history and current thinking to treat a defendant who merely adopts one such interpretation as a knowing or reckless violator. Congress could not have intended such a result for those who followed an interpretation that could reasonably have found support in the courts, whatever their subjective intent may have been.

Both Safeco and GEICO argue that good-faith reliance on legal advice should render companies immune to claims raised under § 1681n(a). While we do not foreclose this possibility, we need not address the issue here in light of our present holdings.

[1] Stranger still, companies that automatically disqualify consumers who lack credit reports will never need to send any adverse action notices. After all, the Court's baseline is "what the applicant would have had if the company had not taken his credit score into account," ante, at 2213, but from such companies, what the applicant "would have had" is no insurance at all. An offer of insurance at any price, however inflated by a poor and perhaps incorrect credit score, will therefore never constitute an adverse action.

[2] The Court also justifies its deviation from the statute's text by reasoning that frequent adverse action notices would be ignored. See ante, at 2213 – 2214. To borrow a sentence from the Court's opinion: "Perhaps." Ante, at 2209. But rather than speculate about the likely effect of "hypernotification," ante, at 2214, I would defer to the Solicitor General's position, informed by the Federal Trade Commission's expert judgment, that consumers by and large benefit from adverse action notices, however common. See Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 27–29.

Synopsis

Background: Defendants were convicted in the United States District Court for the Central District of California, Terry J. Hatter, J., No. 2:11-cr-00930-TJH-2 and No. 2:11-cr-00930-TJH-3, of conspiracy to defraud the United States and willful failure to file reports of foreign bank and financial accounts. Defendants appealed.

Holdings: The Court of Appeals held that:

[1] finding that defendant was competent to stand trial was supported by the record;

[2] instructions were not misleading or inadequate; and

[3] evidence was sufficient to convict defendant of willful failure to file reports of foreign bank and financial accounts.

Affirmed.

MEMORANDUM ***

David Kalai (David) appeals from his jury convictions for one count of conspiracy to defraud the United States, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 371, and two counts of willful failure to file reports of foreign bank and financial accounts (FBARs), in violation of 31 U.S.C. §§ 5314, 5322(a). David contends that the district court clearly erred by finding him competent to stand trial. David's son, Nadav Kalai (Nadav), was convicted of the same charges, but appeals only from his jury convictions 230 for the two FBAR counts. Nadav argues that the district court's jury instructions for those counts were erroneous and that there was insufficient evidence to convict him. Because the parties are familiar with the facts, we do not recount them here. We have jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1291, and we affirm.

[1] 1. The district court's finding that David was competent to stand trial was supported by ample evidence in the record. The only disagreement among the four experts for the government and defense was whether David could reasonably assist counsel in his defense, in light of a cognitive impairment that caused memory issues. In assessing these expert opinions, the district court was "free to assign greater weight to the findings of experts produced by the Government than to the opposing opinions of the medical witnesses produced by the defendant." United States v. Frank, 956 F.2d 872, 875 (9th Cir. 1991). Therefore, David's focus on conflicts in the record and on discrediting the government's experts does not establish clear error. Id.

Moreover, the record as a whole supports the district court's competency finding. David was able to engage in logical, detailed discussions regarding his case, and was easily redirected back to the topic at hand when he digressed or repeated himself. Furthermore, he demonstrated the ability to thoughtfully consider his legal options and to weigh advice from his lawyer and others. Although the record indicates David could be difficult to work with, was in poor health, and struggled with memory lapses and focus, it also reflects his ability to think logically and coherently and thereby assist in his defense. Therefore, the district court did not clearly err by finding David competent to stand trial.

[2] 2. Regarding Nadav's appeal, the jury instructions given by the district court for the FBAR counts were not "misleading or inadequate." United States v. Hofus, 598 F.3d 1171, 1174 (9th Cir. 2010) (citation omitted). A conviction for willful failure to file a FBAR requires proof that "the defendant acted with knowledge that his conduct was unlawful," meaning he intentionally violated "a known legal duty." Ratzlaf v. United States, 510 U.S. 135, 137, 141-42, 114 S.Ct. 655, 126 L.Ed.2d 615 (1994). The district court appropriately instructed the jury that (1) the government had to prove Nadav "willfully failed to file a [FBAR]" and (2) "willfully" meant Nadav "knew federal law imposed a duty on him to file a [FBAR] ... [and] intentionally and voluntarily violated that duty." Nadav's proposed additions to those instructions were superfluous, because the jury could not find that Nadav intentionally violated a known duty without also finding that he knew the foreign account at issue contained over $10,000—the amount that triggered the requirement to file a FBAR.

The district court's additional instruction to review the blank FBAR form in evidence in response to a jury question further demonstrates the adequacy of the instructions, because that form stated that "[n]o report is required if the aggregate value of the [foreign] accounts did not exceed $10,000." See Beardslee v. Woodford, 358 F.3d 560, 590 (9th Cir. 2004) ("Written instructions in response to juror notes may be treated as jury instructions for purposes of review."). Moreover, the jury heard testimony on FBAR filing requirements, and Nadav's counsel argued in closing that Nadav could only be convicted if he knew the account contained over $10,000. Cf. United States v. Johnson, 680 F.3d 1140, 1148 (9th Cir. 2012) (separate perjury instruction not required in part because the defense "pointed out [the witness's] alleged perjury to the jury"). Accordingly, 231 viewed "as a whole in the context of the entire trial," id. at 1147 (citation omitted), the jury instructions were both correct and adequate, and there are no grounds for reversal on this basis.

[3] 3. Sufficient evidence supported Nadav's convictions on the FBAR counts. Although the government did not introduce direct evidence of Nadav's knowledge of the amount in the foreign account at issue, it provided sufficient circumstantial evidence from which the jury could reasonably infer that Nadav knew the account contained more than $10,000, and therefore knew of his duty to file FBARs. See Jackson v. Virginia, 443 U.S. 307, 319, 99 S.Ct. 2781, 61 L.Ed.2d 560 (1979)

In particular, the evidence of Nadav's established methods for helping wealthy clients evade tax liability, and evidence that Nadav used those methods in opening the foreign account, would reasonably allow the jury to infer that Nadav knew the foreign account contained more than $10,000 and sought to hide that income from the Internal Revenue Service. Cf. Karme v. Comm'r of Internal Revenue, 673 F.2d 1062, 1064 (9th Cir. 1982) (in tax case, testimony unrelated to particular transaction was admissible because it "tend[ed] to establish a pattern or practice of tax planning of which [the] transaction was a part"). Such inferences were especially reasonable in light of Nadav's statements that his strategy was only useful for wealthy clients, as well as evidence that the money involved in his clients' accounts far exceeded $10,000. The jury could reasonably rely on that evidence, as well as its experience and common sense, and find that Nadav knew the foreign account contained more than $10,000.

Evidence that Nadav had signatory authority over the account and was informed of at least one transfer of funds further supported the jury's conclusion that Nadav's failure to file was willful. Furthermore, the steps Nadav took to conceal the foreign account could allow the jury to infer knowledge of the account balance and therefore find willfulness. Cf. Hawkins v. Franchise Tax Bd. of Cal., 769 F.3d 662, 668 (9th Cir. 2014) (holding that willfulness in the context of felony tax evasion may be shown through "any kind of conduct, the likely effect of which would be to mislead or conceal" (quoting Spies v. United States, 317 U.S. 492, 499, 63 S.Ct. 364, 87 L.Ed. 418 (1943))). Accordingly, sufficient evidence supported Nadav's convictions on the FBAR counts.

AFFIRMED.

United States Tax Court.

Joseph B. WILLIAMS, III, Petitioner
v.
COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE, Respondent.

No. 2202–08.
Oct. 2, 2008.

Synopsis
Background: Taxpayer filed timely petition seeking redetermination of deficiencies in income tax, and also seeking certain other relief. IRS moved to dismiss in part.

Holdings: The Tax Court, Gustafson, J., held that:

[1] Court lacked jurisdiction to determine tax liability for taxable year that was not included in notice of deficiency;

[2] Court lacked jurisdiction over petition to extent it sought relief pertaining to interest that "may" be assessed; and

[3] Court lacked jurisdiction to review Secretary of Treasury's determination as to taxpayer's liability for foreign bank account report (FBAR) penalties.

Motion granted.

54 P filed a petition timely seeking redetermination of deficiencies in income tax for 1993–2000 and attempting to put at issue certain liabilities for which he received no notice from R: P's income tax liability for 2001, his potential liability for unassessed interest on asserted tax liabilities, and his liability for a so-called FBAR penalty under 31 U.S.C. sec. 5321(a). R moved to dismiss in part, as to the three liabilities not included in the deficiency notice.

Held: The Tax Court lacks jurisdiction to redetermine P's income tax liability for 2001, liability for unassessed interest, and liability for the FBAR penalty.

OPINION

GUSTAFSON, Judge:

This matter is before us on respondent's "Motion To Dismiss for Lack of Jurisdiction and To Strike as to the Taxable Year 2001, as to Interest, and as to FBAR [foreign bank account report] Penalties" (the motion). Petitioner objects (the objection). We shall grant the motion.

Background

By notice of deficiency dated October 29, 2007, respondent determined deficiencies in petitioner's 1993 through 2000 Federal income tax, along with penalties and additions to tax. By the petition, petitioner assigned error to those determinations. We have jurisdiction to consider petitioner's assignments of error.

The petition, however, also addresses three other matters that are the subject of respondent's motion: (1) Petitioner appears to seek relief as to the year 2001 (the first year after the years that are the subject of the notice of deficiency). He states that the "Tax periods involved in this Petition are income taxes for 1993, 1994, 1995, 1996, 1997, 1998, 1999, 2000, 2001 ". (Emphasis added.) (2) He "seeks an abatement of any interest which may be assessed" for certain periods on 55 the deficiencies at issue here; and he cites section 6404(e),[1] "Abatement of Interest Attributable to Unreasonable Errors and Delays by the Internal Revenue Service". (3) He discusses penalties imposed on him under 31 U.S.C. section 5321, for failure to file foreign bank account reports (FBARs) disclosing Swiss bank accounts. The petition ends with a prayer "that any tax deficiency, FBAR penalty, and/or interest be abated."

Discussion

[1] The Tax Court is a court of limited jurisdiction. We may therefore exercise jurisdiction only to the extent expressly provided by statute. Breman v. Commissioner, 66 T.C. 61, 66, 1976 WL 3667 (1976). Congress has not conferred jurisdiction on this Court to consider the matters that are the subject of the motion.

1. Tax Year 2001

[2] In a case seeking redetermination of a deficiency, jurisdiction depends on the issuance by the Commissioner of a notice of deficiency. Secs. 6212(a), 6214(a). The objection acknowledges that taxable year 2001 is not included in the notice of deficiency. Because it is not, the Court does not have jurisdiction to determine petitioner's tax liability for taxable year 2001, and we shall deem stricken from paragraph 3 of the petition the reference to 2001. See Rule 52 ("the Court may order stricken from any pleading any insufficient claim or * * * any * * * immaterial [or] impertinent * * * matter"); cf. Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(f); Bernal v. Commissioner, 120 T.C. 102, 103 n. 2, 2003 WL 365901 (2003).

2. Interest

[3] [4] This Court has only limited jurisdiction to address issues related to statutory interest. See Bax v. Commissioner, 13 F.3d 54, 56 (2d Cir.1993). Here petitioner invokes section 6404(e), which authorizes the Commissioner to "abate the assessment of all or any part of such interest". By implication, petitioner invokes section 6404(h), which authorizes this Court, in certain circumstances, to "determine whether the Secretary's failure to abate interest under this section was an 56 abuse of discretion". However, the petition seeks not an abatement of interest that has been assessed but rather "an abatement of any interest which may be assessed".[2] (Emphasis added.)

The remedy available under section 6404(e) is for the Commissioner to "abate the assessment " of interest. (Emphasis added.) Thus, as this Court has observed, "Section 6404(e), by its very terms, does not operate until after there has been an assessment of interest". 508 Clinton St. Corp. v. Commissioner, 89 T.C. 352, 355, 1987 WL 43893 (1987). As a result, jurisdiction under section 6404(h) for this Court to review the Commissioner's determination under section 6404(e) is lacking unless and until an assessment of interest has occurred and the Secretary has mailed his "final determination not to abate such interest". Sec. 6404(h)(1); see Rule 280; Bourekis v. Commissioner, 110 T.C. 20, 26–27, 1998 WL 7744 (1998).

Petitioner seeks instead a preassessment review by this Court, which Congress has not empowered the Court to undertake. Rather, the Supreme Court has characterized section 6404(h) as "a precisely drawn, detailed statute [that] pre-empts more general remedies." Hinck v. United States, 550 U.S. 501, ——, 127 S.Ct. 2011, 2015, 167 L.Ed.2d 888 (2007) (quoting EC Term of Years Trust v. United States, 550 U.S. 429, ——, 127 S.Ct. 1763, 1767, 167 L.Ed.2d 729 (2007)). We therefore lack jurisdiction over the petition to the extent it seeks relief pertaining to interest, and we shall deem stricken from the petition paragraphs 5(d) and 54–66, and the reference to interest in the prayer for relief.

3. FBAR Penalties

[5] The FBAR penalties that the petitioner alleges have been imposed on him are authorized in Title 31 ("Money and Finance") of the United States Code, not Title 26 (the Internal Revenue Code). The FBAR provisions originated in the Bank Secrecy Act, Pub.L. 91–508, 84 Stat. 1114 (1970); and after the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, Congress directed, in the USA Patriot Act,[3] that attempts should 57 be made to improve compliance with these provisions. Title 31 U.S.C. sec. 5314 (2000) authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to "require a * * * citizen of the United States * * * to * * * keep records and file reports, when the * * * citizen * * * maintains a relation for any person with a foreign financial agency." The Secretary of the Treasury exercised that authority by requiring that citizens report their foreign bank accounts, see 31 C .F.R. sec. 103.24 (2007), and by ordering that the reports be made on forms to be filed with the Internal Revenue Service (IRS), see id. sec. 103.27(c)-(e).

Section 5321(a) of Title 31 provides for civil penalties for violations of the reporting requirements of section 5314, and section 5321(b)(1) provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may assess those penalties. (Section 5321(b)(2) provides that the Secretary may "commence a civil action to recover" the penalty.) The Secretary's authority to assess the civil FBAR penalties has been delegated to the IRS. See 31 C.F.R. sec. 103.56(g) (2007).

The petition states that such FBAR penalties were "imposed" on the petitioner (not specifying whether they have been assessed, or merely proposed); states that the IRS Appeals Office in Baltimore upheld the imposition of the penalties; urges that the Appeals Office abused its discretion in so doing; and asks this Court to "abate" the FBAR penalties. We cannot do so. "The Tax Court and its divisions shall have such jurisdiction as is conferred on them by this title" (i.e., Title 26) and predecessor internal revenue statutes. See sec. 7442. Petitioner does not point to any grant of jurisdiction to this Court that would extend to FBAR penalties, and we find none.

The FBAR penalties provided in Title 31 are nowhere made subject to the deficiency procedures of Title 26, see secs. 6212–6214, on which procedures the bulk of this Court's jurisdiction is predicated. For certain taxes, section 6212(a) authorizes the Commissioner to issue a notice of deficiency. Section 6213(a) provides that the tax may not be assessed until such a notice has been issued, and it provides that the assessment of the tax must be delayed pending a possible redetermination by the Tax Court if the taxpayer files a 58 timely petition with the Court. However, under sections 6212(a) and 6213(a), such a notice of deficiency is to be sent in the case of "a deficiency in respect of any tax imposed by subtitle A ["Income Taxes"] or B ["Estate and Gift Taxes"] or chapter 41, 42, 43, or 44 [in subtitle D, "Miscellaneous Excise Taxes"]". By negative implication, any other taxes —even if imposed in Title 26—fall outside this Court's deficiency jurisdiction. [4]

The same conclusion must be reached as to the FBAR penalties imposed in Title 31: The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized by 31 U.S.C. sec. 5321(b)(1) to assess the FBAR penalty; no notice of deficiency is authorized by section 6212(a) nor required by section 6213(a) before that assessment may be made; and the penalty therefore falls outside our jurisdiction to review deficiency determinations.

Petitioner does not allege here that he received any notice of deficiency for the FBAR penalties, nor does he allege having received any other notice that might confer jurisdiction on this Court, such as a notice pertaining to a lien under section 6321 or to a levy under section 6331 (both of which are procedures applicable to "any person liable to pay any tax " (emphasis added)). [5] Such collection activities give rise to a notice and opportunity for a hearing under section 6320 or section 6330 (both of which explicitly presume "unpaid tax"). That notice may result in an agency determination that this Court would then have jurisdiction to review, in the lien and levy context. See secs. 6320(c), 6330(d)(1). Under section 6330(d)(1), this Court's authority to review IRS collection 59 activity depends on the Commissioner's prior issuance of such a notice of "determination" under section 6330(c)(3), see Goza v. Commissioner, 114 T.C. 176, 182, 2000 WL 283864 (2000); and in the absence of such a notice, this Court lacks jurisdiction to review the Commissioner's collection activity.

The statutes creating the "collection due process" procedures, and the statutes creating the lien and levy collection mechanisms reviewed by those procedures, all explicitly pertain to "tax", [6] not to the FBAR penalty that petitioner attempts to put at issue here. Petitioner does not allege that he received any notice of determination under section 6320 or 6330 upholding any lien or proposed levy as to FBAR penalties, nor does he allege any action whatsoever by the Secretary leading toward the collection of the FBAR penalty.

The Tax Court has no jurisdiction to review the Secretary's determination as to petitioner's liability for FBAR penalties. As a result, respondent's motion must be granted, and we shall deem stricken from the petition paragraphs 5(e) and 67–73, and the reference to FBAR penalty in the prayer for relief.

To reflect the foregoing,

An appropriate order will be issued.

[1] Except as otherwise noted, section references are to the Internal Revenue Code (26 U.S.C.), and Rule references are to the Tax Court Rules of Practice and Procedure.

[2] The petition also states: “The sheer size of this potential interest liability mandates that any errors on its calculation be raised in this petition and addressed by the Tax Court.” (Emphasis added.)

[3] See USA Patriot Act, Pub.L. 107–56, sec. 361(b), 115 Stat. 272 (2001):

> The Secretary of the Treasury shall study methods for improving compliance with the reporting requirements established in section 5314 of title 31, United States Code, and shall submit a report on such study to the Congress by the end of the 6–month period beginning on the date of enactment of this Act and each 1–year period thereafter.

[4] For example, the “Assessable Penalties” provided under Chapter 68 (i.e., within Subtitle F, “Procedure and Administration”) fall outside the deficiency notice regime of sections 6212 to 6214 and thus fall outside this Court's deficiency jurisdiction. See, e.g., sec. 6682(c) (“Deficiency Procedures Not to Apply”); sec. 6703 (“deficiency procedures * * * shall not apply with respect to the assessment or collection of the penalties provided by sections 6700, 6701, and 6702”); Van Es v. Commissioner, 115 T.C. 324, 329, 2000 WL 1520321 (2000) (the Tax Court does not have jurisdiction to redetermine liability for sec. 6702 penalties); Wilt v. Commissioner, 60 T.C. 977, 1973 WL 2678 (1973) (trust fund recovery penalties under sec. 6672 fall outside the Tax Court's deficiency jurisdiction). Whether the Tax Court's “collection due process” jurisdiction extends to the review of collection efforts directed to the assessable penalties is a different question, to which the answer is now affirmative, in view of a 2006 amendment to section 6330(d)(1). See Callahan v. Commissioner, 130 T.C. 44, 48, (2008).

[5] The lien created in section 6321 arises only in the case of “any tax * * * (including any interest, additional amount, addition to tax, or assessable penalty, together with any costs that may accrue in addition thereto)”. (Emphasis added.) The “assessable penalt[ies]” referred to in section 6321 are evidently those denominated as such in Chapter 68, Subchapter B (“Assessable Penalties,” sections 6671–6725). Similarly, collection by levy is authorized in section 6331(a) only for “any tax * * * (and such further sum as shall be sufficient to cover the expenses of the levy)”. (Emphasis added.)

[6] The definition of the word “tax” in sections 6320, 6321, 6330, and 6331 is broadened by section 6665(a) to include “additions to the tax, additional amounts, and penalties provided by this chapter [i.e., ch. 68 (secs.6651–6751)]”; but we are aware of no statute that would expand “tax” as used in the lien and levy statutes in Title 26 to include the FBAR penalty of Title 31. The collection mechanism authorized in the FBAR statute itself is not lien or levy but “a civil action to recover a civil penalty”. 31 U.S.C. sec. 5321(b)(2).

MEMORANDUM FINDINGS OF FACT AND OPINION

LAUBER, Judge:

1 This whistleblower award case is before the Court on a motion by the Internal Revenue Service (IRS or respondent) to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction. Petitioner received several emails from the IRS Whistleblower Office (Office) that petitioner asserts constitute a determination regarding one of his [*2] claims. [1] The issue we must decide is whether the IRS made a "determination regarding an award" within the meaning of section 7623(b)(4) sufficient to confer jurisdiction on this Court. [2]

FINDINGS OF FACT

These findings of fact are based on the parties' pleadings, a stipulation of facts with accompanying exhibits, and an evidentiary hearing. At the hearing the Court received testimony from Stephen Whitlock, Director of the Office. He testified about the Office's procedures for processing claims generally and about its handling of the particular claim at issue here. We found his testimony instructive and credible in all respects.

Petitioner filed Form 211, Application for Award for Original Information, with the Office in November 2010. On the application petitioner asserted that he was cooperating with the Department of Justice and the IRS Criminal Investiga[*3]tion Division in connection with the ongoing investigation of two Swiss bankers. Petitioner alleged that his cooperation with those agencies had led to, and would lead to more, information about these bankers' involvement in tax evasion by U.S. persons having undeclared offshore financial accounts.

On December 1, 2010, the Office notified petitioner that it had received the Form 211 and assigned unique claim numbers to his claims regarding the two Swiss bankers. [3] The Office advised petitioner that if it initiated an investigation as a result of the information, final resolution of his claims could take several years. No award could be paid until the IRS had collected any taxes or other amounts assessed by virtue of the information petitioner had supplied.

Subsequent communications (letters, emails, and phone calls) ensued between Cindy Stuart, the Office analyst assigned to petitioner's claims, and petitioner's counsel. Petitioner's counsel tried to convince Ms. Stuart and the Office that petitioner's cooperation was the linchpin in the prosecution of the two Swiss bankers, which allegedly led to the Government's receiving incriminating information about numerous U.S. taxpayers.

[*4] On August 23, 2011, petitioner filed with the Office a third claim for an award, which is the subject of the present controversy. Petitioner filed this claim after learning that Taxpayer 1 had agreed to pay a substantial penalty in conjunction with a guilty plea for filing a false tax return. Taxpayer 1 admitted that one of the Swiss bankers had helped him open Swiss bank accounts to conceal his income and assets from U.S. authorities. By the guilty plea, Taxpayer 1 agreed to pay a multimillion-dollar civil penalty for failing to file Form TD F 90–22.1, Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts (FBAR). See 31 U.S.C. sec. 5321(a) (2006). Taxpayer 1 also agreed to pay the IRS a relatively small amount of restitution, reflecting unpaid Federal income tax due on income earned from the Swiss bank accounts. Petitioner claimed entitlement to an award based upon the aggregate amount paid by Taxpayer 1, given petitioner's alleged involvement in the Swiss banker's arrest, which led to Taxpayer 1's arrest. On January 11, 2012, the Office assigned this claim a unique claim number ending in 67 (Taxpayer 1 claim).

2 On January 26, 2012, petitioner's counsel sent Ms. Stuart a detailed memorandum outlining petitioner's asserted connection with Taxpayer 1 and urging that an award for the Taxpayer 1 claim be finalized without delay. On January 31 Ms. Stuart mailed petitioner's counsel a letter confirming receipt of the January 26[*5] letter. She informed him that “[t]he claim for award under Section 7623 is still open and under active consideration” and that “a number of actions * * * must be completed before a determination is made.”

Petitioner's counsel sent Ms. Stuart a number of follow-up letters between February and June 2012. In her replies Ms. Stuart stated that the Office had not yet received the information necessary to make a determination; that the Taxpayer 1 claim was not yet ready for decision; and that section 6103 prevented her from discussing certain matters with petitioner's counsel. In an email dated August 8, 2012, Ms. Stuart closed her message by stating: “As for your inquiry regarding [the Taxpayer 1] claim * * *, I believe you spoke to [an Office employee] about your concerns. I have included the Service's position on this topic. If you still have concerns you can contact me.”

One concern petitioner's counsel had expressed was whether FBAR payments would be includable in “collected proceeds (including penalties, interest, additions to tax, and additional amounts)” that form the basis for an award under section 7623(b)(1). Aware of this concern, Ms. Stuart attached to her email a memorandum prepared for Stephen Whitlock by Mark S. Kaizen, Associate Chief Counsel, IRS General Legal Services, dated April 23, 2012. This memorandum articulates the legal foundation for the Office's position that FBAR payments, [*6] because they are made pursuant to title 31 rather than title 26 of the U.S.Code, are not “collected proceeds” within the meaning of section 7623(b)(1). The Office received this advice after it had sought guidance on the matter. Ms. Stuart attached this document to her email as a courtesy to petitioner.

Petitioner's counsel responded to Ms. Stuart by email the next day as follows: “Please confirm our reading of your email below that based on the Service's position expressed in the April 23, 2012 memo you attached your Office has now officially denied [the Taxpayer 1] Claim.” At that time the Office had not determined whether the Taxpayer 1 claim merited an award because it had not yet learned from the operating side of the IRS whether or how petitioner's information was used, if at all, with respect to Taxpayer 1. Ms. Stuart accordingly responded to petitioner's counsel by email the next day, August 10, 2012, as follows:

> The [Taxpayer 1] claim * * * remains open. When the Whistleblower Office has made a determination related to the claims for award filed by [petitioner] you will be issued official written correspondence. At this point we have not made a determination regarding * * * any of the related claims. The Service's position expressed in the April 23, 2012 memo that I provided you was simply to let you know that at the point a determination can be made proceeds collected under Title 18 and/or Title 31 would not be considered as part of the claim.

3 Because the bulk of the proceeds collected from Taxpayer 1 consisted of FBAR payments for violation of title 31, petitioner decided that there was nothing [*7] meaningful left for the Office to investigate with respect to this claim. Petitioner thus viewed Ms. Stuart's emails as a de facto determination that the Taxpayer 1 claim had been denied.

On September 6, 2012, petitioner filed a petition in this Court to challenge that supposed determination. On December 21, 2012, respondent filed a motion to dismiss this case for lack of jurisdiction. This motion contends that the IRS had not yet made a determination regarding an award sufficient to confer jurisdiction on this Court and that, in any event, petitioner's claim relates to title 31 and falls outside the scope of section 7623.

During July or August 2013 the Office received information from the IRS Criminal Investigation Division and the IRS Large Business and International Division that the Government had not used petitioner's information as a basis for taking action against Taxpayer 1. The Office thereafter issued to petitioner, on September 6, 2013, a letter that both parties agree constitutes a "determination" that petitioner's Taxpayer 1 claim has been denied. Petitioner filed a petition from that determination, and the matter is currently pending before the Court. See Whistleblower 22716–13W v. Commissioner, dkt. No. 22716–13W.

Petitioner nevertheless opposes respondent's motion to dismiss the instant case for lack of jurisdiction. We agree with the parties that, despite the filing of [*8] the second petition, the instant case is not moot but continues to present a justiciable case or controversy. Thus, we may decide whether to dismiss the instant case for lack of jurisdiction.

OPINION

[1] [2] This Court always has jurisdiction to determine whether it has jurisdiction. Cooper v. Commissioner, 135 T.C. 70, 73, 2010 WL 2697125 (2010). The Tax Court is a court of limited jurisdiction, and we must ascertain whether the case before us is one that Congress has authorized us to consider. See sec. 7442; Estate of Young v. Commissioner, 81 T.C. 879, 881, 1983 WL 14898 (1983). We may not enlarge upon the statutory grant of our authority. See Breman v. Commissioner, 66 T.C. 61, 66, 1976 WL 3667 (1976). In this case, we must decide whether communications between petitioner's counsel and Ms. Stuart establish that the IRS had made, as of August 10, 2012, a "determination regarding an award" within the meaning of section 7623(b)(4) sufficient to confer jurisdiction on this Court.

I. Statutory Framework

The IRS has long had authority to pay awards to persons, now called "whistleblowers," who provide information leading to the recovery of unpaid taxes. See sec. 7623 (1954). The payment of such awards was solely discretionary for many years. In response to concerns about the management of the [*9] discretionary award regime, Congress enacted legislation in 2006 to address perceived problems with the whistleblower program. Tax Relief and Health Care Act of 2006, Pub.L. No. 109–432, div. A, sec. 406, 120 Stat. at 2958 (effective Dec. 20, 2006). The 2006 legislation added to section 7623 a new subsection (b), which requires the payment of nondiscretionary whistleblower awards in specified circumstances and provides this Court jurisdiction to review IRS determinations regarding such awards. See Cooper, 135 T.C. at 73. A claimant who does not meet the section 7623(b) requirements for a nondiscretionary award remains eligible for an award at the IRS' discretion under section 7623(a).

4 [3] Section 7623(b)(1) requires payment of an award if the IRS proceeds with an administrative or judicial action to collect taxes "based on information brought to the Secretary's attention by an individual." The award amount must be at least 15% and not more than 30% of "the collected proceeds (including penalties, interest, additions to tax, and additional amounts) resulting from the action" or settlement thereof. Ibid. The determination of the amount "shall depend upon the extent to which the individual substantially contributed to such action." Ibid. [4]

[*10] Section 7623(b)(5) defines the universe of claims that are subject to the nondiscretionary award program established in subsection (b). The IRS must pay claims on a nondiscretionary basis only with respect to actions against a taxpayer whose "gross income exceeds $200,000 for any taxable year subject to such action" and only "if the tax, penalties, interest, additions to tax, and additional amounts in dispute exceed $2,000,000." Sec. 7623(b)(5)(A) and (B).

Section 7623(b)(4), captioned "Appeal of Award Determination," governs our jurisdiction over whistleblower claims. It provides: "Any determination regarding an award under paragraph (1), (2), or (3) may, within 30 days of such determination, be appealed to the Tax Court (and the Tax Court shall have jurisdiction with respect to such matter)." By referring to determinations "under paragraph (1), (2), or (3)," section 7623(b)(4) makes clear that we have jurisdiction to review only determinations concerning nondiscretionary awards authorized by subsection (b).

II. Analysis

As jurisdictional provisions go, section 7623(b)(4) is rather unusual. Unlike most other sections of the Internal Revenue Code that confer jurisdiction on this [*11] Court, section 7623(b)(4) does not prescribe any particular form of notice to the would-be petitioner. Indeed, it does not literally require that the IRS provide that person with written notice of any kind, but simply that it make a "determination." The statute's failure to specify an unambiguous "ticket to the Tax Court" has created serious interpretative and practical problems, both for whistleblowers and for the Court.

We addressed certain of these problems in Cooper v. Commissioner, 135 T.C. at 75. We there held that we have jurisdiction to review not only an IRS determination concerning the amount of an award but also "any determination to deny an award." In ascertaining whether the IRS has made a determination to deny an award, we held that "the labeling [of an IRS communication is] not dispositive" and "does not control whether the document constitutes a determination." Ibid. We found that the letter issued in Cooper, while not labeled a determination, "states respondent's final conclusion that petitioner is not entitled to an award and provides an explanation for this conclusion." Id. at 76. Because the letter constituted "a final administrative decision regarding petitioner's whistleblower claims in accordance with the established procedures," we held that it constituted a "determination regarding an award" within the meaning of section [*12] 7623(b)(4) and that we accordingly had jurisdiction to review it. 135 T.C. at 76. [5]

5 [4] Under these standards, it seems clear that the email exchanges between Ms. Stuart and petitioner's counsel do not establish that the Office had made, as of August 10, 2012, a "determination" to deny the Taxpayer 1 claim. To the contrary, Ms. Stuart's email of that date stated that the Taxpayer 1 claim "remains open" and that petitioner would "be issued official written correspondence" once the Office did make a determination regarding this claim. As of August 10, 2012, the Office was still waiting to hear from the relevant IRS operating divisions whether the information petitioner supplied had led to the action against Taxpayer 1. This is an essential element that must be satisfied before the IRS can make a non-discretionary award determination under section 7623(b)(1). Since the Office was still investigating this issue, it had not yet made "a final administrative decision [*13] regarding petitioner's whistleblower claim[ ] in accordance with the established procedures." See Cooper, 135 T.C. at 76.

In urging a contrary conclusion, petitioner relies on what he regards as the plain meaning of the word "any." See sec. 7623(b)(4). According to petitioner: "Congress chose not to limit this broadest of jurisdictional delegations with modifiers on the word 'any' such as 'dispositive' or 'material.' " Petitioner contends that we should not read into the statute any limiting language and that " 'any determination regarding an award' means just that."

[5] We are not persuaded. In her August 10, 2012, email, Ms. Stuart informed petitioner's counsel that the Office had received legal advice that FBAR payments cannot be included in "collected proceeds" for purposes of making awards under section 7623(b). She accordingly advised him that, "at the point a determination can be made," proceeds collected under title 31 "would not be considered as part of the claim." As we held in Cooper, 135 T.C. at 75, a "determination regarding an award" means a determination as to "the amount of an award" or a determination "to deny an award." Congress cannot possibly have intended that this phrase would embrace every subsidiary finding of fact or conclusion of law that enters into the Office's ultimate decision as to whether an award is appropriate and (if so) the amount thereof.

[6] [*14] Even if the Office's policy decision concerning FBAR payments, considered in isolation, does not constitute a "determination regarding an award," petitioner insists that it constitutes a de facto determination on the particular facts of this case. That is so, petitioner contends, because more than 99% of the aggregate recovery from Taxpayer 1 consisted of FBAR payments. According to petitioner, this demonstrates that the Office had "nothing left to investigate" regarding this claim once it concluded that the FBAR component could not qualify.

Contrary to petitioner's assertion, there was something left for the Office to investigate—namely, whether the action against Taxpayer 1 was "based on information brought to the Secretary's attention by [petitioner]" and, if so, whether the information petitioner provided had "substantially contributed" to that recovery. See sec. 7623(b)(1). Section 7623(b)(4) gives us jurisdiction to review "any determination regarding an award under paragraph (1), (2), or (3)." The IRS cannot make a "determination" under paragraph (1) until it has completed its review of all elements specified in that paragraph. The Office did not receive from the IRS operating divisions, until July or August 2013, the information necessary to ascertain whether the action against Taxpayer 1 was "based on information brought to the Secretary's attention by [petitioner]" or whether petitioner's information "sub [*15] stantially contributed" to that recovery. Only then was the Office in a position to make a conclusive "determination" regarding the Taxpayer 1 claim.

6 [7] This holding is supported not only by the statute's language but also by sound principles of judicial policy. It is the policy of this Court "to try all the issues raised in a case in one proceeding to avoid piecemeal and protracted litigation." Haft Trust v. Commissioner, 62 T.C. 145, 147, 1974 WL 2626 (1974). The goal of this policy is to avoid the inefficiency and duplication of effort, with its "attendant delay and waste of time," that piecemeal litigation inevitably entails. See Kovens v. Commissioner, 91 T.C. 74, 78, 1988 WL 73717 (1988). As the facts of this case show, our assumption of jurisdiction before the Office has concluded its entire investigation would necessarily lead to piecemeal litigation.

When petitioner filed his petition in our Court, the Office had not yet ascertained whether his information had led to action against Taxpayer 1. Suppose that we had taken jurisdiction of this case and decided the question petitioner poses—whether FBAR payments constitute "additional amounts" within the meaning of section 7623(b)(1) and (5)(B) and are thus properly includable in the basis for a nondiscretionary award. We now know that the Office concluded, after petitioner filed the instant petition, that his information did not lead to the recovery from Taxpayer 1, so that he would not be entitled to an award regardless of whether [*16] FBAR payments constitute "additional amounts." If that conclusion is correct, the FBAR question would then be moot, and our opinion addressing this issue would be an advisory opinion. This demonstrates the practical importance of allowing the Office to conclude all aspects of its investigation and render "a final administrative decision * * * in accordance with the established procedures," Cooper, 135 T.C. at 76, before we undertake review of an award determination.

[8] Accepting petitioner's interpretation of section 7623 would produce absurd or futile results, and a well-established rule of statutory construction is to avoid such outcomes. See Colestock v. Commissioner, 102 T.C. 380, 387, 1994 WL 59262 (1994) (citing United States v. Am. Trucking Ass'ns, 310 U.S. 534, 543–544, 60 S.Ct. 1059, 84 L.Ed. 1345 (1940). Undertaking premature review of whistleblower claims would inevitably lead to piece-meal litigation and prevent us from trying all issues in one case. Both the plain language of the statute and principles of judicial policy thus support the conclusion that the instant petition is premature and that we lack jurisdiction over it.

III. Foreign Bank Account Reporting

In the alternative, respondent contends that this Court lacks jurisdiction because payments under title 31 are outside the scope of section 7623(b)(5)(B) and are therefore outside the scope of our jurisdiction under section 7623(b)(4). Petitioner agrees that this issue is jurisdictional and urges that the Court resolve it. [*17] Because we have concluded that the Office did not make a "determination" within the meaning of section 7623(b)(4) sufficient to confer jurisdiction on this Court, we need not decide whether FBAR payments are "additional amounts" for purposes of ascertaining whether the monetary threshold in section 7623(b)(5) has been met, or whether that question is a jurisdictional one. See Friedland v. Commissioner, T.C. Memo.2011–217, 102 T.C.M. (CCH) 247, 249 (not addressing the monetary threshold question when granting respondent's motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction).

7 To reflect the foregoing,

An order of dismissal for lack of jurisdiction will be entered.

Footnotes

[1] The Court granted petitioner's motion to proceed anonymously in this case. In an effort to preserve petitioner's anonymity, the parties in their briefs and other filings refer to the U.S. taxpayer who is the subject of the relevant whistleblower claim as “Taxpayer 1.” We will employ the same convention in this opinion. When referring to Taxpayer 1 and to petitioner, we will employ the masculine pronoun and possessive adjective without intending to create any implication concerning the gender of either person.

[2] All statutory references are to the Internal Revenue Code in effect at the relevant times. All dollar amounts are rounded to the nearest dollar.

[3] The Office subsequently informed petitioner that “the claim number assignment is strictly for control purposes * * * and no inference should be drawn of the applicability of any award payment.”

[4] The IRS may determine a lower percentage award if the whistleblower makes a less substantial contribution to the recovery or if the whistleblower planned and initiated the activities leading to the underpayment of tax. Sec. 7623(b)(2) and (3). The IRS is directed to deny an award altogether if the whistleblower is convicted criminally for planning and initiating such activities. Sec. 7623(b)(3).

[5] Consistently with our Opinion in Cooper, 135 T.C. at 75, we have held that the labeling of an IRS communication is not dispositive in ascertaining whether it has made a “determination” sufficient to afford us jurisdiction under other Code provisions. See, e.g., SECC v. Commissioner, 142 T.C. ——, ——, (slip op. at 7) (Apr. 3, 2014) (IRS letter was a “determination” concerning worker classification for purposes of section 7436(a)); Corbalis v. Commissioner, 142 T.C. ——, ——, (slip op. at 21–22) (Jan. 27, 2014) (IRS letter was a “determination” concerning interest abatement for purposes of section 6404(h)).

ENTRY AND ORDER DENYING PLAINTIFF'S MOTION FOR PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION, ECF. 8.

THOMAS M. ROSE, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

1 Plaintiffs request that the Court enjoin Defendants from enforcing the Foreign Account Tax Compliance Act("FATCA"), the intergovernmental agreements ("IGAs") negotiated by the United States Department of the Treasury ("Treasury Department") to supplant FATCA in the signatory countries, and the Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts ("FBAR") administered by the United States Financial Crimes Enforcement Network ("FinCEN"). FATCA mandates that foreign financial institutions report the tax return information of their U.S. citizen account holders directly to the IRS using the FATCA Report (Form 8966). 26 U.S.C.§ 1471(b)(1)(C); 26 C.F.R. §§ 1.1471-4(d)(3)(v),-4(d)(3)(vi).

Plaintiffs seek preliminary injunctive relief on all claims. The first claim challenges the validity of the Canadian, Czech, Israeli, and Swiss IGAs used by the Treasury Department. The second claim addresses the information reporting provisions FATCA and the IGAs impose not on Plaintiffs, but on foreign financial institutions. The third claim aims at the heightened reporting requirements for foreign bank accounts under FATCA, the IGAs, and the FBAR. These reporting requirements require U.S. citizens to report information about their foreign bank accounts. The fourth claim challenges the 30% tax imposed by FATCA on payments to foreign financial institutions from U.S. sources when these foreign institutions choose not to report to the IRS about the bank accounts of their U.S. customers (the "FFI Penalty"). Similarly, the fifth claim challenges the 30% tax imposed by FATCA on account holders who exercise their rights under the statute not to identify themselves as American citizens to their banks and to refuse to waive privacy protections afforded their accounts by foreign law (the "Passthrough Penalty"). The sixth claim challenges the penalty imposed under the Bank Secrecy Act for "willful" failures to file an FBAR for foreign accounts, which can be as much as the greater of $100,000 or 50% of the value of the unreported account (the "Willfulness Penalty").

I. Background

A. FATCA Statute and Regulations

Congress passed the Foreign Accounts Tax Compliance Act (FATCA) in 2010 to improve compliance with tax laws by U.S. taxpayers holding foreign accounts. FATCA accomplishes this through two forms of reporting: (1) by foreign financial institutions (FFIs) about financial accounts held by U.S. taxpayers or foreign entities in which U.S. taxpayers hold a substantial ownership interest, 26 U.S.C. § 1471; and, (2) by U.S. taxpayers about their interests in certain foreign financial accounts and offshore assets. 26 U.S.C. § 6038D.

1. FATCA

President Obama signed FATCA into law on March 18, 2010. Senator Carl Levin, a co-sponsor of the FATCA legislation, declared that "offshore tax abuses [targeted by FATCA] cost the federal treasury an estimated $100 billion in lost tax revenues annually" 156 Cong. Rec. 5 S1745-01 (2010). FATCA became law as the IRS began its Offshore Voluntary Disclosure Program (OVDP), which since 2009 has allowed U.S. taxpayers with undisclosed overseas assets to disclose them and pay reduced penalties. By 2014, the OVDP collected $6.5 billion through voluntary disclosures from 45,000 participants. "IRS Makes Changes to Offshore Programs; Revisions Ease Burden and Help More Taxpayers Come into Compliance," http://www.irs.gov/uac/Newsroom/IRS-Makes-Changes-to-Offshore-Programs;-Revisions-Ease-Burden-and-Help-More-Taxpayers-Come-into-Compliance (last visited Sept. 15, 2015). The success of the voluntary program has likely been enhanced by the existence of FATCA.

2. Foreign Financial Institution Reporting Under FATCA

2 Foreign Financial Institution reporting encourages FFIs to disclose information on U.S. taxpayer accounts. If the FFI does not, then a 30% withholding tax may apply to U.S.-sourced payments to the non-reporting FFI. A 30% withholding tax may also apply to FFI account holders who refuse to identify themselves as U.S. taxpayers.

> In the case of any withholdable payment to a foreign financial institution which does not meet the requirements of subsection (b) [specifying reporting criteria], the withholding agent with respect to such payment shall deduct and withhold from such payment a tax equal to 30 percent of the amount of such payment.

Section 1471(b)(1) then provides that, "[t]he requirements of this subsection are met with respect to any foreign financial institution if an agreement is in effect between such institution and the Secretary [of the Treasury] under which such institution agrees" to make certain information disclosures and "to deduct and withhold a tax equal to 30 percent of...[a]ny [pass-through] payment which is made by such institution to a recalcitrant account holder or another foreign financial institution which does not meet the requirements of this subsection[.]" § 1471(b)(1)(D)(i); see also § 1471(d)(7) (defining "pass[-through] payment"). A "recalcitrant account holder" is one who "[f]ails to comply with reasonable requests for information" that is either information an FFI needs to determine if the account is a U.S. account (§ 1471(b)(1)(A)) or basic information like the account holder's name, address, and taxpayer identification number (§ 1471(c)(1)(A)). Section 1471(c)(1) specifies the "information required to be reported on U.S. accounts," including "account balance or value." § 1471(c)(1)(C). Plaintiffs seek a preliminary injunction against enforcement of § 1471(a), (b)(1)(D), (c)(1), and (c)(1)(C). Prayer for Relief (part O).

Under § 1471(b)(2), "Financial Institutions Deemed to Meet Requirements in Certain Cases," an FFI "may be treated by the Secretary as meeting the requirements of this subsection if … such institution is a member of a class of institutions with respect to which the Secretary has determined that the application of this section is not necessary to carry out the purposes of this section." That means that an FFI that is treated this way is not subject to the reporting criteria in § 1471(b)(1). The Secretary can statutorily exempt FFIs from "attempt[ing] to obtain a valid and effective waiver" of foreign nondisclosure laws from each account holder and can exempt FFIs from "close such account...if a waiver...is not obtained from each such holder within a reasonable period of time." § 1471(b)(1)(F).[1] The Secretary's exemption of an FFI under § 1471(b)(2) also means that the FFI no longer has to make the report described in § 1471(c)(1) because that report is based on "[t]he agreement described in subsection (b)" that an FFI that the Secretary has exempted does not need to have in place to avoid withholding. Furthermore, the FATCA statute provides that, "[t]he Secretary shall prescribe such regulations or other guidance as may be necessary or appropriate to carry out the purposes of, and prevent the avoidance of, this chapter," i.e., §§ 1471-74. 26 U.S.C. § 1474(f). The Government asserts that the intergovernmental agreements (IGAs) constitute the Secretary's exercise of the statutory discretion afforded by §§ 1471(b)(2) and 1474(f).

3 Plaintiffs also seek to enjoin enforcement of 26 C.F.R. § 1.1471-2T(a)(1). The "[g]eneral rule of withholding" under § 1471(a) is largely reiterated by 26 C.F.R. § 1.1471-2T(a)(1), which Plaintiffs also target. Prayer for Relief (part R). Plaintiffs seek to enjoin enforcement of 26 C.F.R. §§ 1.1471-4(a)(1), 1.1471-4(d), and 1.1471-4(d)(3)(ii), which repeat the content of § 1471(b) and (c). Prayer for Relief (part S). In addition, Plaintiffs seek an injunction against 26 C.F.R. § 1.1471-4T(b)(1), which addresses the 30% withholding tax for recalcitrant account holders established by the statute. Prayer for Relief (part T). Plaintiffs also seek to enjoin the IRS's use of Form 8966, "FATCA Report," the form on which FFIs make disclosures under § 1471(c). See 26 C.F.R. § 1.1471-4(d)(3)(v); Prayer for Relief (part V). In Plaintiffs' view, these FATCA regulations "primarily elaborate on the [ ] requirements of the statutory provisions and clarify the statutory requirements." Complaint ¶ 95(a).

3. Individual Reporting Under FATCA

There is a companion individual reporting requirement to § 1471's FFI reporting requirement located at 26 U.S.C. § 6038D. Under § 6038D, individuals holding more than $50,000 of aggregate value in "specified foreign financial assets," § 6038D(b), must file a report with their annual tax returns (§ 6038D(a)) that includes, for each asset "[t]he maximum value of the asset during the taxable year." § 6038D(c)(4). Plaintiffs seek to enjoin this asset-value reporting requirement. Prayer for Relief (part P). Section 6038D(h) also provides that, "[t]he Secretary shall prescribe such regulations or other guidance as may be necessary or appropriate to carry out the purposes of this section...." Plaintiffs seek to enjoin enforcement of the regulation that states this same reporting requirement. 26 C.F.R. § 1.6038D-4(a)(5); see Prayer for Relief (part U). Plaintiffs also target two other regulatory reporting requirements: disclosing whether a depository or custodial account was opened or closed during the taxable year (26 C.F.R. § 1.6038D-4(a)(6)); and "[t]he amount of any income, gain, loss, deduction, or credit recognized for the taxable year with respect to the reported specified foreign financial asset," (26 C.F.R. § 1.6038D-4(a)(8)). Prayer for Relief (part U).

B. The Canadian, Czech, Israeli, and Swiss Intergovernmental Agreements

Once FATCA became law, the Government began requiring coordination with FFIs and foreign governments. To facilitate FATCA implementation, the United States has concluded over 70 intergovernmental agreements (IGAs) with foreign governments addressing the exchange of tax information. Plaintiffs seek to enjoin IGAs with Canada, the Czech Republic, Israel, and Switzerland in their entirety. Prayer for Relief (parts A, E, I, M). Alternatively, they seek to enjoin parts of those IGAs. Prayer for Relief (parts B-D, FH, J-L, N).

The Canadian, Czech and Israeli IGAs are similar because they are all "Model 1" IGAs, whereas the Swiss IGA is a "Model 2" IGA. The key distinction is that under Model 1 IGAs, foreign governments agree to collect their FFIs' U.S. account information and to send it to the IRS, whereas under Model 2 IGAs, foreign governments agree to modify their laws to the extent necessary to enable their FFIs to report their U.S. account information directly to the IRS. All four IGAs, in their preambulatory clauses, recognize the partner governments' mutual "desire to conclude an agreement to improve international tax compliance" or, in the case of Switzerland, a "desire to conclude an agreement to improve their cooperation in combating international tax evasion." IGA Preambles (first clause).

All four IGAs mention the Tax Information Exchange Agreements (TIEAs) that the United States has with these four countries as part of preexisting treaties. IGA Preambles (second clause).[2] All four IGAs similarly note the need for "an intergovernmental approach to FATCA implementation" (or, in the Swiss case, "intergovernmental cooperation to facilitate FATCA implementation").

4 The three Model 1 IGAs (Canadian, Czech and Israeli) define "Obligations to Obtain and Exchange Information with Respect to Reportable Accounts" in Article 2. In addition to seeking to enjoin Article 2 in full (Prayer for Relief, parts B, F, and J), Plaintiffs attack the agreement that IGA partners, with respect to each "U.S. Reportable Account" of its FFIs, will report, "in the case of any Depository Account, the total gross amount of interest paid or credited to the account during the calendar year or other appropriate reporting period[.]" Canadian IGA Art. 2, § 2(a)(6); Czech IGA Art. 2, § 2(a)(6); Israeli IGA Art. 2, § 2(a)(6); see Prayer for Relief (parts C, G, K). If Model 1 partner countries comply with Article 2 as well as the "Time and Manner of Exchange of Information" agreed to in Article 3 and other rules, then their reporting FFIs "shall be treated as complying with, and not subject to withholding under, section 1471," nor will they be required to withhold "with respect to an account held by a recalcitrant account holder" under § 1471. Canadian IGA Art. 4, §§ 1, 2; Czech IGA Art. 4 §§ 1, 2; Israeli IGA Art. 4, §§ 1, 2. This is consistent with the Treasury Secretary's power to deem FFIs to be in compliance with § 1471 if statutory purposes are met. 26 U.S.C. § 1471(b)(2)(B).

The Israeli IGA is not yet in force. See Israeli IGA, Art. 10, § 1. However, the Government asserts that the Treasury Secretary has exercised his discretion not to impose § 1471 withholding against Israeli FFIs or recalcitrant account holders.

The Swiss IGA is different in that under its Article 3—which Plaintiffs seek to enjoin (Prayer for Relief, part N)—the Swiss government agrees to "direct all Reporting Swiss Financial Institutions" to report certain information directly to the IRS. Swiss IGA, Art. 3, § 1. Under Article 5—which Plaintiffs also seek to enjoin

(Prayer for Relief, part N)—the U.S. government "may make group requests...based on the aggregate information reported to the IRS pursuant to" Article 3. Swiss IGA Art. 5, § 1. "Such requests shall be made pursuant to Article 26 of the [Swiss] Convention, as amended by the Protocol," and, "such requests shall not be made prior to the entry into force of the Protocol[.]" Swiss IGA, Art. 5, § 2. The "Protocol" being "the Protocol Amending the [Swiss] Convention that was signed at Washington on September 23, 2009." Swiss IGA, preamble (clause 3). That Protocol has not yet been approved by the Senate, and because of that, Article 5 of the Swiss IGA cannot yet be implemented.

C. Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Account

The third body of law at issue in this case pertains to the Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Account (FBAR) requirements. U.S. persons who hold a financial account in a foreign country that exceeds $10,000 in aggregate value must file an FBAR with the Treasury Department reporting the account. See 31 U.S.C. § 5314; 31 C.F.R. § 1010.350; 31 C.F.R. § 1010.306(c). The current FBAR form is FinCEN Form 114. The form has been due by June 30 of each year regarding accounts held during the previous calendar year. § 1010.306(c). Beginning with the 2016 tax year, the due date of the form will be April 15. Pub. L. No. 114-41, § 2006(b)(11). A person who fails to file a required FBAR may be assessed a civil monetary penalty. 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(A). The amount of the penalty is capped at $10,000 unless the failure was willful. See § 5321(a)(5)(B)(i), (C). A willful failure to file increases the maximum penalty to $100,000 or half the value in the account at the time of the violation, whichever is greater. § 5321(a)(5)(C). In either case, whether to impose the penalty and the amount of the penalty are committed to the Secretary's discretion. See § 5321(a)(5)(A) ("The Secretary of the Treasury may impose a civil money penalty[.]") & § 5321(a)(5)(B) ("[T]he amount of any civil penalty...shall not exceed" the statutory ceiling). Plaintiffs seek to enjoin enforcement of the willful FBAR penalty under § 5321(a)(5). Prayer for Relief, part Q. They also ask for an injunction against "the FBAR account-balance reporting requirement" of FinCen Form 114. Prayer for Relief, part W.

The Government asserts that the information in the FBAR assists law enforcement and the IRS in identifying unreported taxable income of U.S. taxpayers that is held in foreign accounts as well as investigating money laundering and terrorism.

II. Legal Standard for Preliminary Injunctions

5 The standard for determining whether to issue a preliminary injunction involves the examination of: (1) the likelihood of plaintiff's success on the merits; (2) whether or not the injunctive relief will save plaintiff from irreparable injury; (3) whether or not the injunctive relief will harm others; and (4) whether or not public interest will be served by the injunction. See Rock and Roll Hall of Fame and Museum, Inc. v. Gentile Prods., 134 F.3d 749, 753 (6th Cir. 1998); In re DeLorean Motor Co., 755 F.2d 1223, 1228 (6th Cir. 1985). These factors are not prerequisites, but elements balanced by the Court. Frisch's Restaurants, Inc. v. Shoney's Inc., 759 F.2d 1261, 1263 (6th Cir. 1985) and DeLorean Motor Co., 755 F.2d at 1229. The Court will evaluate each of these factors.

A. Likelihood of Prevailing on the Merits

Defendants initially contend that Plaintiffs are not likely to prevail on the merits of their claim because they lack standing to bring their action. Federal courts may only decide actual cases or controversies. DaimlerChrysler Corp. v. Cuno, 547 U.S. 332, 341 (2006). "One element of the case-or-controversy requirement" is that plaintiffs "must establish that they have standing to sue." Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811, 818 (1997). The standing requirement protects the "time-honored concern about keeping the Judiciary's power within its proper constitutional sphere." Id. at 820. "[S]tanding inquir[ies are] especially rigorous when reaching the merits of the dispute would force [a court] to decide whether an action taken by one of the other two branches of the Federal Government was unconstitutional." Clapper v. Amnesty Int'l USA, 133 S. Ct. 1138, 1146 (2013).

Standing contains three elements:

> First, plaintiffs must have suffered an injury in fact—an invasion of a legally protected interest which is (a) concrete and particularized and (b) actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical. Second, there must be a causal connection between the injury and the conduct complained of—the injury has to > be fairly traceable to the challenged action of the defendant, and not the result of the independent action of some third party not before the court. Third, it must be likely, as opposed to merely speculative, that the injury will be redressed by favorable decision.

Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560-61 (1992) (citations and internal quotation omitted).

As for the first consideration, a "threatened injury must be certainly impending to constitute injury in fact," and "'[a]llegations of possible future injury' are not sufficient." Clapper, 133 S. Ct at 1147 (quoting Whitmore v. Arkansas, 495 U.S. 149, 158 (1990)) (emphasis in original). Similarly, "a plaintiff raising only a generally available grievance about government—claiming only harm to his and every citizen's interest in proper application of the Constitution and laws, and seeking relief that no more directly and tangibly benefits him than it does the public at large—does not state an Article III case or controversy." Lujan, 504 U.S. at 573-74; see also id. at 577 (rejecting attempt "to convert the undifferentiated public interest in executive officers' compliance with the law into an 'individual right' vindicable in the courts"). Also, plaintiffs generally cannot establish standing indirectly when their injury is the result of "the independent action of some third party not before the court." Simon v. E. Ky. Welfare Rights Org., 426 U.S. 26, 42 (1976); see also Lujan, 504 U.S. at 560-61 (same); Shearson v. Holder, 725 F.3d 588, 592 (6th Cir. 2013) (same); Ammex, Inc. v. United States, 367 F.3d 530, 533 (6th Cir. 2004) (no standing to challenge excise tax assessed against third party, since "alleged injury...in the form of increased fuel costs was not occasioned by the Government").

6 As to the second consideration, "a plaintiff must 'assert his own legal rights and interests, and cannot rest his claim to relief on the legal rights or interests of third parties."' Coyne, 183 F.3d at 494 (quoting Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 499 (1975)); see also United States v. Ovalle, 136 F.3d 1092, 1100-01 (6th Cir. 1998); Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400, 410 (1991). The rare exception to this requirement arises where a plaintiff can "show that (1) it has suffered an injury in fact; (2) it has a close relationship to the third party; and (3) there is some hindrance to the third party's ability to protect his or her own interests." Mount Elliott Cemetery Ass'n v. City of Troy, 171 F.3d 398, 404 (6th Cir. 1999); see also Connection Distrib. Co. v. Reno, 154 F.3d 281, 295 (6th Cir. 1998).

"A plaintiff bears the burden of demonstrating standing and must plead its components with specificity." Coyne, 183 F.3d at 494; see also Lujan, 504 U.S. at 561. A plaintiff "must demonstrate standing separately for each form of relief sought." Friends of the Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Envtl. Servs. (TOC), Inc., 528 U.S. 167, 185 (2000). The Supreme Court has "always insisted on strict compliance with this jurisdictional standing requirement," Raines, 521 U.S. at 819. Moreover, "suits challenging, not specifically identifiable Government violations of law, but the particular programs agencies establish to carry out their legal obligations are, even when premised on allegations of several instances of violations of law, rarely if ever appropriate for federal-court adjudication." Lujan, 504 U.S. at 568 (quotation omitted).

Senator Paul seeks to base legal standing for Counts 1 and 2 in his role as a U.S. Senator, charged with the institutional task of advice and consent under the Constitution. He contends that the IGAs exceed the proper scope of Executive Branch power and should have been submitted for Senate approval. ¶¶ 28, 29.

Senator Paul's argument that the Executive Branch is usurping Congress's powers by not submitting the IGAs for a vote—that he has a "right to vote"—is a claim that the Executive Branch is not acting in accordance with the law and that he may remedy such violation in his official capacity as a senator. In Raines v. Byrd, several members of Congress challenged the constitutionality of the Line Item Veto Act of 1996, asserting that the statute infringed on their power as legislators. 521 U.S. at 816. The Supreme Court held that they lacked Article III standing. It noted that their claim asserted "a type of institutional injury (the diminution of legislative power), which necessarily damages all Members of Congress and both Houses of Congress equally." Id. at 821. Because Plaintiffs' "claim of standing [was] based on a loss of political power, not loss of any private right," their asserted injury was not "concrete" for the purposes of Article III standing. Id. Raines bars Senator Paul's claims. This is true even if he frames the conduct he challenges as a "usurpation" of congressional authority. See Chenoweth v. Clinton, 181 F.3d 112, 116 (D.C. Cir. 1999) (a claim of usurpation of congressional authority is not sufficient to satisfy the standing requirement); see also Walker v. Cheney, 230

F. Supp. 2d 51, 73 (D.D.C. 2002) ("the role of Article III courts has not historically involved adjudication of disputes between Congress and the Executive Branch based on claimed injury to official authority or power.").

Senator Paul has not been authorized to sue on behalf of the Senate. This fact also weighs against finding standing. See Raines, 521 U.S. at 829 ("We attach some importance to the fact that appellees have not been authorized to represent their respective Houses of Congress in this action[.]"). Members of Congress possess an adequate remedy (since they may repeal the Act or exempt appropriations bills from funding its implementation). Raines, 521 U.S. at 829.

7 Nor can Senator Paul base his standing on a more generalized interest in "vindication of the rule of law." See Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Env't, 523 U.S. 83, 106 (1998); see also Hollingsworth v. Perry, 133 S. Ct. 2652, 2662 (2013) ("[A]n asserted right to have the Government act in accordance with law is not sufficient, standing alone[.]" (quotation omitted)). A legislator does not hold any legally protected interest in proper application of the law that is distinct from the interest held by every member of the public. Senator Paul thus fails to allege a particularized, legally cognizable injury by his claim that the Executive Branch is not adhering to the law. See Campbell v. Clinton, 203 F.3d 19, 22 (D.C. Cir. 2000) (Congressional plaintiffs do not "have standing anytime a President allegedly acts in excess of statutory authority").

Senator Paul has "not been singled out for specially unfavorable treatment." Raines, 521 U.S. at 821. All Plaintiffs here, including Senator Paul, have an adequate remedy to challenge the reporting requirements and penalties that they oppose: they may work toward repeal of the laws through the legislative process. Id. Of course, FATCA, the IGAs, and the FBAR requirements are not exempt from constitutional challenge, but they must be challenged by an individual who has suffered a judicially cognizable injury. Id. Plaintiffs in this case do not qualify.

In sum, Paul has alleged no injury to himself as an individual, the institutional injury he alleges is wholly abstract and widely dispersed, and his attempt to litigate this dispute at this time and in this form is contrary to historical experience. Raines, 521 U.S. at 829

None of the other Plaintiffs has alleged that he or she has suffered or is about to suffer injury under the FATCA withholding tax: none is an FFI to which the tax under § 1471(a) applies, and none has been assessed, or informed that IRS intends to assess, the recalcitrant account holder withholding tax imposed by § 1471(b). Moreover, all Plaintiffs but Crawford live in jurisdictions where FFIs are not currently subject to the § 1471(b) withholding tax. No plaintiff has alleged that he or she is subject to § 6038D reporting due to an aggregate asset value exceeding $50,000 or FBAR reporting due to a bank account exceeding $10,000 in value.

Mark Crawford decries his bank's policy against taking U.S. citizens as clients and claims the denial of his application for a brokerage account may have "impacted Mark financially," ¶ 21, any such harm is not fairly traceable to an action by Defendants, which are not responsible for decisions that foreign banks make about whom to accept as clients. Crawford cannot establish standing indirectly when third parties are the causes of his alleged injuries. See Shearson, 725 F.3d at 592. Moreover, his discomfort with complying with the disclosures required by FATCA, see ¶ 23, does not establish the concrete, particularized harm that confers standing to sue. See, e.g., Lujan, 504 U.S. at 561 (requiring "concrete and particularized" and "actual or imminent" injury). Even if Crawford fears "unconstitutionally excessive fines imposed by 31 U.S.C. § 5321 if he willfully fails to file an FBAR," ¶ 24, there is no allegation that he failed to file any FBAR that may have been required, much less that the Government has assessed an "excessive" FBAR penalty against him. Any harm that may come his way from imagined future events is speculative and cannot form the foundation for his lawsuit.

Crawford states that he is a United States citizen who lives in Albania and maintains a residence in Dayton, Ohio. ¶ 13. The United States does not have a FATCA IGA with Albania, and Crawford does not allege that he has a bank account in any of the four countries whose IGAs are challenged in the complaint. That means that Crawford has no standing to assert the violations alleged in Counts 1, 2, or 8, which exclusively concern those four IGAs.

8 Crawford seeks to invalidate FATCA and the FBAR requirements on three bases: (1) his brokerage firm cannot accept U.S. citizens—including Crawford himself—as clients, due to a relationship with a bank that has a policy against taking on American clients, see ¶ 21; (2) he does not want the "financial details of his accounts" disclosed to the U.S. government, see ¶ 23; and (3) he fears "unconstitutionally excessive fines imposed by 31 U.S.C. § 5321 if he willfully fails to file an FBAR," see ¶ 24.

Roger Johnson states that he is a U.S. citizen who resides in the Czech Republic. ¶ 31. He seeks to invalidate the Czech IGA, FATCA, and the FBAR reporting requirements because: (1) his wife, who is not a plaintiff, "strongly objected to having her financial affairs disclosed to the United States government," leading to the couple's decision to separate their assets, see ¶ 35; (2) he does not want the financial details of his accounts disclosed, see ¶ 38; and (3) he fears "unconstitutionally excessive fines" if he willfully fails to file an FBAR, see ¶ 39.

The harm Johnson alleges resulted from his wife's objections to FATCA and the choices that they made in response; this is not traceable to the Government. See Simon, 426 U.S. at 41-42. The Johnsons are free to reverse the separation of their assets at any time, regardless of FATCA, and the lack of legal compulsion defeats any claim to third-party standing. Johnson's personal discomfort with reporting requirements of American law does not support standing, as he does not allege any concrete constitutional injury. See Lujan, 504 U.S. at 561. Nor is the prospect of the hypothetical imposition of an excessive fine, if he willfully fails to file a required FBAR, sufficient. Clapper, 133 S. Ct at 1147 ("Allegations of possible future injury" do not convey standing). In effect, Johnson seeks an advisory opinion that future, hypothetical conduct by the Government would violate his constitutional rights.

Stephen J. Kish states that he is a dual citizen of the United States and Canada who lives in Toronto. ¶ 41. Kish alleges that his wife "strongly opposes the disclosure of her personal financial information" under FATCA. ¶ 47. His wife is not a plaintiff. Kish may not assert claims on her behalf. See Coyne, 183 F.3d at 494. That he has allegedly suffered some "discord" in his marriage, see ¶ 47, is too vague and indirect of a harm to establish standing. As explained above, reluctance to comply with the reporting requirements of American law, see ¶ 48, and theoretical "excessive fines" that would be imposed if he willfully violated the law, see ¶ 49, do not convey standing.

Daniel Kuettel states that he is a citizen of Switzerland who renounced his U.S. citizenship in 2012. ¶ 51. He claims that he decided to renounce due to "difficulties caused by FATCA," and he complains that "many Swiss banks have been unwilling to accept American clients because of FATCA." ¶ 55. He blames this practice of the Swiss banks for his "mostly unsuccessful" efforts to obtain mortgage refinancing prior to his renunciation of citizenship. Id. The only ongoing injury that Kuettel alleges is related to a college savings account for his daughter that he maintains at a Swiss bank. See ¶ 56. The account balance is currently only about $8,400, which is below the $10,000 threshold for FBAR reporting. Kuettel's daughter is ten years old, see ¶ 54, and is not a plaintiff in this case. Supposedly the account would receive "several advantages such as better interest rates and discounts for local businesses" if it were titled in her name. ¶ 56. The Complaint states Kuettel would like to transfer ownership of the account to his daughter, but he will not do so out of a concern that she might in the future be subjected to willful FBAR penalties, that she might be subject to an alleged harm. ¶ 57.13 Kuettel could obviate this concern by filing an FBAR for the account on his daughter's behalf, but "Daniel objects to filing an FBAR as required by FinCEN because he is not a U.S. citizen and would not do so for his daughter's account." ¶ 57. His wife similarly objects. His daughter is said to be too young to renounce her own U.S. citizenship. ¶ 57. Neither his wife, nor his daughter are named as plaintiffs, however. Thus, having renounced his own American citizenship, Kuettel now seeks relief based on his daughter's ineligibility for preferable interest rates and local discounts. The relief for any wrong here is either for Kuettel's daughter to sue her Swiss bank for disparate treatment, if Swiss law provides such protection, or to seek recourse in the power of the market moving her accounts to an institution that wishes to compete for her business.

9 None of the allegations states that Kuettel is presently being harmed by FATCA or the Swiss IGA, and neither FATCA nor the IGA apply to him as a non-U.S. citizen. See ¶¶ 51-58. His assertion of past harm because he was "mostly unsuccessful" in refinancing his mortgage due to FATCA does not convey standing. If that was a harm, it was due to actions of third-party foreign banks not those of Defendants. Regardless, having now renounced his American citizenship and obtained refinancing on terms he found acceptable, any past harm is not redressable here. See Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, 515 U.S. 200, 210-11 (1995) ("[T]he fact of past injury...does nothing to establish a real and immediate threat that he would again suffer similar injury in the future." (quotation omitted)). This leaves Kuettel's claims concerning the FBAR requirement, in Counts 3 and 6, for which the Government concedes Kuettel has standing. Response, ECF 16, at 15, PAGEID 216.

Kuettel also lacks standing to challenge the FBAR reporting requirements that might apply not to him, but to his daughter. The reporting requirement would be hers, and any harm to the account is a detriment to her. Advantages his daughter might receive if Kuettel or his wife filed an FBAR on his daughter's behalf are based on a bank policy, not conduct of Defendants. The failure to reap those advantages is due to the Bank's policies regarding someone like Kuettel's reluctance to comply with the FBAR requirements, not any action fairly traceable to the Government. In any event, Kuettel has not established standing to sue on behalf of his daughter. See Ovalle, 136 F.3d at 1100-01.

Donna-Lane Nelson is a citizen of Switzerland who has also renounced her U.S. citizenship. ¶ 59. She alleges that her Swiss bank "notified her that she would not be able to open a new account if she ever closed her existing one because she was an American. Fearing that she would eventually not be able to bank in the country where she lived, she decided to relinquish her U.S. citizenship." ¶ 65. After she renounced, a Swiss bank "offered investment opportunities that were not available to her as an American." Id. She "resents having to provide" "explanations" to Swiss banks that have requested information on her past U.S. citizenship and payments to her daughter, who lives in the United States, and she sees "threats implied by these requests which appear to be prompted by FATCA." ¶ 68. Like other Plaintiffs, Nelson does not want to disclose financial information to the Government, and she fears willful FBAR penalties, even though no such penalty has been imposed or threatened against her. ¶¶ 69, 70. Unlike the preceding Plaintiffs, however, she adds that she fears the 30% withholding tax may be imposed against her "if her business partner," who is now her husband, and with whom she has joint accounts, "opts to become a recalcitrant account holder." ¶ 71.

Nelson's allegations of harm stem from third-party conduct and do not grant her standing against Defendants. Fear of hypothetical events that might have befallen her if she had not renounced her U.S. citizenship does not constitute concrete harm sufficient to confer Article III standing. Her claim "that she had to choose between having the ability to access local financial services where she lived or be a U.S. citizen" is refuted by her admission that UBS would have allowed her to continue banking in Switzerland as before, using her existing account, regardless of her citizenship. ¶ 65. Discretionary decisions of a foreign bank do not create standing. If her business partner and husband causes Nelson to be subjected to FBAR penalties by his future conduct that will be his fault, not Defendants'. Having renounced her U.S. citizenship and without standing to assert these claims, Nelson cannot air her "resentment" of U.S. law in this Court.

L. Marc Zell states that he is a practicing attorney and a citizen of both the United States and Israel who lives in Israel. He alleges that: (1) he and his firm have been required by Israeli banking institutions to complete IRS withholding forms for individuals whose funds his firm holds in trust, regardless of whether the forms are legally required, causing certain clients to leave his firm, ¶¶ 79 & 81; (2) Israeli banks have required his firm to close accounts, refused to open others, and requested conduct contrary to banking regulations, ¶¶ 79-80; and, (3) the compelled disclosure of his fiduciary relationship with clients impinges on the attorney-client relationship, ¶ 82. On request of clients, who claim their rights are violated by FATCA, Zell "has decided not to comply with the FATCA disclosure requirements whenever that alternative exists." ¶ 83. He fears that the FATCA 30% withholding tax on pass-through payments to recalcitrant account holders could be imposed due to his refusal to provide identifying information about a client to an Israeli bank. ¶ 84. He also has refused to provide information to his own bank and "fears that he will be classified as a recalcitrant account holder," ¶ 85. Like the other Plaintiffs, he does not want his financial information disclosed, ¶ 86, and fears an FBAR penalty if the IRS determines that he willfully failed to file an FBAR, ¶ 87.

10 The majority of Zell's allegations concern conduct of Israeli banks and his belief that these actions have been unfair to him or his clients. But conduct of third parties (even if related to the banks' compliance with FATCA) does not confer standing to bring suit against Defendants. See, e.g., Ammex Inc. v. United States, 367 F.3d 530, 533

(6th Cir. 2004). Nor may Zell seek redress on behalf of third parties who have allegedly suffered harm, including unidentified clients. See Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 499 (1975). The third parties who have allegedly suffered harm are not plaintiffs, thus, alleged harm to them does not provide a basis for Zell to maintain this suit.

The contention that disclosure of the identity of clients for whom Zell holds funds in trust violates the attorney-client privilege is also without merit. He gives no example of harm that has occurred or how he was harmed by disclosure of clients' identities. He cannot raise the attorney-client privilege on his clients' behalf, nor is the fact of representation privileged. See In re Special Sept. 1978 Grand Jury (II), 640 F.2d 49, 62 (7th Cir. 1980) ("[A]ttorney-client privilege belongs to the client alone[.]"); United States v. Robinson, 121 F.3d 971, 976 (5th Cir. 1997) ("The fact of representation...is generally not within the privilege."). It is the fiduciary relationship, not the attorney-client relationship, that is the basis for the reporting requirement.

The claims that Zell asserts on his own behalf fare no better. His compliance with a client's wish to avoid the FATCA reporting requirements potentially subjects the client—not Zell—to the risk of imposition of a 30% tax. See 26 U.S.C. § 1471(b)(1)(D). Zell himself has not been assessed a 30% withholding tax under FATCA, nor could he (or his clients) be, because 30% withholding under § 1471 is not presently being imposed against Israeli FFIs or their recalcitrant account holders. Zell has not had a penalty imposed against him for any willful failure to file an FBAR either. He has therefore suffered no concrete and particularized injury sufficient to convey standing. See Lujan, 504 U.S. at 560. Taking the allegations of the complaint at face value, Zell is losing clients because of discriminatory actions of the Israeli banks. Indeed, in their Reply, Plaintiffs admit it is Zell's client, a non-party, who objects to reporting. Reply at 4.

In their reply, Plaintiffs are more focused, directing all of their ire at the invasion of their privacy:

> A central burden is extensive financial disclosure that Plaintiffs do not want. … This opposition to disclosure provides standing to challenge provisions (including IGAs) expressly requiring disclosure…. So [P]laintiffs have standing to challenge FATCA, IGAs, and FBAR disclosure requirements, and they have standing to challenge the FFI Penalty (30% tax on payments to non-compliant FFIs)…because those FFIs disclose account holders' information because of that penalty.

Reply at 3. They continue, "Plaintiffs object to disclosure and also object to this penalty specifically designed to compel them to this disclosure, providing them standing." Reply at 4.

> But Plaintiffs verified that they do not want their financial affairs disclosed to the U.S. Government under FATCA, including [26 U.S.C. 6038D(a)], the necessary implication of which is either that Plaintiffs are doing such disclosure and want to cease or that Plaintiffs have arranged their affairs so as to avoid such disclosure that would otherwise have occurred, either of which gives them standing. (See, e.g., Doc. No. 1, PageID 12 (¶ 23), 14-15 (¶¶ 35, 37) (altered financial affairs to avoid disclosure), 15 (¶ 38).) Moreover, individuals may report otherwise qualifying accounts under that amount, are encouraged to do so, and the Government has not said that it would refuse such reports.
> 11 The Government claims Plaintiffs may not challenge the FBAR requirement's Willfulness Penalty, 31 U.S.C. 5321(b)(C)(i), because none alleged "a bank account exceeding $10,000 in value." (Doc. No. 16, PageID 213.) But Plaintiffs alleged that they reasonably feared they would be subject to the Willfulness Penalty for willful failure to file FBARs.

Reply at 5.

Plaintiffs also contend that the existence of applicable statutory requirements and penalties might suffice for standing to challenge the unconstitutional provisions. Reply at 6 (citing Susan B. Anthony List v. Driehaus, 134 S. Ct. 2334, 2341-46 (2014); Babbitt v. United Farm Workers Nat'l Union, 442 U.S. 289, 298 (1979) and Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179, 188 (1973)). However, this only applies where petitioners have alleged "an intention to engage in a course of conduct arguably affected with a constitutional interest." Susan B. Anthony List, 134

S. Ct. at 2332. Plaintiffs here have not identified a constitutionally protected interest.

The Supreme Court has held that depositors have no "reasonable expectation of privacy" in "information kept in bank records" because documents like "financial statements and deposit slips[ ] contain only information voluntarily conveyed to the banks and exposed to their employees in the ordinary course of business." United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435, 442 (1976); see also id. at 440 (noting that the depositor "can assert neither ownership nor possession" over the records at issue); Smith, 442 U.S. at 743-44 (1979) ("[A] person has no legitimate expectation of privacy in information he voluntarily turns over to third parties."). [3]

The only Plaintiff to have standing then is Kuettel, who is limited to claims concerning the FBAR requirement present in Count Three and Count Six.

Count Three challenges what it characterizes as heightened reporting requirements for foreign financial accounts denying U.S. citizens living abroad the equal protection of the laws. Plaintiffs quote both the Administrative Procedure Act and the Constitution. Under section 706 of the Administrative Procedure Act ("APA"), a court must "hold unlawful and set aside agency action...found to be –...(B) contrary to constitutional right, power, privilege, or immunity." 5 U.S.C. § 706. In the Constitution, the Fifth Amendment provides that "No person shall...be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law...." U.S. Const. amend. V. The Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment includes a guarantee of equal protection equivalent to that expressly provided for under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. "An equal protection claim against the federal government is analyzed under the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment." Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, 515 U.S. 200, 217 (1995); United States v. Ovalle, 136 F.3d 1092, 1095 (6th Cir. 1998). Thus, the federal government may not "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws," U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1.

"We begin, of course, with the presumption that the challenged statute"—FATCA—"is valid. Its wisdom is not the concern of the courts; if a challenged action does not violate the Constitution, it must be sustained[.]" INS v. Chadha, 426 U.S. 919, 944 (1983); see also National Federation of Independent Business v. Sebelius 132 S. Ct. 2566, 2594 (2012) ("'[E]very reasonable construction must be resorted to, in order to save a statute from unconstitutionality.'" (quoting Hooper v. California, 155 U.S. 648, 657 (1895))).

12 Plaintiffs contend the only financial information the IRS requires to be reported about domestic accounts is the amount of interest paid to the accounts during a calendar year, 26 U.S.C. §§ 6049(a), (b); 26 C.F.R. §§ 1.6049-4(a)(1), 1.6049-4T(b)(1). For a foreign account, the information reported to the IRS includes not only the interest paid to the account, 26 USC § 1471(c)(1)(C); 26 C.F.R. §§ 1.1471-4(d)(3)(ii),-4(d)(4)(iv); Canadian IGA, art. 2, § 2(a)(4); Czech IGA, art. 2, § 2(a)(4); Israeli IGA, art. 2, § 2(a)(4); Swiss IGA, arts. 3, 5, but also the amount of any income, gain, loss, deduction, or credit recognized on the account, 26 C.F.R. § 1.6038D-4(a)(8), whether the account was opened or closed during the year, id. § 1.6038D-4(a)(6), and the balance of the account, 26 USC §§ 1471(c)(1)(C), 6038D(c)(4); 26 CFR §§ 1.1471-4(d)(3)(ii), 1.6038D-4(a)(5); Canadian IGA, art. 2, § 2(a)(6); Czech IGA, art. 2, § 2(a)(6); Israeli IGA, art. 2, § 2(a)(6); Swiss IGA, arts. 3, 5; FinCEN, BSA Electronic Filing Requirements For Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Verified Complaint for Declaratory and Injunctive Relief 41 Case: 3:15-cv-00250-TMR Doc #: 1 Filed: 07/14/15 Page: 41 of 59 PAGEID #: 41 Accounts (FinCEN Form 114) 15 (June 2014), http://www.fincen.gov/forms/files/FBARL#ine0#Item0#FilingÏnstructions.pdf. Plaintiffs assert that comparable information is not required to be disclosed regarding domestic accounts of U.S. citizens.

Plaintiffs decry that U.S. citizens living in foreign countries are in this manner treated differently than U.S. citizens living in the United States. According to Plaintiffs, the federal government has no legitimate interest in knowing the amount of any income, gain, loss, deduction, or credit recognized on a foreign account, whether a foreign account was opened or closed during the year, or the balance of a foreign account.

Plaintiffs contend that the "heightened reporting requirements" imposed by FATCA, the FBAR information-reporting requirements, and the Canadian, Swiss, Czech, and Israeli IGAs, violate the Fifth Amendment rights of "U.S. citizens living in a foreign country" and should be enjoined. See Complaint ¶¶ 124-130.

Plaintiffs are unlikely to succeed on the merits of their claim that "U.S. citizens living in a foreign country are treated differently than U.S. citizens living in the United States," Complaint ¶ 128, without rational basis. A litigant may challenge federal government action under the Fifth Amendment's due process clause on the same grounds as a challenge to state action under the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause. See Weinberger v. Wiesenfeld, 420 U.S. 636, 638 n.2 (1975); see also Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 93 (1976). "Under the Due Process Clause, if a statute has a reasonable relation to a proper legislative purpose, and [is] neither arbitrary nor discriminatory, the requirements of due process are satisfied." Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502, 537 (1934) (internal quotation marks and citations omitted). Likewise, under the Equal Protection Clause, a statute not directed at a suspect or quasi-suspect class must be upheld if it has a rational basis. Clements v. Fashing, 457 U.S. 957, 967 (1982) (citing Williamson v. Lee Optical Co., 348 U.S. 483, 489 (1955)). "U.S. citizens living in a foreign country" are not a suspect or semi-suspect class of people, so Defendants need only show that "the classification drawn by [a] statute is rationally related to a legitimate state interest." City of Cleburne, Tex. v. Cleburne Living Ctr., 473 U.S. 432, 439 (1985); see also Igartua de la Rosa v. United States, 842 F. Supp. 607, 611 (D.P.R. 1994).

A court "will not overturn [government conduct] unless the varying treatment of different groups or persons is so unrelated to the achievement of any combination of legitimate purposes that [it] can only conclude that the [government's] actions were irrational." Vance v. Bradley, 440 U.S. 93, 97 (1979); see also FCC v. Beach Communications, Inc., 508 U.S. 307, 313-14 (1993) (a statute subject to rational basis review must be upheld "if there is any reasonably conceivable state of facts that could provide a rational basis for the classification."). A facial challenge, because of the extraordinary relief, requires a "heavy burden" and is "the most difficult challenge to mount successfully[.]" United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 745 (1987).

13 Plaintiffs' equal protection claims fail because the statutes, regulations, and executive agreements that they challenge simply do not make the classification they assert. None of the challenged provisions single out U.S. citizens living abroad. Instead, all Americans with specified foreign bank accounts or assets are subject to reporting requirements, no matter where they happen to live. The provisions Plaintiffs contend discriminate against "U.S. citizens living abroad" actually apply to all U.S. taxpayers, no matter their residence. Plaintiffs argue that "[i]n practice, the increased reporting requirements for foreign financial accounts discriminate against U.S. citizens living abroad," see Doc. No. 8-1 at 22 (PageID 160), suggesting a claim of discrimination based on disparate impact. But it is well-settled that "mere disparate impact is insufficient to demonstrate an equal protection violation." Copeland v. Machulis, 57 F.3d 476, 481 (6th Cir. 1995); see also Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 244-45 (1976).

FATCA requires FFIs to provide specified information about "United States Accounts." See 26 U.S.C. § 1471(c)(1)(C). "United States Accounts" are defined in the statute as "any financial account which is held by one or more specified United States persons or United States owned foreign entities." 26 U.S.C. § 1471(d)(1)(A). Similarly, the individual reporting requirements of FATCA under § 6038D(c)(4) apply to "any individual who, during any taxable year, holds any interest in a specified foreign financial asset[.]" 26 U.S.C. § 6038D(a) (emphasis added). The Bank Secrecy Act, under which the FBAR reporting requirement arises, also applies to any taxpayer with a financial interest in, or signatory authority over, a foreign financial account exceeding certain monetary thresholds. See 31 U.S.C. § 5314; 31 C.F.R. §§ 1010.350 & 1010.306(c). Neither do the challenged regulations make the classification Plaintiffs challenge; they apply to all taxpayers holding certain foreign accounts or assets. See 26 C.F.R. § 1.1471-4(d)(3)(ii) (FFI reporting requirement regarding "accounts held by specified U.S. persons"); 26 C.F.R. § 1.6038D-4(a)(5), (6), & (8) (setting forth information to be reported in Statement of Specified Foreign Financial Assets). Neither do the IGAs distinguish between the residence of the account holders whose information must be reported.

Plaintiffs have not correctly identified the classification made by these laws. The most basic element of an equal protection claim is the existence of at least two classifications of persons treated differently under the law. See Silver v. Franklin Twp. Bd. of Zoning Appeals, 966 F.2d 1031, 1036 (6th Cir. 1992). But Plaintiffs fail to recognize that similarly situated persons to themselves

—U.S. taxpayers living in the United States who hold foreign accounts—are not treated differently. In fact, for U.S. citizens living abroad, the regulations under 26 C.F.R. § 1.6038D-2 do not kick in until higher reporting thresholds are reached, as the regulations recognize that such individuals are likely to have significant foreign accounts in the ordinary course of their lives. For married individuals filing jointly, the filing threshold goes from $50,000 for U.S. residents to $150,000 for non-U.S. residents. To the extent that the law treats U.S. citizens living abroad unequally, it is in their favor insofar as the reporting requirements for foreign accounts are actually less onerous.

The distinction that the regulations do make is rationally related to a legitimate government interest. The U.S. tax system is based in large part on voluntary compliance: taxpayers are expected to disclose their sources of income annually on their federal tax returns. The information reporting required by FATCA is intended to address the use of offshore accounts to facilitate tax evasion, and to strengthen the integrity of the voluntary compliance system by placing U.S. taxpayers that have access to offshore investment opportunities in an equal position with U.S. taxpayers that invest within the United States. Third party information reporting is an important tool used by the IRS to close the tax gap between taxes due and taxes paid. The knowledge that financial institutions will also be disclosing information about an account encourages individuals to properly disclose their income on their tax returns. See Leandra Lederman, Statutory Speed Bumps: The Roles Third Parties Play in Tax Compliance, 60 STAN. L. REV. 695, 711 (2007). Unlike most countries, U.S. taxpayers are subject to tax on their worldwide income, and their investments have become increasingly global in scope. Absent the FATCA reporting by FFIs, some U.S. taxpayers may attempt to evade U.S. tax by hiding money in offshore accounts where, prior to FATCA, they were not subject to automatic reporting to the IRS by FFIs. The information required to be reported, including payments made or credited to the account and the balance or value of the account is to assist the IRS in determining previously unreported income and the value of such information is based on experience from the DOJ prosecution of offshore tax evasion. See Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations bipartisan report on "Offshore Tax Evasion: The Effort to Collect Unpaid Taxes on Billions in Hidden Offshore Accounts," February 26, 2014; see also Cal. Bankers Ass'n v. Shultz, 416 U.S. 21, 29 (1974) ("when law enforcement personnel are confronted with the secret foreign bank account or the secret foreign financial institution they are placed in an impossible situation…they must subject themselves to time consuming and often times fruitless foreign legal process.").

14 The FBAR reporting requirements, likewise, have a rational basis. As the Supreme Court noted in California Bankers, when Congress enacted the Bank Secrecy Act (which provides the statutory basis for the FBAR), it "recognized that the use of financial institutions, both domestic and foreign, in furtherance of activities designed to evade the regulatory mechanism of the United States, had markedly increased." Id. at 38. The Government has a legitimate interest in collecting information about foreign accounts, including account balances held by U.S. citizens, for the same reason that it requires reporting of information on U.S.-based accounts. The information assists law enforcement and the IRS, among other things, in identifying unreported taxable income of U.S. taxpayers that is held in foreign accounts. Without FBAR reporting, the Government's efforts to track financial crime and tax evasion would be hampered. Congress, through FBAR reporting, attempted to complement domestic reporting on financial transactions. U.S. taxpayers who place their funds in foreign accounts cannot put themselves on a better footing than U.S. taxpayers who conduct their transactions stateside. FBAR reporting prevents individuals from trying to evade domestic regulation and provides a deterrent for those who would use foreign accounts to engage in criminal activity.

The distinctions made by FATCA, the FBAR reporting requirements, and the IGAs simply do not evince, on their face, discrimination that is "so unjustifiable as to be violative of due process." Schneider v. Rusk, 377 U.S. 163, 168 (1964).

In Count Six, Plaintiffs contend that the FBAR "Willfullness Penalty" is unconstitutional under the Excessive Fines Clause. Plaintiffs decry that 26 U.S.C. § 5321 imposes a penalty of up to $100,000 or 50% of the balance of the account at the time of the violation, whichever is greater, for failures to file an FBAR as required by 26 U.S.C. § 5314 (the FBAR "Willfulness Penalty"). 31 U.S.C. § 5321(b)(5)(C)(i).

Plaintiffs allege the Willfulness Penalty is designed to punish and is therefore subject to the Excessive Fines Clause. Plaintiffs further allege the Willfulness Penalty is grossly disproportionate to the gravity of the offense.

Plaintiffs' Eighth Amendment claims, however, are not ripe for adjudication because no withholding or FBAR penalty has been imposed against any Plaintiff; indeed, the 30% FFI withholding tax under § 1471(a) will never be imposed against any of them because they are individuals, not FFIs. Additionally, Plaintiffs' claims fail because they cannot show that the FATCA taxes and the willful FBAR penalties are grossly disproportional to the gravity of their (as yet unspecified) conduct. See United States v. Bajakajian, 524 U.S. 321, 334 (1998).

"Ripeness is a justiciability doctrine designed to prevent the courts, through premature adjudication, from entangling themselves in abstract disagreements. Ripeness becomes an issue when a case is anchored in future events that may not occur as anticipated, or at all." Kentucky Press Ass'n v. Kentucky, 454 F.3d 505, 509 (6th Cir. 2006) (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). The Sixth Circuit has listed three factors to be considered when deciding whether claims are ripe for adjudication: (1) the likelihood that the harm alleged by the plaintiffs will ever come to pass; (2) whether the factual record is sufficiently developed to produce a fair adjudication of the merits of the parties' respective claim; and (3) the hardship to the parties if judicial relief is denied at this stage in the proceedings. Id.

Plaintiffs' Eighth Amendment challenges are not ripe under the Kentucky Press Association factors. First, it is not clear that any harm Plaintiffs contemplate will ever come to pass. With respect to the FATCA withholding tax in § 1471(b)(1), Plaintiffs can request a credit or refund of a future withheld amount on their federal income tax returns. See 26 U.S.C § 1474(a); 26 C.F.R. § 1.1474-3. Several Plaintiffs are United States citizens, so they must file federal income tax returns anyway. 26 C.F.R. § 1.6012-1(a)(1). Nelson and Kuettel, who renounced their U.S. citizenship, may possibly also be required to file returns if they have U.S.-source income. 26 C.F.R. § 1.6012-1(b)(1)(i). As for the willful FBAR penalty, whether it is imposed is entirely in IRS's discretion. See 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5); 31 C.F.R. § 1010.810(g).

15 Second, the factual record is not sufficiently developed to weigh whether the FATCA withholding taxes or FBAR penalty is grossly disproportionate, and such a factual record cannot reasonably be developed here. An Eighth Amendment proportionality analysis is "guided by objective criteria, including (i) the gravity of the offense and the harshness of the penalty; (ii) the [penalty] imposed on other [offenders] in the same jurisdiction; and (iii) the [penalty] imposed for commission of the same [offense] in other jurisdictions." Solem v. Helm, 463 U.S. 277, 292 (1983) (Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause analysis); see also Bajakajian, 524 U.S. at 336 (drawing Excessive Fines Clause standard from Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause jurisprudence). The first factor requires review of the circumstances of the offense "in great detail." Solem, 463 U.S. at 290-91. In this case, there are no circumstances to review, because no FATCA tax or FBAR penalty has been imposed. A fact-specific determination of excessiveness is impossible where any wrongful conduct is hypothetical.

Finally, Plaintiffs will not suffer appreciable hardship from the Court declining to hear their Eighth Amendment challenges. The Sixth Circuit has noted that, "[r]ipeness will not exist … when a plaintiff has suffered (or will immediately suffer) a small but legally cognizable injury, yet the benefits to adjudicating the dispute at some later time outweigh the hardship the plaintiff will have to endure by waiting." Airline Profs. Ass'n of Int'l Broth. of Teamsters, Local No. 1224 v. Airborne, Inc., 332 F.3d 983, 988 n.4 (6th Cir. 2003). Challenges to statutes are not ripe where delaying judicial review results in no real harm. See Nat'l Park Hosp. Ass'n v. Dep't of Interior, 538 U.S. 803, 810-11 (2003). Once an amount is actually withheld from a payment, Plaintiffs can (after properly exhausting administrative remedies) file a refund suit if the IRS improperly fails to refund the withholding. See 26 U.S.C. § 7422. If an FBAR penalty is assessed against a Plaintiff, that Plaintiff may challenge the penalty at a later time. See Moore v. United States, No. C13-2063-RAJ, 2015 WL 1510007 at *12-*13 (W.D. Wash. Apr. 1, 2015) (rejecting Eighth Amendment challenge to non-willful FBAR penalty). At present, Plaintiffs have not established that their Eighth Amendment claims require immediate injunctive relief.

Because they have not alleged that any FATCA withholding taxes or willful FBAR penalties have actually been imposed against them, Plaintiffs appear to raise a facial challenge to those exactions under the Excessive Fines Clause. To prevail on a facial challenge, Plaintiffs must show that the statutes are "unconstitutional in all of [their] applications," City of Los Angeles v. Patel, 135 S. Ct. 2443, 2451 (2015) (internal quotation omitted). The FATCA taxes satisfy neither of the two Bajakajian factors: they are not fines, nor are they grossly disproportional. 524 U.S. at 334. The willful FBAR penalty, while arguably equivalent to a fine, is not grossly disproportional in all applications.

The FATCA withholding taxes in § 1471(a) and § 1471(d)(1)(B) are taxes, not penalties. The Eighth Amendment applies to payments that "constitute punishment for an offense." Bajakajian, 524 U.S. at 328. Neither taxes nor remedial fines are punishment for an offense, and thus are not subject to the Eighth Amendment. See Austin v. United States, 509 U.S. 602, 621-22 (1993) (a fine is not "punishment for an offense" if it serves a wholly remedial purpose).

The FATCA withholding tax rate of 30% is remedial because it is the same rate imposed on all fixed or determinable annual or periodic income paid from a U.S. source to a non-resident alien. 26 U.S.C. § 1441(a), (b). FATCA's withholding tax on FFIs effectively assumes that if an FFI refuses to disclose information to the IRS, all U.S.-sourced payments to its account holders may be subject to that rate of taxation. Similarly, FATCA's withholding tax on recalcitrant account holders under § 1471(b)(1)(D) merely extends the same withholding rate as § 1441 to accounts where the account holder refuses to be identified. The rate is effectively reduced if the FFI's country has a substantive tax treaty reducing the rate of tax on a particular payment, see 26 U.S.C. § 1474(b)(2)(A)(i), underlining that the FATCA withholdings are meant to collect tax, not to impose a punishment. Again, to the extent that one of the individual Plaintiffs has money withheld over and above what is necessary to pay his or her federal income tax, the withholding is refundable. 26 U.S.C. § 1474; 26 C.F.R. §§ 1.1474-3, 1.1474-5. At least as to these Plaintiffs, the FATCA withholding taxes serve the remedial purpose of protecting the fisc. See Helvering v. Mitchell, 303 U.S. 391, 400-01 (1938) (50% fraud penalty was remedial in nature because it was "provided primarily as a safeguard for the protection of the revenue and to reimburse the Government for the heavy expense of investigation").

16 Nor is the magnitude of the withholding tax grossly disproportional, since it roughly approximates the presumed tax loss from FATCA non-compliance. Congress's determination that a 30% withholding tax rate was appropriate is accorded substantial deference. See, e.g., United States v. Dobrowolski, 406 F. App'x 11, 12-13 (6th Cir. 2010) (citing cases) (noting traditional deference given to legislative policy determinations). A penalty that is equal to, and does not duplicate, the applicable tax rate on a given payment is proportional to the "offense" of failing to report information under FATCA—it certainly is not excessive in "all" applications. Therefore, Plaintiffs' facial Eighth Amendment challenge to the § 1471 taxes is rejected.

The willful FBAR penalty also survives a facial challenge because the maximum penalty will be constitutional in at least some circumstances. A maximum penalty fixed by Congress is due substantial deference from the courts. See Bajakajian, 524 U.S. at 336 ("[J]udgments about the appropriate punishment for an offense belong in the first instance to the legislature."); see also United States v. 817 N.E. 29th Drive, Wilton Manors, Fla., 175 F.3d 1304, 1309 (11th Cir. 1999). Congress increased the maximum FBAR penalty to its present level in 2004. See 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(C). Congress chose this penalty range because FBAR reporting furthers an important law enforcement goal. The Senate Finance Committee explained:

> The Committee understands that the number of individuals involved in using offshore bank accounts to engage in abusive tax scams has grown significantly in recent years .... The Committee is concerned about this activity and believes that improving compliance with this reporting requirement is vitally important to sound tax administration, to combating terrorism, and to preventing the use of abusive tax schemes and scams.

S. Rep. 108-257, at 32(2004) (explaining increase in maximum willful penalty and creation of new civil non-willful penalty). Indeed, FBARs are available not only to the IRS but also to a variety of law enforcement agencies investigating crimes like money laundering and terrorist financing. See, e.g., Amendment to the Bank Secrecy Act Regulations–Reports of Foreign Financial Accounts, 75 Fed. Reg. 8844, 8844 (Feb. 26, 2010). Setting the maximum willful penalty as a substantial proportion of the account ensures that the willful penalty is not merely a cost of doing business for tax evaders, terrorists, and organized criminals.

A 50% willful FBAR penalty—the maximum permitted by statute—is severe. But given the ills it combats, it is an appropriate penalty in at least some circumstances. Accordingly, the Plaintiffs' facial challenge to it under the Eighth Amendment fails.

IV. Conclusion

Plaintiffs have failed to establish that they are entitled to a preliminary injunction. First, Plaintiffs are not likely to succeed on the merits. They lack standing, as the harms they allege are remote and speculative harms, most of which would be caused by third parties, illusory, or self-inflicted. Plaintiffs' allegations also fail as a matter of law, as there is no constitutionally recognized right to privacy of bank records.

Second, Plaintiffs are not likely to suffer irreparable injury if a preliminary injunction is not granted. Their lack of standing means that they lack a sufficiently concrete and particularized injury to sue in the first instance, much less an injury that is so imminent and irreparably harmful as to justify preliminary injunctive relief. The absence of the irreparable injury is reinforced by the facts that: their Fifth Amendment equal-protection allegation is based on a classification that does not exist; their Eighth Amendment claims are not ripe, with no FATCA withholding or willful FBAR penalties having been imposed against them; and their Fourth Amendment counts are based on information reporting that does not violate the Constitution.

17 The third factor, the balance of the equities, also weighs against the entry of a preliminary injunction. That is because the fourth factor, the public interest, is best served by keeping the statutory provisions at issue, as well as their implementing regulations and international agreements, in place and enforceable during the pendency of this lawsuit. The FATCA statute, the IGAs, and the FBAR requirements encourage compliance with tax laws, combat tax evasion, and deter the use of foreign accounts to engage in criminal activity. A preliminary injunction would harm these efforts and intrude upon the province of Congress and the President to determine how best to achieve these policy goals. Thus, Plaintiffs' Motion for Preliminary Injunction, ECF 8, is DENIED.

ORDER DENYING DEFENDANT JAMES HENRY PFLUEGER'S MOTION TO DISMISS COUNT 14 OF THE INDICTMENT

LESLIE E. KOBAYASHI, District Judge.

1 Before the Court is Defendant James Henry Pflueger's ("Defendant") Motion to Dismiss Count 14 of the Indictment ("Motion"), filed on February 16, 2012. The United States of America ("the Government") filed its memorandum in opposition under seal on March 2, 2012, and Defendant filed his reply on March 14, 2012. This matter came on for hearing on March 21, 2012. Appearing on behalf of Defendant was Steven Toscher, Esq., and appearing on behalf of the Government was Assistant United States Attorney Leslie Osborne, Jr. After careful consideration of the Motion, supporting and opposing memoranda, and the arguments of counsel, Defendant's Motion is HEREBY DENIED because whether Defendant was ignorant of the law or was unclear as to what his legal obligations were is not a basis for dismissing Count 14 but a matter for trial, as set forth more fully below.

BACKGROUND

On September 15, 2010, a grand jury sitting in the District of Hawai‘i returned a fourteen-count Indictment charging Defendant and four others with various criminal tax violations and conspiracy to commit these violations. The facts pertinent to the instant Motion are as follows: the Government alleges that, on or about July 1, 2008, Defendant was required by law but did not file a United States Department of the Treasury Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts, Form TDF 90–22.1 (commonly referred to as an "FBAR") regarding his financial interest in and authority over a financial account in a bank account in Switzerland that had an aggregate value of more than $10,000. In Count 14, Defendant is charged with failing to file an FBAR regarding this bank account. [Indictment at ¶ 32.]

In the instant Motion, Defendant asks the Court to dismiss Count 14. Briefly, the Motion argues that: (1) as of June 30, 2008, the deadline for filing an FBAR for 2007, the law was not sufficiently clear as to whether Defendant was required to file an FBAR reporting his interest in the bank account in Switzerland; and (2) Count 14 requires the Government to prove that Defendant's failure to file an FBAR was "willful" and, because the law was unsettled at the time that the Government contends an FBAR should have been filed, the Government cannot, as a matter of law, prove that Defendant willfully failed to file a 2007 FBAR.

In opposition, the Government argues that it can and will marshal evidence sufficient to prove Defendant's willfulness in failing to file the required FBAR, and points out that Defendant fails to provide any case authority for the proposition that the law surrounding the FBAR filing requirement is too vague to be enforced. The Government submits that it has successfully prosecuted others for FBAR violations and that a challenge to the failure to prove a defendant's willfulness is for appeal and not a matter for pretrial motions.

In reply, Defendant reiterates that the instant Motion should be granted because he was not provided fair notice of his legal obligation to file an FBAR because the law was unclear and unsettled. Therefore, Defendant submits, the Government cannot prove a necessary element of the offense, namely, that Defendant willfully violated the FBAR requirements.

DISCUSSION

2 The Ninth Circuit has stated:

> In examining a statute for vagueness, we must determine whether a person of average intelligence would reasonably understand that the charged conduct is proscribed. United States v. Mazurie, 419 U.S. 544, 553, 95 S.Ct. 710, 42 L.Ed.2d 706 (1975). The statute "must be examined in the light of the facts of the case at hand." Id. at 550, 95 S.Ct. 710.

United States v. Williams, 441 F.3d 716, 724 (9th Cir.2006).

As to 31 U.S.C. §§ 5314 and 5322(a), the statutes charged in Count 14 of the Indictment, Defendant cannot establish that these statutes are vague. In 1994, the Supreme Court held that to establish the willful violation of 31 U.S.C. § 5324, "the Government must prove that the defendant acted with knowledge that his conduct was unlawful." Ratzlaf v. United States, 510 U.S. 135, 136–37 (1994).[1] By inference, the Supreme Court extended this determination to a § 5314 violation by noting that willfulness is established by "reasonable inferences from the evidence of [the] defendant's conduct" and that "the Government has not found it 'impossible' to persuade a jury to make such inferences in prosecutions for willful violations of §§ 5313, 5314, or 5316." Id. at 149, n. 19 (citing United States v. Dichne, 612 F.2d 632, 636–638 (2d Cir.1979)).

"Willfulness may be proven through inference from conduct meant to conceal or mislead sources of income or other financial information." United States v. Struman, 951 F.2d 1466, 1476 (6th Cir.1991) (citing Spies v. United States, 317 U.S. 492, 499, 63 S.Ct. 364, 368, 87 L.Ed. 418 (1943)). Whether the Government can prove that Defendant knew that he was required to file a FBAR and knew that his failure to do so was unlawful is a matter for trial.

CONCLUSION

On the basis of the foregoing, Defendant James Henry Pflueger's Motion to Dismiss Count 14 of the Indictment, filed February 16, 2012, is HEREBY DENIED.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

[1] In 1994, Congress amended 31 U.S.C. § 5322 to eliminate the willfulness requirement in § 5324 violations. See, e.g., United States v. Ahmad, 213 F.3d 805, 809 (4th Cir.2000) (citing Pub.L. No. 103–325, § 411(c)(1), 108 Stat. 2160, 2253 (1994)). The current version of § 5322(a) states:

> A person willfully violating this subchapter or a regulation prescribed or order issued under this subchapter (except section 5315 or 5324 of this title or a regulation prescribed under section 5315 or 5324), or willfully violating a regulation prescribed under section 21 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act or section 123 of Public Law 91–508, shall be fined not more than $250,000, or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.

MEMORANDUM RE CROSS MOTIONS FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

Baylson, Judge

1 In this tax penalty action, we must determine whether genuine disputes of material fact preclude summary judgment on behalf of Plaintiff, Arthur Bedrosian, or Defendant, the United States. Bedrosian initiated this suit, alleging that the United States committed illegal exaction by imposing an unwarranted tax penalty on him. The United States countersued for full payment of the penalty it had assessed. For the reasons discussed below, we deny summary judgment for both parties.

I. UNDISPUTED FACTS

The following is a fair account of the factual assertions at issue in this case, as taken from both parties Statements of Fact and not genuinely disputed. Bedrosian is a United States citizen who has had, over the past several decades, a successful career in the pharmaceutical industry. ECF No. 22, Def.'s Mot. for Summary Judgment ("Def.'s Mot."), Def.'s Statement of Facts ("DSOF") ¶¶ 1, 3. He currently holds the position of Chief Executive Officer at Lannett Company, Inc., a manufacturer and distributor of generic medications. Id., DSOF ¶¶ 6, 10. In this role, Bedrosian supervises approximately 100 employees, signs contracts and financial statements on behalf of Lannett, researches FDA regulations, and decides company policy with respect to FDA filings. Id., DSOF ¶¶ 9-10.

Bedrosian opened a savings account with Swiss Credit Corporation in Switzerland in the early 1970s, which account was transitioned to UBS when UBS acquired Swiss Credit Corporation. Id., DSOF ¶¶ 11-12. At some point, at least as early as 2005, a second account was added, although Bedrosian avers that he always considered them one account. Id., DSOF ¶ 14; ECF No. 26, Pl.'s Opp'n, Ex. A (Pl.'s Dep. Tr.) at 132:9-133:15. The client numbers for each account ended in 6167 and 5316. Def.'s Mot., DSOF ¶ 15. The parties dispute the extent of Bedrosian's involvement in the management of his UBS accounts, but it is at least clear that Bedrosian met with a UBS banker about once a year to review the accounts' performance. Id., DSOF ¶ 18; Pl.'s Opp'n, Ex. A at 58:6-21, 115:3-22. During 2007, the tax year at issue in this proceeding, both UBS accounts carried balances of significantly more than $10,000. Def.'s Mot., DSOF ¶ 19. In November 2008, Bedrosian requested that UBS close his account ending in 6167 and transfer all assets therein to another Swiss bank. Id., DSOF ¶ 20. The following month, he requested that UBS close his account ending in 5316 and transfer all assets therein to a domestic account at Wachovia. Id., DSOF ¶ 21.

Throughout the decades that Bedrosian maintained the Swiss accounts, he did not prepare his own tax returns; rather, two accountants did so—Seymour Handleman from 1972 until 2006, and Sheldon Bransky from 2007 onwards. Id., DSOF ¶¶ 22-23, 31. Bedrosian did not inform Handleman of the UBS accounts' existence until the 1990s, because, Bedrosian avers, "[Handleman] never asked." Id., Ex. S (Pl.'s Dep. Tr.) at 67:1-5. When Bedrosian did tell Handleman, the accountant said that "for the past 20 years, [Bedrosian had] been breaking the law" because he was "supposed to be marking [his] return that [he has] a foreign bank account and [he had not] been doing that." Id., Ex. S at 67:7-16. But, in response to Bedrosian asking what he should do to rectify the problem, Handleman allegedly told him "to just leave it alone because the damage was already done" and that, upon Bedrosian's death, the assets in the Swiss accounts would be repatriated as part of Bedrosian's estate and taxes would be paid on them then. Id., Ex. S at 69:18-24. Based on that advice, as well as his fear that he would be penalized for his years of noncompliance, Bedrosian did not report either Swiss account on his tax returns until 2007, when Handleman died and Bedrosian hired Bransky to take over his accounting work. Id., Ex. S at 72:1-5, 203:11-21.

2 Bedrosian filed a federal income tax return for 2007 that reflected, for the first time, that he had assets in a foreign financial account in Switzerland. Id., DSOF ¶ 34. Specifically, on Schedule B of his return, Bedrosian answered "yes" to question 7a asking whether "[a]t any time during 2007, [he had] an interest in or signature or other authority over a financial account in a foreign country," and listed Switzerland as the foreign country in which the account was located. Id., Ex. N (Pl.'s 2007 Return and FBAR). Bedrosian also filed a Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts, commonly referred to as an "FBAR," for the first time in 2007. Id., DSOF ¶ 38, Ex. N. But, critically, he only reported the existence of his Swiss account ending in 5316, which had assets totaling approximately $240,000, and did not report the account ending in 6167, which had assets totaling approximately $2.3 million. Id., DSOF ¶ 38, Ex. N. Bedrosian did not report any of the income that he earned on either Swiss account on his 2007 return. Id., DSOF ¶ 35.

Sometime after 2008, UBS told Bedrosian that it would be providing his account information to the United States government. Id., DSOF ¶ 41. Around this time, prior to the government's initiation of its investigation, Bedrosian hired an attorney to look into his reporting obligations as they pertained to the Swiss accounts. Id., Ex. S at 85:11-24, 184:11-185:23. In August 2010, Bedrosian filed an amended federal return for 2007 on which he reported the approximately $220,000 of income he had earned from the Swiss accounts. Id., DSOF ¶ 43, Ex. P (Pl.'s Amended 2007 Return). He also filed an amended FBAR for 2007 in August 2010, on which he reported both UBS accounts rather than just the one ending in 6167. Pl.'s Mot., PSOF ¶ 13, Ex. D (Pl.'s Amended 2007 FBAR). Although Bedrosian took this corrective action before the government began its audit, he did not do so until after the IRS had discovered the existence of the two accounts. Id., PSOF ¶ 38; Def.'s Mot., Ex. Q (IRS Memo) (stating that UBS supplied the IRS with information about the existence of the account ending in 6167 on July 19, 2010).

The IRS initiated its investigation of Bedrosian in April 2011, with a focus on tax year 2008. Pl.'s Mot., PSOF ¶ 14. Beginning then, Bedrosian engaged with the Service cooperatively, providing them with all documentation requested. Id., PSOF ¶¶ 17-19. The investigation culminated in a case panel of IRS agents recommending that Bedrosian be penalized for non-willful violations of the FBAR reporting requirement and that the case against him be closed. Id., PSOF ¶ 27, Ex. F (John West Dep. Tr.) at 51:10-16. For reasons unclear in the record, the case was not closed but instead was re-assigned to another IRS agent, Pamela Christensen, who conducted her own review and concluded that Bedrosian's violation of Section 5314 had been willful. Id., PSOF ¶¶ 29-30, Ex. G (Pamela Christensen Dep. Tr.) at 17:8-15, 21:18-21. On July 18, 2013, the IRS sent Bedrosian a letter stating that it was imposing a penalty for his willful failure to file TDF 90-22.1, the FBAR form, for tax year 2007. Id., PSOF ¶ 35, Ex. I (Letter from IRS). The proposed penalty was $975,789.17, 50% of the maximum value of the account ($1,951,578.34) and therefore the largest penalty possible under the regulations. Id., PSOF ¶ 36, Ex. I.

II. PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

Bedrosian filed suit on October 27, 2015, alleging one count of illegal exaction (ECF No. 1). The United States answered on February 26, 2016 and asserted a counterclaim for full payment of the penalty it alleged was due, as well as accrued interest on such penalty, a late payment penalty, and other statutory additions to the penalty (ECF No. 5). Bedrosian filed an answer to the counterclaim on March 21, 2016 (ECF No. 7). Both parties then moved for summary judgment, the United States on November 30, 2016 (ECF No. 22) and Bedrosian on December 5, 2016 (ECF No. 25). Oppositions were filed on December 19, 2016 (ECF Nos. 26, 27) and the United States replied on December 23, 2016 (ECF No. 28).

III. LEGAL STANDARD

3 A district court should grant a motion for summary judgment if the movant can show "that there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(a). A dispute is "genuine" if "the evidence is such that a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the nonmoving party." Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 248 (1986). A factual dispute is "material" if it "might affect the outcome of the suit under the governing law." Id.

A party seeking summary judgment always bears the initial responsibility for informing the district court of the basis for its motion and identifying those portions of the record that it believes demonstrate the absence of a genuine issue of material fact. Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 322 (1986). Where the non-moving party bears the burden of proof on a particular issue at trial, the moving party's initial burden can be met simply by "pointing out to the district court ... that there is an absence of evidence to support the nonmoving party's case." Id. at 325. After the moving party has met its initial burden, the adverse party's response must, "by citing to particular parts of materials in the record" set out specific facts showing a genuine issue for trial. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c)(1)(A). "Speculation and conclusory allegations do not satisfy [the non-moving party's] duty." Ridgewood Bd. of Educ. v. N.E. ex rel. M.E., 172 F.3d 238, 252 (3d Cir. 1999) (superseded by statute on other grounds as recognized by P.P. v. West Chester Area Sch. Dist., 585 F.3d 727, 730 (3d Cir. 2009)). Summary judgment is appropriate if the non-moving party fails to rebut by making a factual showing "that a genuine issue of material fact exists and that a reasonable factfinder could rule in its favor." Id. Under Rule 56, the Court must view the evidence presented on the motion in the light most favorable to the opposing party. Anderson, 477 U.S. at 255.

IV. DISCUSSION

A. Statutory Framework

Under Section 5314(a) and its corresponding regulations, United States citizens must report on an annual basis to the IRS any "financial interest in, or signature or other authority over, a bank, securities, or other financial account in a foreign country." 31 C.F.R. § 1010.350(a); 31 U.S.C. § 5314(a). The required form is the FBAR (TDF 90-22.1). 31 C.F.R. § 1010.350(a); 31 U.S.C. § 5314(a). Failure to timely file an FBAR for each foreign financial account in which a taxpayer has an interest of over $10,000 results in exposure to a civil money penalty that varies depending on the taxpayer's level of culpability. 31 C.F.R. § 1010.306(c); 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5). Specifically, non-willful violations of the FBAR reporting requirement result in a penalty not to exceed $10,000, whereas willful violations can lead to a penalty that is the greater of $100,000 or fifty percent of the balance in the account at the time of the violation. 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(B)(i), (a)(5)(C). A "reasonable cause" exception exists for non-willful violations, but not for willful ones. 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(C)(ii).

B. Willfulness of Bedrosian's Violation of Section 5314

The crux of this case is Bedrosian's level of culpability in failing to file an FBAR for one of his two Swiss bank accounts in 2007; that is, did he act willfully under the pertinent statute and regulations, or non-willfully? The parties do not dispute that Bedrosian meets the other requirements of the relevant laws—(1) he is a citizen of the United States, (2) he had an interest in a financial account during 2007, (3) the account had a balance that exceeded $10,000 during 2007, (4) the account was in a foreign country, and (5) Bedrosian failed to disclose the account. See 31 C.F.R. § 1010.350; 31 U.S.C. § 5314. Therefore, the only issue in dispute is whether Bedrosian's violation of Section 5314 was willful.

4 We start from the premise that the precise contours of the term "willful" as used in Section 5321, the civil penalty provision, have not been clearly established by statute or precedent. Authorities ranging from various federal courts, the Internal Revenue Manual, and the Office of Chief Counsel for the Internal Revenue Service reach different conclusions about the level of intent necessary to satisfy the willfulness requirement. To ground our discussion, we will summarize the approach taken by the only three federal courts to have engaged in this analysis thoroughly. See United States v. Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. 655 (4th Cir. 2012); United States v. Bohanec, No. 15-4347, 2016 WL 7167860 (C.D. Cal. Dec. 8, 2016); United States v. McBride, 908 F. Supp. 2d 1186 (D. Utah 2012).

Williams, Bohanec, and McBride all stand for the proposition that a defendant has willfully violated Section 5321 not only when he knowingly violates the rule but also when he recklessly does so. See Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. at 660; Bohanec, 2016 WL 7167860, at *5; McBride, 908 F. Supp. 2d at 1204. Those holdings are grounded on the Supreme Court's decision in Safeco Ins. Co. of America v. Burr, 551 U.S. 47 (2007), where the Court discussed how to determine civil liability for "willfully fail[ing] to comply" with the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). Id. at 57 (alteration in original). The Court there began by characterizing "willfully" as a "word of many meanings whose construction is often dependent on the context in which it appears." Id. (internal quotations omitted) (quoting Bryan v. United States, 524 U.S. 184, 191 (1998)). Importantly, it then stated that, "where willfulness is a statutory condition of civil liability, [the Court has] generally taken it to cover not only knowing violations of a standard, but reckless ones as well." Id. (collecting cases in which the Court so defined the term in the context of civil statutes). Consistent with that trend, the Court concluded that the FCRA's requisite willful intent was satisfied by a finding that the defendant recklessly violated the statute. Id. at 57-58.

Bedrosian does not reference Safeco in his motion or opposition to the United States' motion; rather, he relies on two Supreme Court cases that examine willfulness in the criminal tax penalty context to advocate for an identical definition in the civil one. He cites Cheek v. United States, 498 U.S. 192 (1991) and Ratzlaf v. United States, 510 U.S. 135 (1994), for the proposition that "[i]n order to sustain a 'willful' penalty under 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5), the government must show that [P]laintiff's actions amount to a 'voluntary, intentional violation of a known legal duty.' " Pl.'s Mot. at 5 (quoting Cheek, 498 U.S. at 201). As noted, these cases arise in the criminal context, and we are highly skeptical that the Court's reasoning therein will be applicable in the instant case. Certain dicta in Safeco discussing the distinction between the civil and criminal contexts in terms of the willfulness standard compel that conclusion. Specifically, the Court in Safeco emphasized the importance of "limiting [criminal] liability to knowing violations" because, in order to harbor the requisite criminal intent, a defendant must "act[ ] with knowledge that his conduct was unlawful." Safeco, 551 U.S. at 57 n.9 (quoting Bryan, 524 U.S. at 193). It then stated "[c]ivil use of the term, however, typically presents neither the textual nor the substantive reasons for pegging the threshold of liability at knowledge of wrongdoing," and concluded that "[t]he standard civil usage ... counsels reading the phrase" to include reckless violations." Id. at 57, 57 n.9.

5 At this juncture, we need not hold what the appropriate standard of willfulness is, but we note that the jurisprudential trend is towards one that would encompass reckless violations of Section 5314. Regardless, the key question here is whether either party has pointed to a lack of genuine dispute of material fact on their affirmative claims. We answer that in the negative. The determinative issue for both Bedrosian's illegal exaction claim and the United States' claim for payment of the proposed penalty is Bedrosian's intent. Whether Bedrosian willfully failed to submit an accurate FBAR for 2007 is an inherently factual question and one that cannot be resolved at this stage. Genuine disputes exist as to what Bedrosian knew regarding his reporting requirements, and when, especially as those issues relate to his relationship with his accountant, Seymour Handleman. Although there is no good cause exception for willful violations of Section 5314, we nevertheless find that Bedrosian's testimony regarding the information provided to him by Handleman and what exactly Bedrosian did with that information, if anything, would be relevant to a determination of Bedrosian's intent. For those reasons, summary judgment is not warranted as to either party.

V. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, both Bedrosian's Motion for Summary Judgment (ECF No. 25) and the United States' Motion for Summary Judgment (ECF No. 22) are denied.

Synopsis
Background: United States filed action to reduce to judgment civil penalty that Internal Revenue Service (IRS) assessed against taxpayer for his alleged willful failure to report his interest in foreign account.

Holdings: The District Court, Michael P. Shea, J., held that:

[1] preponderance of evidence standard applied to determination of whether taxpayer willfully failed to report his interest in foreign bank account, and

Ordered accordingly.

MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

Michael P. Shea, U.S.D.J.

1 Plaintiff, the United States of America (“the Government”), filed this suit to reduce to judgment a civil penalty the Internal Revenue Service assessed against Paul G. Garrity, Sr., under 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5), for his alleged willful failure to report his interest in a foreign account he held in 2005, in violation of 31 U.S.C. § 5314. In anticipation of trial, which is scheduled for June, the Court ordered the parties to submit briefs addressing the legal question of what standard of proof governs this case—preponderance of the evidence or clear and convincing evidence. (ECF No. 99.) The Government argues that the standard of proof is preponderance of the evidence. Defendants Diane M. Garrity, Paul G. Garrity, Jr., and Paul M. Sterczala (collectively, “Defendants”), as fiduciaries of the Estate of Paul G. Garrity, Sr., argue that the standard of proof is clear and convincing evidence. In addition, although not ordered by the Court to do so, the parties have also briefed the separate question of whether the Government must show that Mr. Garrity, Sr. intentionally violated a known legal duty to establish a “willful” violation of Section 5314 or whether the Government may satisfy its burden of proof by showing that Mr. Garrity, Sr. acted recklessly. Defendants urge the former standard, while the Government urges the latter.

For the reasons discussed below, I agree with the Government on both issues.

I. Background

A. Procedural Background

The Government filed this action on February 20, 2015 to collect an outstanding civil penalty, known as the Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts (“FBAR”) penalty, from the estate of Mr. Garrity, Sr., who died in 2008. The Government had assessed the penalty against Mr. Garrity, Sr. for his allegedly willful failure to timely report his financial interest in, and/or his authority over, a foreign bank account for the 2005 calendar year, as required by 31 U.S.C. § 5314 and its implementing regulations. (ECF No. 1.) The balance of the penalty as of February 20, 2015 was $1,061,181.09. Jury selection is currently scheduled for June 6, 2018.

B. Section 5321(a)(5)

The relevant portions of subsection (a)(5) of 31 U.S.C. § 5321, the statute under which the United States sues to recover a civil FBAR penalty, provide:

> (A) Penalty authorized.—The Secretary of the Treasury may impose a civil money penalty on any person who violates, or causes any violation of, any provision of section 5314.
>
> (B) Amount of penalty.—
>
> (i) In general.—Except as provided in subparagraph (C), the amount of any civil penalty imposed under subparagraph (A) shall not exceed $10,000.
>
> (ii) Reasonable cause exception.—No penalty shall be imposed under subparagraph (A) with respect to any violation if—
>
> (I) such violation was due to reasonable cause, and
>
> (II) the amount of the transaction or the balance in the account at the time of the transaction was properly reported.
>
> (C) Willful violations.—In the case of any person willfully violating, or willfully causing any violation of, any provision of section 5314—
>
> 2 (i) the maximum penalty under subparagraph (B)(i) shall be increased to the greater of—
>
> (I) $100,000, or
>
> (II) 50 percent of the amount determined under subparagraph (D), and
>
> (ii) subparagraph (B)(ii) shall not apply.
>
> (D) Amount.—The amount determined under this subparagraph is—
>
> ...
> (ii) in the case of a violation involving a failure to report the existence of an account or any identifying information required to be provided with respect to an account, the balance in the account at the time of the violation.

31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5). Subsection (b)(2) of Section 5321 authorizes the Secretary to "commence a civil action to recover a civil penalty assessed under subsection (a) ...."

II. Discussion

A. Standard of Proof

As Congress did not specify the legal standard the Court should apply in a "civil action" brought by the Secretary under section 5321, I must determine what standard of proof applies. The starting point for this inquiry is the well-established principle that "[i]n a typical civil suit for money damages, plaintiffs must prove their case by a preponderance of the evidence." Herman & MacLean v. Huddleston, 459 U.S. 375, 387, 103 S.Ct. 683, 74 L.Ed.2d 548 (1983). See also United States v. Regan, 232 U.S. 37, 46–47, 34 S.Ct. 213, 58 L.Ed. 494 (1914) (holding that a civil action by the government to collect a monetary penalty "is to be conducted and determined according to the same rules and with the same incidents as are other civil actions").

The Supreme Court noted in Huddleston that where Congress has not specified a standard of proof, the Court has applied the clear and convincing evidence standard in civil matters only "where particularly important individual interests or rights are at stake," such as in cases involving termination of parental rights, involuntary commitment, and deportation. 459 U.S. at 389, 103 S.Ct. 683. Observing that "imposition of even severe civil sanctions that do not implicate such interests has been permitted after proof by a preponderance of the evidence," the Court held that the preponderance of the evidence standard applied to an action involving an alleged fraud in the sale or purchase of securities. Id. at 389–90, 103 S.Ct. 683. In doing so, the Court described the preponderance of the evidence standard as the one "generally applicable in civil actions." Id.

The Supreme Court has since rejected arguments that the higher standard of clear and convincing evidence applies to particular civil actions. See Grogan v. Garner, 498 U.S. 279, 288, 111 S.Ct. 654, 112 L.Ed.2d 755 (1991). In Grogan, the Court held that the preponderance of the evidence standard applies to exceptions to debt dischargeability for fraud in certain bankruptcy actions. The bankruptcy code was silent on the issue, and the Court found that such silence weighed in favor of applying the preponderance standard: "[S]ilence is inconsistent with the view that Congress intended to require a special, heightened standard of proof." Id. at 286, 111 S.Ct. 654. The Court further treated the preponderance standard as the presumptive one in civil cases: "[B]ecause the preponderance-of-the-evidence standard results in a roughly equal allocation of the risk of error between litigants, we presume that this standard is applicable in civil actions between private litigants unless particularly important individual interests or rights are at stake." Id. (internal quotation marks omitted).

3 Using these principles, every court that has answered the question before me has held that the preponderance of the evidence standard governs suits by the government to recover civil FBAR penalties. See Bedrosian v. United States, No. CV 15-5853, 2017 WL 3887520, at *1 (E.D. Pa. Sept. 5, 2017); United States v. Bohanec, 263 F.Supp.3d 881, 889 (C.D. Cal. 2016); United States v. McBride, 908 F.Supp.2d 1186, 1201–02 (D. Utah 2012); United States v. Williams, No. 1:09-cv-437, 2010 WL 3473311, at *1, *5 (E.D. Va. Sept. 1, 2010) (holding, as a matter of first impression, that preponderance of the evidence standard in a civil FBAR action), rev'd on other grounds, United States v. Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. 655 (4th Cir. 2012).

[1] [2] Defendants do not point to case law holding that the clear and convincing evidence standard applies to civil FBAR penalty cases. Rather, Defendants argue that the civil FBAR statute is analogous to the civil tax fraud statute, which requires proof by clear and convincing evidence. Defendants also argue that an internal memo by the Office of Chief Counsel of the IRS, written before any court appears to have considered this question, and opining that willfulness requires a higher standard of proof, should guide my ruling.[1] I find Defendants' arguments unpersuasive for the following reasons.

1. The civil FBAR penalty does not implicate "important individual interests or rights"

4 Defendants argue that the clear and convincing evidence standard applies because the penalty for willful FBAR violations is "far more draconian" than the civil tax fraud penalty (ECF No. 106 at 3) and will involve proving allegations that could tarnish Mr. Garrity's reputation. (ECF No. 108 at 5.) Defendants thus suggest that the civil FBAR penalty implicates "important individual interests or rights" under Huddleston. I disagree.

That Defendants may be liable for a substantially larger sum of money for a willful FBAR violation than if the Government had pursued a civil tax fraud action does not warrant a higher standard of proof.[2] As Huddleston and Grogan indicate, it is the type of interest or right involved that triggers a higher standard of proof, not the amount in controversy; courts have not viewed cases involving "even severe civil sanctions" to implicate "important individual interests or rights" to warrant a higher standard of proof. Huddleston, 459 U.S. at 389–90, 103 S.Ct. 683. See also Halo Electronics, Inc. v. Pulse Electronics, Inc., ––– U.S. ––––, 136 S.Ct. 1923, 1934, 195 L.Ed.2d 278 (2016) (rejecting requirement that willful patent infringement behavior warranting enhanced damages be proved by clear and convincing evidence); Ramirez v. T & H Lemont, Inc., 845 F.3d 772, 777–81 (7th Cir. 2016) (holding that preponderance of the evidence standard applies to dismissal of a civil suit as a discovery sanction); Fishman Transducers, Inc. v. Paul, 684 F.3d 187, 193 (1st Cir. 2012) (holding that preponderance of the evidence standard applies to proof of willfulness for the purpose of obtaining more than single damages or profit disgorgement in trademark action).

Defendants also argue that the Government's proof of willfulness likely will involve allegations of fraud, which could tarnish Mr. Garrity, Sr.'s reputation, implicating a more important interest than those involved in typical civil cases. (See ECF No. 108 at 5.) But even allegations of fraud do not necessitate a higher standard of proof. In Huddleston, the Supreme Court held that the applicable standard of proof for a fraudulent misrepresentation claim was preponderance of the evidence, reversing the Court of Appeals's ruling that the clear and convincing evidence standard applied to allegations of fraud. 459 U.S. at 390, 103 S.Ct. 683. And in Grogan, the Supreme Court rejected the notion that the presence of a statutory fraud claim necessarily warranted a higher standard of proof, even though the common law of many states did apply such a standard: "Unlike a large number, and perhaps the majority, of the States, Congress has chosen the preponderance standard when it has created substantive causes of action for fraud." 498 U.S. at 288–89, 111 S.Ct. 654 (citing numerous examples). See also McBride, 908 F.Supp.2d at 1201 (discussing the applicability of Huddleston in the civil tax-penalty arena).[3]

5 Moreover, the Chief Counsel's statement that "[c]ourts have traditionally applied the clear and convincing standard with respect to fraud cases in general" (ECF No. 106–1 at 3) does not account for differences in how courts treat fraud under federal statutes and the common law, respectively. See Master–Halco, Inc. v. Scillia Dowling & Natarelli, LLC, 739 F.Supp.2d 109, 122–23 (D. Conn. 2010) (discussing differences between standards of proof for statutory fraud and common law fraud, and holding that clear and convincing evidence was the appropriate standard of proof for civil conspiracy to commit fraud and aiding and abetting fraud under state common law). The cases Defendants cite in support of a higher standard involved allegations of a patent's invalidity, which the Supreme Court has explicitly held must be established by clear and convincing evidence, [4] or the Connecticut common law standard for proving fraud —clear and convincing evidence—which a federal action for a civil FBAR penalty does not implicate. Defendants also rely on civil tax fraud cases, which as discussed above, do not necessitate a higher standard of proof in civil FBAR penalty cases.

Further, the standard of proof in other civil enforcement actions is preponderance of the evidence, suggesting that a government enforcement action does not necessarily implicate important interests or rights. See, e.g., Hi–Tech Pharm. v. Crawford, 544 F.3d 1187, 1191 (11th Cir. 2008) (the government's standard of proof in an enforcement action under the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act was preponderance of the evidence); S.E.C. v. Moran, 922 F.Supp. 867, 890 (S.D.N.Y. 1996) (holding that preponderance of the evidence governed civil securities fraud enforcement action in light of "well established law ... that the preponderance of the evidence standard is sufficient to govern a civil action unless the remedy sought would, in fact, deprive the defendant[ ] the ability to continue to pursue his livelihood such as disbarment or revocation of another such licen[s]e"). The sanction that Defendants may be exposed to, regardless of how "draconian" it may be, is monetary only. See Bohanec, 263 F.Supp.3d at 889. Despite characterizing their exposure to a monetary sanction as implicating a "property interest that require[s] protection" (ECF No. 108 at 3), Defendants have not demonstrated how the penalty the Government seeks would affect important individual interests or rights to warrant a higher standard of proof.

2. The element of intent does not support a higher standard of proof

Defendants also argue that the focus on Mr. Garrity Sr.'s intent in this case supports a higher standard of proof, as "[j]ust as it is difficult to show intent, it is also difficult to show a lack of intent." (ECF No. 106 at 6.) The Supreme Court has held, however, that, "[i]f anything, the difficulty of proving the defendant's state of mind supports a lower standard of proof," even where a party must prove intent largely through circumstantial evidence. Huddleston, 459 U.S. at 390 n.30, 103 S.Ct. 683. See also Moran, 922 F.Supp. at 890 (rejecting the argument that proof by circumstantial evidence in civil securities fraud action necessitates a higher standard of proof). Moreover, as Defendants themselves point out, regardless of the standard of proof, the burden of proof remains on the government. Therefore, the difficulty of showing lack of intent is irrelevant.

B. Willfulness

[3] Defendants also argue that the Government must prove that Mr. Garrity, Sr. intentionally violated a known legal duty in order to satisfy the element of willfulness, and that proof of reckless conduct is insufficient. I find Defendants' arguments unpersuasive, as they do not account for the well-established distinction between civil and criminal formulations of willfulness.

6 In Safeco Insurance Company of America v. Burr, the Supreme Court held, in the context of the Fair Credit Reporting Act's requirement that insurers transmit adverse action notices reflecting negative credit reports to consumers, that a "willful failure" covered reckless conduct. 551 U.S. 47, 57, 127 S.Ct. 2201, 167 L.Ed.2d 1045 (2007). The starting point of the Court's inquiry was its observation that "where willfulness is a statutory condition of civil liability, we have generally taken it to cover not only knowing violations of a standard, but reckless ones as well ...." Id. See also McLaughlin v. Richland Shoe Co., 486 U.S. 128, 132–33, 108 S.Ct. 1677, 100 L.Ed.2d 115 (1988) ("willful" under the Fair Labor Standards Act covers reckless violations); Trans World Airlines, Inc. v. Thurston, 469 U.S. 111, 125–26, 105 S.Ct. 613, 83 L.Ed.2d 523 (1985) ("willful" in liquidated damages provision of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act covers reckless violations). The Supreme Court explicitly acknowledged in Safeco that "[i]t is different in the criminal law. When the term 'willful' or 'willfully' has been used in a criminal statute, we have regularly read the modifier as limiting liability to knowing violations .... Civil use of the term, however, typically presents neither the textual nor the substantive reasons for pegging the threshold of liability at knowledge of wrongdoing." 551 U.S. at 57 n.9, 127 S.Ct. 2201.

Defendants concede that numerous courts have found that willfulness in the civil FBAR context includes reckless conduct. (ECF No. 106 at 11.) See United States v. Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. 655, 658 (4th Cir. 2012) (reversing the district court's ruling, as "at a minimum, Williams's undisputed actions establish reckless conduct, which satisfies the proof requirement under § 5314"); United States v. Kelley–Hunter, 281 F.Supp.3d 121, 124 (D.D.C. 2017); United States v. Katwyk, No. CV 17-3314-GW, 2017 WL 6021420, at *4 (C.D. Cal. Oct. 23, 2017); Bedrosian v. United States, Civ. No. 15-5853, 2017 WL 4946433, at *3 (E.D. Pa. Sept. 20, 2017); United States v. Bohanec, 263 F.Supp.3d 881, 888–89 (C.D. Cal. 2016); United States v. Bussell, No. CV 15-02034 SJO, 2015 WL 9957826, at *5 (C.D. Cal. Dec. 8, 2015); United States v. McBride, 908 F.Supp.2d 1186, 1204 (D. Utah 2012); United States v. Williams, No. 1:09-cv-437, 2010 WL 3473311, at *4 (E.D. Va. Sept. 1, 2010), rev'd on other grounds, Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. 655.[5]

Defendants cite no case in which a court has held to the contrary. Rather, despite the clear distinction the Supreme Court has drawn between willfulness in the civil and criminal contexts, the cases Defendants principally rely on are criminal cases. See Ratzlaf v. United States, 510 U.S. 135, 114 S.Ct. 655, 126 L.Ed.2d 615 (1994) (holding that the government had to prove defendant acted with knowledge that his conduct was unlawful to sustain a criminal conviction for a willful violation of an antistructuring provision); United States v. Sturman, 951 F.2d 1466, 1476 (6th Cir. 1991) (applying the standard for willfulness articulated in Cheek v. United States, 498 U.S. 192, 111 S.Ct. 604, 112 L.Ed.2d 617 (1991), "voluntary, intentional violation of a known legal duty," to criminal violations of 31 U.S.C. § 5314). As the Supreme Court has made clear, those criminal cases do not control this case. See Safeco, 551 U.S. at 57 n.9, 127 S.Ct. 2201. See also Lefcourt v. United States, 125 F.3d 79, 82–83 (2d Cir. 1997) (distinguishing Cheek in tax civil penalty case requiring showing of "conduct that is willful, a term which in this context requires only that a party act voluntarily in withholding requested information, rather than accidentally or unconsciously": "Cheek was a criminal case, and we are persuaded that its rationale does not apply in the context of the civil tax penalties at issue here."). Cf. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 836–37, 114 S.Ct. 1970, 128 L.Ed.2d 811 (1994) (contrasting the different uses of the term "recklessness" in civil and criminal contexts).

7 Defendants point to no other authority that would warrant deviating from the Supreme Court's holdings that statutory willfulness in the civil context covers reckless conduct. I therefore conclude that the Government may prove the element of willfulness in this case with evidence that Mr. Garrity, Sr. acted recklessly.

III. Conclusion

For the reasons discussed above, I find that the Government must prove the elements of its claim for a judgment under 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5) by a preponderance of the evidence and that proof of reckless conduct will satisfy the Government's burden on the element of willfulness.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

[1] Chief Counsel Memorandum 200603026 (January 20, 2006) provides the following guidance on the standard of proof applicable to the section 5321(a)(5) penalty for willful violations:

> A second question in the November 23 memorandum, with respect to the willfulness issue, is whether the criteria for assertion of the civil FBAR penalty are the same as the burden of proof that the Service has when asserting the civil fraud penalty under IRC section 6663. Although there are no cases that address this issue with respect to the civil > FBAR penalty, we expect the answer to be yes. This is because of the inherent difficulty of proving, or disproving, a state of mind (willfulness) at the time of a violation.

> The burden of proof for criminal cases for establishing willfulness is to provide proof "beyond a reasonable doubt." Although the same definition for willfulness applies [for civil cases] ("a voluntary intentional violation of a known legal duty"), the Service would have a lesser burden of proof to meet with respect to the civil FBAR penalty than the criminal penalty. We expect that a court will find the burden in civil FBAR cases to be that of providing "clear and convincing evidence," rather than merely a "preponderance of the evidence." The clear and convincing evidence standard is the same burden the Service must meet with respect to civil tax fraud cases where the Service also has to show the intent of the taxpayer at the time of the violation. Courts have traditionally applied the clear and convincing standard with respect to fraud cases in general, not just to tax fraud cases, because just as it is difficult to show intent, it is also difficult to show a lack of intent. The higher standard of clear and convincing evidence offers some protection for an individual who may be wrongly accused of fraud.

(ECF No. 106–1 at 3.) Defendants concede that the Chief Counsel Memorandum does not bind the Court. (ECF No. 106 at 5.) See 26 U.S.C. § 6110(k)(3) ("Unless the Secretary otherwise establishes by regulations, a written determination may not be used or cited as precedent."); Bohanec, 263 F.Supp.3d at 889 (holding that the Chief Counsel of the Internal Revenue Service's opinion on the willfulness standard was irrelevant) (internal citations omitted).

2 Defendants argue that they may be liable for at least $936,691.00 for a willful FBAR violation, compared to $621.00 if the Government had instead filed a civil tax fraud action. (ECF No. 106 at 3.)

3 In light of the presumption in favor of applying the preponderance standard in all civil actions, the few structural similarities that Defendants point out between the civil FBAR statute and the civil tax fraud statute are not sufficient to warrant applying a higher standard of proof. (See ECF No. 106 at 2–3.) It is also worth noting that the Second and Eighth Circuits have applied the preponderance of the evidence standard to the tax statute imposing civil penalties for aiding and abetting tax underpayments, i.e., 26 U.S.C. § 6701. See Barr v. United States, 67 F.3d 469 (2d Cir. 1995); Mattingly v. United States, 924 F.2d 785 (8th Cir. 1991). In doing so, the Mattingly decision, on which the Barr decision relied, suggested that the clear and convincing evidence standard is limited to civil tax fraud cases brought under 26 U.S.C. § 7454(a), which requires proof of "fraud with intent to evade tax." 26 U.S.C § 7454(a); Mattingly, 924 F.2d at 787 ("[A]bsent fraud with the intent to evade tax pursuant to § 7454(a), a preponderance standard is applicable in civil tax cases.").

4 Defendants cite Lamoureux v. AnazaoHealth Corp., No. 3:03CV01382 (WIG), 2012 WL 12537933 (D. Conn. Sept. 24, 2012) (applying the clear and convincing evidence standard in a patent infringement case under 35 U.S.C. § 282). The Supreme Court explicitly held in Microsoft Corp. v. i4i Ltd. Partnership, 564 U.S. 91, 131 S.Ct. 2238, 180 L.Ed.2d 131 (2011), that the clear and convincing evidence standard governed proof of a patent's invalidity because of the specific language of 35 U.S.C. § 282, which includes a presumption of patent validity.

5 Defendants cite United States v. Zwerner, a non-precedential civil FBAR case in which the Southern District of Florida denied the government's summary judgment motion on the defendant's liability. But the Zwerner Court did not decide the issue, instead denying summary judgment because "[u]nder either intent standard, genuine issues of material fact remain[ed] in dispute." *United States v. Larry D. JARNAGIN and Linda Jarnagin, Plaintiffs,
v.
The UNITED STATES of America, Defendant.

No. 15–1534T
(Filed: November 30, 2017)

Synopsis
Background: Taxpayers, a dual United States–Canadian citizen and a United States citizen with Canadian residency status, brought action against United States, alleging that IRS wrongfully assessed and collected penalties based on taxpayers' failure to file IRS form entitled "Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts" (FBAR) regarding taxpayers' Canadian bank account, as required by Bank Secrecy Act. Parties cross-moved for summary judgment.

Holdings: Upon transfer, the Court of Federal Claims, Kaplan, J., held that:

[1] Court of Federal Claims had subject matter jurisdiction over taxpayers' claim under the Tucker Act, and

[2] taxpayers' failure to file FBARs was not due to reasonable cause, and thus taxpayers were not entitled to refund of penalties assessed.

Plaintiffs' motion denied, and defendant's motion granted.

OPINION AND ORDER

KAPLAN, Judge.

In this case, plaintiffs Larry and Linda Jarnagin, husband and wife, assert that the IRS wrongfully assessed and collected penalties from them for the 2006, 2007, 2008, and 2009 tax years based on their failure to file certain reports regarding their foreign bank account as required by the Bank Secrecy Act. Mr. Jarnagin, a dual U.S.–Canadian citizen, and Mrs. Jarnagin, a U.S. citizen with Canadian residency status, do not dispute that they owned an account at the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce during each of the tax years at issue. They also do not dispute that they were required by law to file a report regarding that account with the IRS for each of those years and that they failed to do so. They assert instead that their failure to file the reports was due to reasonable cause and that the IRS was therefore barred from assessing and collecting the penalty by 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(B)(ii).

For the reasons set forth below, the Court concludes that the Jarnagins did not exercise ordinary business care and prudence with respect to their obligation to file the reports at issue and thus cannot avail themselves of the reasonable cause defense. Accordingly, the government's motion for summary judgment is GRANTED and the Jarnagins' motion for summary judgment is DENIED.

BACKGROUND

I. The Statutory Framework

In 1970, Congress enacted the Bank Secrecy Act, Pub. L. No. 91–508, 84 Stat. 1114, in order to address its concerns over "the use by American residents of foreign financial facilities located in jurisdictions with various types of secrecy laws." H.R. Rep. No. 91–075 (1970), reprinted in 1970 U.S.C.C.A.N. 4394, 4395. "[C]onsiderable testimony" had been presented to Congress regarding "serious 370 and widespread use of foreign financial facilities located in secrecy jurisdictions for the purpose of violating American law." Id. at 4397. In the Bank Secrecy Act, Congress responded by imposing on residents, citizens, or persons doing business in the United States a requirement that they keep records and make reports concerning certain foreign accounts and transactions. 31 U.S.C. § 5314(a) (2006)[1]; see also id. § 5311 (stating that the "purpose" of the Act is "to require certain reports or records where they have a high degree of usefulness in criminal, tax, or regulatory investigations or proceedings, or in the conduct of intelligence or counterintelligence activities, including analysis, to protect against international terrorism").

The statute thus provides, in pertinent part, that "the Secretary of the Treasury shall require a resident or citizen of the United States ... to keep records, file reports, or keep records and file reports, when the resident, citizen, or person makes a transaction or maintains a relation for any person with a foreign financial agency." Id. § 5314(a). The Secretary of the Treasury has issued regulations implementing the statutory requirements. They state, in pertinent part, as follows:

> Each United States person having a financial interest in, or signature or other authority over, a bank, securities, or other financial account in a foreign country shall report such relationship to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for each year in which such relationship exists and shall provide such information as shall be specified in a reporting form prescribed under 31 U.S.C. 5314 to be filed by such persons.

31 C.F.R. § 1010.350(a) (2016).[2] The reporting form prescribed under 31 U.S.C. § 5314 and referenced in the regulation is Form TD–F 90–22.1 (entitled "Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts"). Id.[3] Under the regulations, the form must be filed "on or before June 30 of each calendar year with respect to foreign financial accounts exceeding $10,000 maintained during the previous calendar year." Id. § 1010.306(c) (previously codified at 31 C.F.R. § 103.27).

The statute authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to impose a civil monetary penalty of not more than $10,000 for failure to file the Form TD–F 90–22.1. See 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5) (providing that if "any person ... violates, or causes any violation of, any provision of section 5314," then "[t]he Secretary of the Treasury may impose a civil money penalty," not to exceed $10,000). "No penalty shall be imposed ... with respect to any violation," however, "if—(I) such violation was due to reasonable cause, and (II) the amount of the transaction or the balance in the account at the time of the transaction was properly reported." Id. § 5321(a)(5)(B)(ii).

II. Undisputed Facts

A. The Jarnagins' Educational and Business Backgrounds

Plaintiff Larry Jarnagin is a high school graduate. Def.'s Am. App. B Ex. 3 at 9, ECF No. 22–1. Although he does not have a college degree, he took courses at New Mexico Western University in approximately 1963 or 1964. See id. In addition, Mr. Jarnagin completed both barbering school and chiropractic school, and practiced professionally as a chiropractor for five years. Id. at 9–10. Mr. Jarnagin also owned and operated a number of barbershops in New Mexico. Id. at 13.

Linda Jarnagin attended multiple community colleges in Iowa and New Mexico in the 1960s and 1970s, taking classes in elementary education. Id. Ex. 4 at 8–9. She did not obtain a degree. Id. In the late 1970s, Mrs. Jarnagin took classes at a vocational technical school in order to obtain a real estate 371 broker's license. Id. at 11. In approximately 1978, she passed her licensing exam. See id. at 9, 11–12. For about the next four years, Mrs. Jarnagin worked as a real estate broker. Id. at 14–15.

The Jarnagins were married in 1966. Id. at 8. They moved to Oklahoma around 1971, where Mr. Jarnagin, in addition to barbering, became a cattle farmer and began buying and selling farms. Id. Ex. 3 at 13. He also began buying, selling, and leasing oil and mineral rights. Id. at 16. Mr. Jarnagin has since continuously been involved in the real estate business. See id. at 16–17. He has set up and used corporations, limited liability companies, and "C Corps" for the purpose of buying and selling property. Id. at 17.

In the early- to mid–1980s, Mr. Jarnagin bought property in Canada and began operating his own ranch in British Columbia. Id. at 18–20. In 1986, the Jarnagins immigrated to Canada. Id. at 19. In 1989, Mr. Jarnagin became a Canadian citizen. Id. He currently resides in Canada approximately nine to ten months out of the year. Id. at 95. Mrs. Jarnagin spends more of her time in Oklahoma than in Canada. See id. at 95–96; see also id. Ex. 4 at 53; id. Ex. 5 at 30–31.

In the early 1990s, the Jarnagins purchased a number of apartment complexes in Oklahoma. Id. Ex. 3 at 20–21. At one point, they owned as many as six different properties. See id. Ex. 4 at 18. Mrs. Jarnagin "actively manage [d]" them. Id. Ex. 3 at 21. She served as the "property supervisor" and oversaw on-site managers, maintenance, and landscaping. Id. Ex. 4 at 18. In the 2000s, the Jarnagins sold or transferred the apartment complexes. Id. at 18–19. In particular, in 2006, the Jarnagins engaged in a property exchange known as a "1031," whereby they exchanged one of the apartment complexes for a shopping center in Oklahoma City, which they still own.[4] Id. at 19.

The Jarnagins also became owners of a nightclub in Phoenix, Arizona in the mid- or late–1990s, by virtue of their status as creditors in a bankruptcy proceeding. See id. Ex. 3 at 22; id. Ex 4 at 20. Ultimately, Mrs. Jarnagin went to Phoenix and took over the operations of the nightclub directly. See id. Ex. 3 at 22–23; id. Ex. 4 at 20–21. In 2006, the property was taken by the city of Phoenix through its power of eminent domain. Id. Ex. 4 at 22.

B. The Jarnagins' Canadian Bank Account and Their 2006–2009 Personal Income Tax Returns

In 1986, the Jarnagins opened a bank account in Canada at the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. See id. Ex. 3 at 26–27. They continued to own and maintain this account throughout 2006, 2007, 2008, and 2009. Id. Ex 1 at 1–3, 6. At the end of 2006, the Jarnagins' account had a balance of $4,000,000. Id. at 1. At the end of 2007, the account had a balance of $3,500,000. Id. at 2. At the end of 2008, it had a balance of $3,850,000. Id. And in 2009, the account had a balance of at least $1,870,000. See id. at 2–3; see also id. Ex. 31 at 2, ECF No. 22–9.

For tax years 2006 through 2009, the Jarnagins filed joint Form 1040 Individual Income Tax Returns. Id. Ex. 7, ECF No 22–2; id. Ex. 8, ECF No. 22–4; id. Ex. 9, ECF No. 22–6; id. Ex. 10, ECF No. 22–7. Schedule B of each of those tax returns contained a section entitled "Part III Foreign Accounts and Trusts." See, e.g., id. Ex. 7 at 5. In that section, line 7a required a response to the following question:

> At any time during [the relevant tax year], did you have an interest in or a signature or other authority over a financial account in a foreign country, such as a bank account, securities account, or other financial account?

Id. The form then contained checkboxes for answering the question either yes or no and directed filers to "[s]ee instructions for exceptions and filing requirements for Form TD F 90–22.1." Id.

372 On their 2006, 2007, 2008, and 2009 tax returns, the Jarnagins' accountants (see below) checked the "no" box in response to line 7a, notwithstanding that the Jarnagins maintained a bank account in Canada during those years. Id.; id. Ex. 8 at 8; id. Ex 9 at 4; id. Ex. 10 at 4. In addition, the Jarnagins did not file an FBAR reporting their Canadian bank account during any of those years. Id. Ex. 1 at 3–6.

C. The Jarnagins' Bookkeeper

The Jarnagins employed the services of a bookkeeper—Misty Fairchild—to help manage the financial aspects of their businesses and to provide information to the accountants who prepared their tax returns (see below). Ms. Fairchild first began to perform bookkeeping services for the Jarnagins in January 1997 while she was still in college. Id. Ex. 3 at 34; id. Ex. 4 at 25; id. Ex. 5 at 12. The Jarnagins hired her because of the friendship between Mrs. Jarnagin and Ms. Fairchild's mother, and because Mrs. Jarnagin had learned that Ms. Fairchild was studying to be an accountant. Id. Ex. 4 at 25.

Ms. Fairchild initially helped manage the Jarnagins' apartments by keeping track of income and expenses at the properties. Id. Ex. 3 at 38. Her duties later expanded to include preparing annual financial statements for the Jarnagins and other daily financial management and bookkeeping tasks. See id. Ex. 4 at 27–28, 66–68; id. Ex. 5 at 13; see also id. Exs. 11–13. Ms. Fairchild was aware that the Jarnagins had a Canadian bank account. Id. Ex. 5 at 44–45. She did not, however, have any knowledge of or experience related to international tax matters. Id. Ex. 3 at 39; id. Ex. 4 at 26; id. Ex. 5 at 66. Nor did she know anything about filing tax returns for a person with foreign sources of income. Id. Ex. 5 at 67.

In 1998, Ms. Fairchild graduated from Southwestern Oklahoma State University with a bachelor's degree in accounting with a minor in finance. Id. Ex. 5 at 9. In 2000, she obtained her master's degree in business administration. Id. Ms. Fairchild then became a licensed certified public accountant (CPA) in 2002. Id. at 10. She continued to work for the Jarnagins during this period.

In August 2004, Ms. Fairchild took a position as a comptroller with a bank. Id. at 12, 14–15; id. Ex. 4 at 25–26. She nonetheless continued to perform bookkeeping and accounting-type work in a part-time, consulting role for the Jarnagins. Id. Ex. 5 at 15. While working in the banking industry, Ms. Fairchild did not have any responsibilities for or experience with international tax or cross-border issues. Id. at 19, 23. In 2010, Ms. Fairchild left the banking industry and opened an accounting firm with her brother, Kyle Zybach (discussed below). Id. at 23.

D. The Jarnagins' Accountants

The Jarnagins did not personally prepare their income tax returns for tax years 2006 through 2009. See id. Ex. 3 at 30–31. Instead, they employed the services of accountants in both Canada and the United States to prepare and file their Canadian and U.S. tax returns, respectively. See id. at 30–34.

Prior to the tax years at issue in this case, the Jarnagins' U.S. tax returns were prepared by James Crook, an accountant and former IRS employee. Id. at 33, 43. After Mr. Crook passed away in 2005, his firm continued to prepare the Jarnagins' tax returns, starting with their return for 2005, which was prepared by Mike Gordon. See id. at 33–34, 49–50; id. Ex. 4 at 33–34; id. Ex. 16 ¶ 15. The Jarnagins testified that Mr. Gordon was a CPA but that they otherwise had "no idea" what his qualifications were and did not know whether or not he had any knowledge about, or experience with, issues of international taxation. Id. Ex. 4 at 34–35; see also id. Ex. 3 at 50.

Shortly thereafter, Mr. Gordon passed away and Mr. Crook's widow took over the preparation of the Jarnagins' tax returns for tax years 2006 and 2007. Id. Ex. 3 at 50; see also id. Ex. 7 at 3 (the Jarnagins' 2006 tax return reflecting Marie Crook as tax preparer); id. Ex. 8 at 3 (the Jarnagins' 2007 tax return showing the same). Mr. Jarnagin was unsure of Mrs. Crook's qualifications and did not know whether or not she was a CPA. Id. Ex. 3 at 52–53.

For tax years 2008 and 2009, the Jarnagins turned to a new accountant, Kyle Zybach, the 373 brother of Ms. Fairchild, their bookkeeper. See id. at 34; id. Ex. 9 at 2; id. Ex. 10 at 2. The Jarnagins knew that Mr. Zybach was a CPA but did not know or inquire whether he had any knowledge about or experience with international tax matters. Id. Ex. 3 at 55. Mr. Zybach testified that he had no such prior experience. Id. Ex. 6 at 10–11.

The Jarnagins never expressly informed Mr. Gordon, Mrs. Crook, or Mr. Zybach that they maintained a bank account in Canada. See id. Ex. 3 at 45–46, 56; id. Ex. 4 at 37–38; see also id. Ex. 6 at 23. Nor did the Jarnagins provide any statements from the Canadian account to any of their U.S. accountants. See id. Ex. 3 at 45–46, 51–52, 54–56; see also id. Ex. 4 at 37.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Jarnagin testified that they believed their accountants would have been aware that they maintained a bank account in Canada because their Canadian businesses and residence were common knowledge. See id. Ex. 3 at 44–46, 50–51, 56; id. Ex. 4 at 37–38, 68–69, 71–72. In addition, the Jarnagins' annual financial statements (which they supplied to their U.S. accountants) contained references to a Canadian bank account. Id. Ex. 11 at 2; id. Ex. 12 at 2; id. Ex. 13 at 2 (financial statements provided by the Jarnagins to their U.S. accountants for 2006, 2007, and 2008 listing a personal "CD/Savings" account at "CIBC" in Canadian dollars); see also id. Ex. 3 at 44–46, 50–51, 56; id. Ex. 4 at 37–38, 68–69, 71–72. The Jarnagins also believed that their U.S. accountants would have inferred the existence of a Canadian bank account given that they were required to send the Jarnagins' U.S. tax information to Canadian accountants each year so that those accountants could file the Jarnagins' Canadian tax returns. See id. Ex. 3 at 44–45; id. Ex. 4 at 36–38; see also id. Ex. 5 at 45–46.

The record supports the Jarnagins' expectation that their U.S. accountants would have known of their Canadian bank account notwithstanding the Jarnagins' failure to directly draw their U.S. accountants' attention to its existence. Thus, Mr. Zybach testified that while he did not recall ever being directly told about the Canadian account, he was aware of it "from [his] prior experience and from looking at the financial statements that were provided." Id. Ex. 6 at 23.

E. The Jarnagins' Role in Preparing Their Tax Returns

The Jarnagins had little involvement in the preparation of their tax returns for tax years 2006 through 2009. Mr. Jarnagin explained that "[b]asically, we handed everything over to the accountants, [said] '[h]ere, take care of it and tell us how much we owe,' and that's about it." Id. Ex. 3 at 44; see also id. at 57–58. Similarly, Mrs. Jarnagin testified that they "just turned everything over to [Mr. Gordon] that needed to be done." Id. Ex. 4 at 44–45. She also recalled that the Jarnagins played a similarly passive role when Mr. Zybach prepared their returns; she did not remember any discussions regarding tax planning, only rare meetings to provide records. Id. at 45–46.

Mr. and Mrs. Jarnagin both signed their names under the declaration contained at the end of the Forms 1040 that they filed for each of the years at issue in this case. Id. Ex. 7 at 3; id. Ex. 8 at 3; id. Ex. 9 at 2; id. Ex. 10 at 2; see also id. Ex. 4 at 50–51, 57, 62–63. Those declarations read as follows:

> Under penalties of perjury, I declare that I have examined this return and accompanying schedules and statements, and to the best of my knowledge and belief, they are true, correct, and complete.

E.g., id. Ex. 10 at 2.

Notwithstanding this declaration, however, Mr. Jarnagin testified that he did not review his 2006 tax return prior to filing it. Id. Ex. 3 at 59–60. Nor did he ask any questions of Mrs. Crook or anyone else at her firm regarding the return. Id. Mr. Jarnagin also did not review the tax returns his U.S. accountants filed in tax years 2007, 2008, and 2009. Id. at 64–66, 68–69, 71–72.

Mrs. Jarnagin testified that she did not "usually have time to review [the returns], but [she did] look to see how much [they] owe[d]." Id. Ex. 4 at 48. She thus did not review the 2006, 2007, 2008, or 2009 tax returns other than to learn the amount of tax owed. See id. at 48, 52–53, 56–58, 62–63; see also id. Ex. 6 at 22 (Kyle Zybach testifying 374 that the Jarnagins "normally didn't really want to look over the whole return, just kind of the 1040, total income, how much tax do [they] owe or what are [they] getting a refund for" and that he did not sit down with the Jarnagins to go over their returns).

F. Penalties Imposed by the IRS

On June 28, 2012, the IRS sent separate letters to Mr. and Mrs. Jarnagin "proposing a penalty for violating the reporting or record keeping requirements relating to accounts [they] maintain with financial institutions overseas." Id. Ex. 28 at 1; id. Ex. 29 at 1. Specifically, the IRS informed the Jarnagins that it was "proposing the assessment of a penalty under 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5) for failing to meet the filing requirements of 31 U.S.C. § 5314." Id. Ex. 28 at 1; id. Ex. 29 at 1. The total proposed penalty was $100,000, representing $10,000 each for Mr. and Mrs. Jarnagin for each tax year 2006 through 2010, inclusive, based upon their failure to report their bank account at the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. Id. Ex. 28 at 5; id. Ex. 29 at 5.

The Jarnagins disputed the proposed penalties with the IRS in August 2012. Compl. Ex. C, ECF No. 1. Ultimately, in late 2015, the IRS agreed to withdraw its proposed penalty for 2010, but asserted that the Jarnagins were liable for the "Report of Foreign Bank and Financial Accounts (FBAR) penalty" for 2006, 2007, 2008, and 2009, and demanded payment of $40,000 each from Mr. and Mrs. Jarnagin. See Compl. Exs. A–B; Def.'s Am. App. B Exs. 30–31.

On November 10, 2015, Mr. and Mrs. Jarnagin each paid a $40,000 FBAR penalty. Compl. Ex. B. On November 13, 2015, the Jarnagins filed a Form 843, seeking an abatement and refund of the penalty amounts paid. Compl. Ex. C. The Jarnagins allege that the IRS denied that request. Compl. ¶ 11.

III. This Action

On December 16, 2015, the Jarnagins filed the present suit. ECF No. 1. In their complaint they assert one count, which is entitled "Wrongful Assessment and Collection of Penalties." Id. at 3. The Jarnagins allege that their "failure to file a[n] FBAR for tax years 2006, 2007, 2008 and 2009, was due to reasonable cause," and that "[t]he IRS illegally or unlawfully failed to grant [the] Jarnagin[ ]s['] claims for refund of the FBAR penalties paid for tax years 2006, 2007, 2008 and 2009." Id. ¶¶ 14, 16. They seek judgment in the amount of $80,000, plus interest, attorneys' fees, and costs. Id. at 4.

This case was initially assigned to Senior Judge James F. Merow, but was transferred to the undersigned on January 11, 2017. See ECF No. 16. On March 24, 2017, the government filed a motion for summary judgment. ECF No. 19. On May 10, 2017, the Jarnagins filed their response and cross-motion for summary judgment. ECF No. 25. The parties finished briefing the cross-motions on June 30, 2017, but on August 9, 2017, the government sought leave to file a surreply. ECF No. 30. The Court granted leave the next day. ECF No. 31. The Jarnagins then filed their own surreply on August 23, 2017. ECF No. 33. On November 20, 2017, the Court held oral argument on the parties' cross-motions. See Order, ECF No. 35.

DISCUSSION

I. Subject Matter Jurisdiction

[1] Neither party has substantively addressed in its briefs the Court's subject matter jurisdiction over this case. Subject matter jurisdiction, however, is a threshold matter, Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Env't, 523 U.S. 83, 94–95, 118 S.Ct. 1003, 140 L.Ed.2d 210 (1998), and the Court has "an independent obligation to determine whether subject matter jurisdiction exists, even in the absence of a challenge from any party," Arbaugh v. Y & H Corp., 546 U.S. 500, 514, 126 S.Ct. 1235, 163 L.Ed.2d 1097 (2006).

[2] The Tucker Act grants the Court of Federal Claims jurisdiction "to render judgment upon any claim against the United States founded either upon the Constitution, or any Act of Congress or any regulation of an executive department, or upon any express or implied contract with the United States, or for liquidated or unliquidated damages in cases not sounding in tort." 375 28 U.S.C. § 1491(a) (2012). Under this grant, the court may assert jurisdiction over a complaint (such as this one) alleging an illegal exaction if the plaintiff alleges that "money ... was 'improperly paid, exacted, or taken from the claimant in contravention of the Constitution, a statute or a regulation.' " Norman v. United States, 429 F.3d 1081, 1095 (Fed. Cir. 2005) (quoting Eastport S.S. Corp. v. United States, 178 Ct. Cl. 599, 605, 372 F.2d 1002 (1967)); see also Aerolineas Argentinas v. United States, 77 F.3d 1564, 1572–73 (Fed. Cir. 1996) (observing that "Tucker Act claims may be made for recovery of monies that the government has required to be paid contrary to law"); S. P.R. Sugar Co. Trading Corp. v. United States, 167 Ct. Cl. 236, 244–45, 334 F.2d 622 (1964) (finding that "[u]nder [the Tucker Act], suit can be brought in this court to recover exactions said to have been illegally imposed by federal officials (except where Congress has expressly placed jurisdiction elsewhere)"); Clapp v. United States, 127 Ct. Cl. 505, 513, 117 F.Supp. 576 (1954) (stating that "a claim to recover an illegal exaction made by officials of the Government, which exaction is based upon a power supposedly conferred by a statute, is a claim founded upon any Act of Congress").

[3] Here, the Jarnagins assert that the government's assessment and collection of FBAR penalties was unlawful because 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5) contains a prohibition on penalties where, inter alia, the taxpayer has reasonable cause for failing to file an FBAR. Thus, because the government based its exaction upon an asserted statutory power and because the Jarnagins claim that the penalty was exacted in contravention of that statute, the Jarnagins' claim is one for an illegal exaction and the Court has subject matter jurisdiction over it.

II. Summary Judgment Standards

The standards for granting summary judgment are well established. Summary judgment may be granted where there is no genuine issue of material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Rule 56(a) of the Rules of the Court of Federal Claims; Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 250, 106 S.Ct. 2505, 91 L.Ed.2d 202 (1986). A fact is material if it "might affect the outcome of the suit under the governing law." Anderson, 477 U.S. at 248, 106 S.Ct. 2505. An issue is genuine if it "may reasonably be resolved in favor of either party." Id. at 250, 106 S.Ct. 2505.

The moving party bears the burden of demonstrating the absence of any genuine issue of material fact. Conroy v. Reebok Int'l, Ltd., 14 F.3d 1570, 1575 (Fed. Cir. 1994); see also Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 322–23, 106 S.Ct. 2548, 91 L.Ed.2d 265 (1986). All significant doubts regarding factual issues must be resolved in favor of the party opposing summary judgment. Mingus Constructors, Inc. v. United States, 812 F.2d 1387, 1390 (Fed. Cir. 1987). "[T]he party opposing summary judgment must show an evidentiary conflict on the record; mere denials or conclusory statements are not sufficient." Id. at 1390–91. "[E]ntry of summary judgment is appropriate against a [party] 'who fails to make a showing sufficient to establish the existence of an essential element to [its] case, and on which [it] will bear the burden of proof at trial.' " Zafer Taahhut Insaat ve Ticaret A.S. v. United States, 833 F.3d 1356, 1362–63 (Fed. Cir. 2016) (quoting Celotex Corp., 477 U.S. at 322, 106 S.Ct. 2548) (third and fourth alterations in original).

III. The Parties' Cross–Motions for Summary Judgment

In this case, there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact or as to whether the Jarnagins violated the law when they failed to file FBARs for tax years 2006–2009. The disagreement between the parties is whether, as a matter of law, the Jarnagins qualify for an exception to the statutory penalty because "the violation[s were] due to reasonable cause, and ... the amount of the transaction or the balance in the account at the time of the transaction was properly reported." 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(B)(ii); see also Br. in Opp'n to Def.'s Mot. for Summ. J & in Supp. of Pls.' Cross–Mot for Summ. J. (Pls.' Br.) at 14, ECF No. 25 (stating that "Plaintiffs are liable for the non-willful FBAR penalty, except that reasonable cause exists and such is 376 a defense to the imposition of the non-willful FBAR penalty").

The Jarnagins argue that they have established reasonable cause for failing to file FBARs for 2006, 2007, 2008, and 2009. Pls.' Br. at 6. They assert that: 1) "they hired a competent CPA to prepare all required forms"; 2) "the CPA was aware of the CIBC account in Canada through the financial statements provided to him by Plaintiffs before he filed the returns"; and 3) "Plaintiffs actually relied in good faith on the CPA." Id. In short, the Jarnagins argue, "they relied upon their CPA[s] as it related to their tax returns, which is all that is required." Id. at 20.

For the reasons set forth below, the Court concludes that, as a matter of law, the Jarnagins have not established reasonable cause for their violations of the reporting requirement. Accordingly, they do not qualify for an exception from the statutory penalty provision and their request for reimbursement of the penalties paid lacks merit. [5]

A. Reasonable Cause Standard

Neither the statute nor its corresponding regulations define "reasonable cause," and there is little case law regarding the meaning and application of the reasonable cause standard under 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(B)(ii). See id. § 5312; see also 31 C.F.R. § 1010.100. Sections 6651(a) and 6664(c)(1) of the Internal Revenue Code and their implementing regulations, however, use and define the phrase in the tax compliance context. Accordingly, the Court finds those provisions instructive in construing the reasonable cause standard applicable here. See Bragdon v. Abbott, 524 U.S. 624, 631, 118 S.Ct. 2196, 141 L.Ed.2d 540 (1998) (stating that "Congress' repetition of a well-established term carries the implication that Congress intended the term to be construed in accordance with pre-existing regulatory interpretations"); see also Moore v. United States, No. C13-2063RAJ, 2015 WL 1510007, at *4 (W.D. Wash. Apr. 1, 2015) (concluding that "[t]here is no reason to think that Congress intended the meaning of 'reasonable cause' in the Bank Secrecy Act to differ from the meaning ascribed to it in tax statutes").

The first of those provisions, 26 U.S.C. § 6651(a), prescribes penalties for failing to timely file certain returns or to pay particular taxes "unless it is shown that such failure is due to reasonable cause and not due to willful neglect." The regulations implementing § 6651 equate the reasonable cause standard with a standard of ordinary business care and prudence. See 26 C.F.R. § 301.6651–1(c)(1) (stating that "[i]f the taxpayer exercised ordinary business care and prudence and was nevertheless unable to file the return within the prescribed time, then the delay is due to a reasonable cause" and that "[a] failure to pay will be considered to be due to reasonable cause to the extent the taxpayer has made a satisfactory showing that he exercised ordinary business care and prudence in providing for payment of his tax liability and was nevertheless either unable to pay the tax or would suffer an undue hardship ... if he paid on the due date"); see also United States v. Boyle, 469 U.S. 241, 246 n.4, 105 S.Ct. 687, 83 L.Ed.2d 622 (1985) (holding that IRS's "correlation [in its regulation] of 'reasonable cause' with 'ordinary business care and prudence' is consistent with Congress' intent, and over 40 years of case law" and "merits deference").

Similarly, 26 U.S.C. § 6664(c)(1) states that "[n]o penalty shall be imposed under section 6662 or 6663 with respect to any portion of an underpayment if it is shown that there was a reasonable cause for such portion and that the taxpayer acted in good faith with respect to such portion." [6] IRS regulations, in turn, state that with respect to § 6662 underpayments, "[t]he determination of whether a taxpayer acted with reasonable 377 cause ... is made on a case-by-case basis, taking into account all pertinent facts and circumstances." 26 C.F.R. § 1.6664–4(b)(1). They provide that "[g]enerally, the most important factor is the extent of the taxpayer's effort to assess the taxpayer's proper tax liability." Id. The regulations further state that "[c]ircumstances that may indicate reasonable cause and good faith include an honest misunderstanding of fact or law that is reasonable in light of all of the facts and circumstances, including the experience, knowledge, and education of the taxpayer." Id. They advise that "[r]eliance on an information return or on the advice of a professional tax advisor or an appraiser does not necessarily demonstrate reasonable cause and good faith." Id. "Reliance on an information return, professional advice, or other facts, however, constitutes reasonable cause and good faith if, under all the circumstances, such reliance was reasonable and the taxpayer acted in good faith." Id.

The regulations contain examples that illustrate "reasonable cause," and include circumstances in which the taxpayer engages a "professional tax advisor," provides him or her with "full details," and relies upon his or her "advice." Id. § 1.6664–4(b)(2). The regulation defines the word "advice" as "any communication, including the opinion of a professional tax advisor, setting forth the analysis or conclusion of a person, other than the taxpayer, provided to (or for the benefit of) the taxpayer and on which the taxpayer relies, directly or indirectly." Id. § 1.6664–4(c)(2).

On the other hand, if the taxpayer "sought advice from someone that [he] knew, or should have known, lacked knowledge in the relevant aspects of Federal tax law, or if other facts demonstrate that [he] failed to act reasonably or in good faith, [he] would not be considered to have shown reasonable cause." Id. § 1.6664–4(b)(2). Additionally, the taxpayer's education, sophistication, and business experience must be considered, "the advice must be based upon all pertinent facts and circumstances," and the advice must not be based on unreasonable factual or legal assumptions. Id.

B. Whether the Jarnagins Have Reasonable Cause for Failing to File the FBARs

[4] In light of the foregoing, the Court concludes that in order to show reasonable cause under 31 U.S.C. § 5321(a)(5)(B)(ii), the Jarnagins must establish that they exercised "ordinary business care and prudence" with respect to their obligation to file FBARs for tax years 2006 through 2009. As noted, they assert that they have met their burden of proving their entitlement to the defense by showing that 1) "they hired a competent CPA to prepare all required forms"; 2) "the CPA was aware of the CIBC account in Canada through the financial statements provided to him by Plaintiffs before he filed the returns"; and 3) "Plaintiffs actually relied in good faith on the CPA." Pls.' Br. at 6.

For purposes of ruling on the cross-motions for summary judgment, the Court assumes that the accountants the Jarnagins hired were "competent ... to prepare all required forms" and were aware that the Jarnagins had a bank account in Canada. Nonetheless, the Court concludes that, as a matter of law, the Jarnagins did not exercise ordinary business care and prudence in the handling of their reporting obligations.

First, as noted above, IRS regulations specify that in determining reasonable cause, "the most important factor is the extent of the taxpayer's effort to assess the taxpayer's proper tax liability." 26 C.F.R. § 1.6664–4(b)(1). The Jarnagins have owned multiple businesses in multiple states and in two countries, yet they apparently did not have any substantive discussions with any of their American accountants about their taxes, did not review their tax returns, and did not specifically identify their Canadian bank account to their American accountants or ask for any advice with respect to that account. Further, while the Jarnagins relied upon their accountants to fill out their tax returns, the record contains no evidence that they otherwise sought advice (legal or otherwise) concerning any obligations that they might have had to file reports or make disclosures concerning their foreign assets or businesses.

Second, ordinary business care and prudence would require that the Jarnagins personally 378 read and review their completed tax returns carefully. Each year the Jarnagins "declare[d]," "[u]nder penalties of perjury," that they "examined th[e] return and accompanying schedules and statements, and [that] to the best of [their] knowledge and belief, it [was] true, correct, and complete." Def.'s Am. App. B Exs. 7–10. Yet it is undisputed that the Jarnagins did not, in fact, read any of their tax returns before signing or filing them. Id. Ex. 3 at 59–60, 64–66, 68–69, 71–72; id. Ex. 4 at 48, 52–53, 56–58, 62–63; see also id. Ex. 6 at 22.

[5] "A taxpayer who signs a tax return will not be heard to claim innocence for not having actually read the return, as he or she is charged with constructive knowledge of its contents." United States v. Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. 655, 659 (4th Cir. 2012) (quoting Greer v. Comm'r of Internal Revenue, 595 F.3d 338, 347 n.4 (6th Cir. 2010)) (finding that taxpayer willfully violated the FBAR reporting requirement). Further, the Jarnagins had a particular obligation—given Mr. Jarnagin's dual citizenship, his business activities in Canada, and their maintenance of a Canadian bank account with millions of dollars on deposit—to attend to Part III of Schedule B, which is entitled, after all, "Foreign Accounts and Trusts." See United States v. Sturman, 951 F.2d 1466, 1476–77 (6th Cir. 1991) (finding that "[i]t is reasonable to assume that a person who has foreign bank accounts would read the information specified by the government in tax forms"); see also Williams, 489 Fed.Appx. at 659 (observing that not reading line 7a and not paying attention to tax returns "constitute[d] willful blindness to the FBAR requirement" and that line 7a "put [the taxpayer] on inquiry notice of the FBAR requirement").

Had the Jarnagins read the text of Part III, Foreign Accounts and Trusts, they would have seen the obvious error their accountants committed when they answered "no" to the question of whether the Jarnagins had "an interest in ... a financial account in a foreign country ...." Def.'s Am. App. B Ex. 7 at 5; id. Ex. 8 at 8; id. Ex. 9 at 4; id. Ex. 10 at 4. They also would have seen the admonition in that Part to "[s]ee instructions for exceptions and filing requirements for Form TD F 90–22.1." [7]

Further, any individual exercising ordinary business care and prudence would have made inquiry of their accountant about the FBAR filing requirements after having identified the clear error in the response provided to question 7a. In that regard, the Court notes again that the Jarnagins are not unsophisticated in matters of business and finance. They have been involved in multiple real estate transactions, property management, oil and gas leasing, and the management of a nightclub. See id. Exs. 3–4. They have property interests and financial accounts in two countries, and the account at issue in this case reflects substantial wealth. See id.; see also id. Ex. 1. A reasonable person, particularly one with the sophistication, investments, and wealth of the Jarnagins, would not have signed their income tax returns without reading them, would have identified the clear error committed by their accountants, and would have sought advice regarding their obligation to file a Form TD F 90–22.1.

Finally, the Court finds that the mere fact that the Jarnagins' returns were prepared by tax professionals does not excuse their failure to file FBARs. To be sure, IRS regulations provide that a taxpayer's reliance upon the advice of tax professionals may establish reasonable cause for a violation of the tax laws in appropriate circumstances. See 26 C.F.R. § 1.6664–4(c)(2) (stating that advice consists of "any communication, including the opinion of a professional tax advisor, setting forth the analysis or conclusion of a person, other than the taxpayer, provided to (or for the benefit of) the taxpayer and on which the taxpayer relies, directly or indirectly"). But the Jarnagins neither requested nor received any advice one way or the other from their 379 accountants regarding whether they were required to file FBARs—that is, their accountants conducted no analysis and drew no conclusions concerning the obligation, nor did they communicate any such conclusion to the Jarnagins. In fact, Mr. Zybach's testimony shows that he himself was unaware of the FBAR requirement and so could not have provided the Jarnagins any advice at all regarding their obligations to file one. The Jarnagins, in other words, cannot use as a shield reliance upon advice that they neither solicited nor received. See Russian Recovery Fund Ltd. v. United States, 122 Fed.Cl. 600, 623 (2015) (stating that "the only record plaintiff offers of 'advice' given to [it] concerning the propriety of taking the losses is the returns themselves" and that the court was thus being "asked to accept that, by signing off on the returns ... [the accounting firm] was giving its considered advice on whether it was appropriate to take the loss deduction," and rejecting the same), aff'd, 851 F.3d 1253 (Fed. Cir. 2017); see also Richardson v. Comm'r of Internal Revenue, 125 F.3d 551, 558–59 (7th Cir. 1997) ("The record shows only that her returns were signed by a tax preparer. There is no evidence that a professional, after being informed of the circumstances, advised her that she did not have taxable income in the relevant years."); Neonatology Assocs., P.A. v. Comm'r of Internal Revenue, 115 T.C. 43, 100 (2000) ("We also are unpersuaded by petitioners' assertion that they relied reasonably on the correctness of the contents of their returns simply because their returns were prepared by certified public accountants. The mere fact that a certified public accountant has prepared a tax return does not mean that he or she has opined on any or all of the items reported therein.”), aff'd, 299 F.3d 221 (3d Cir. 2002).

In fact, in Boyle, the Supreme Court rejected a similar argument by an estate that it had reasonable cause for the untimely filing of its tax return because it had relied upon the estate's tax attorney to prepare and file the return. 469 U.S. at 249–52, 105 S.Ct. 687. The Court reasoned that the duty to promptly file is “fixed and clear” and placed directly on the taxpayer, “not on some agent or employee of the [taxpayer].” Id. at 249, 105 S.Ct. 687; see also Baccei v. United States, 632 F.3d 1140, 1148 (9th Cir. 2011) (noting that “a taxpayer cannot rely on its employee or agent to escape responsibility for the nonperformance of nondelegable tax duties” and that “reliance upon [a professional advisor] to competently file a payment extension request does not constitute reasonable cause excusing [the taxpayer's] failure to timely pay the estate taxes owed” (quotation omitted)). The Court acknowledged that “[w]hen an accountant or attorney advises a taxpayer on a matter of tax law, such as whether a liability exists, it is reasonable for the taxpayer to rely on that advice.” Boyle, 469 U.S. at 251, 105 S.Ct. 687 (emphasis in original). Such “reliance” however, “cannot function as a substitute for compliance with an unambiguous statute.” Id. The Court thus held that “failure to make a timely filing of a tax return is not excused by the taxpayer's reliance on an agent, and such reliance is not ‘reasonable cause.’ ” Id. at 252, 105 S.Ct. 687.

In short, the Court concludes that the Jarnagins did not exercise ordinary business care and prudence and that their failure to file FBARs for the years at issue was not due to reasonable cause. Accordingly, they are not entitled to a refund of the penalties assessed against them.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, the government's motion for summary judgment is GRANTED and Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment is DENIED. The Clerk is directed to enter judgment accordingly. Each side shall bear its own costs.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

Decided April 1, 1974.

Synopsis
Bank customers, bank, bankers' association and organization suing on behalf of itself and its bank customer members brought action to enjoin Secretary of Treasury and head of other federal agencies from enforcing provisions of the Bank Secrecy Act. A three-judge District Court for the Northern District of California, 347 F.Supp. 1242, upheld the record keeping and reporting provisions but held that the domestic reporting provisions were repugnant to the Fourth Amendment and appeals were taken. The Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Rehnquist, held that record-keeping requirements imposed by Secretary's regulations did not deprive banks of due process by imposing unreasonable burdens upon them; that the mere maintenance of records by the banks under compulsion of the regulations does not constitute a seizure; that association's claim that record-keeping requirements violated its members' First Amendment rights was premature where government had not sought disclosure of association's membership and contributors; and that depositors who did not allege engaging in the type of $10,000 domestic currency transaction requiring reporting lacked standing to challenge the domestic reporting regulations.

Affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded.

Mr. Justice Powell joined by Mr. Justice Blackmun, filed concurring opinion.

Mr. Justice Douglas Mr. Justice Brennan and Mr. Justice Marshall filed dissenting opinions.

*1497 21 Syllabus *

The Bank Secrecy Act of 1970, which was enacted following extensive hearings concerning the unavailability of foreign and domestic bank records of customers thought to be engaged in illegal activities, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe by regulation certain bank recordkeeping and reporting requirements, the Act's penalties attaching only upon violation of the regulations thus prescribed. (Unless otherwise indicated, references below to the Act also include the accompanying regulations.) The Act is designed to obtain financial information having ‘a high degree of usefulness in criminal, tax, or regulatory investigations or proceedings.’ Title I of the Act requires financial institutions to maintain records of their customers' identities, to make microfilm copies of checks and similar instruments, and to keep records of certain other items. Title II requires the reporting to the Federal Government of certain foreign and domestic financial transactions. Title II, s 231, requires reports of the transportation of currency and specified instruments exceeding $5,000 into or out of the country, exception being made, inter alia, for banks and security dealers. Section 241 requires individuals with bank accounts or other relationships with foreign banks to provide specified information on a tax return form. Section 221 delegates to the Secretary of the Treasury *1498 the authority to require reports of transactions ‘if they involve the payment, receipt, or transfer of United States currency, or such other monetary instruments as the Secretary may specify . . .,’ s 222 providing that he may require such reports from the domestic financial institution involved, the parties to the transaction, or both, and s 223 providing that he may designate financial institutions 22 to receive the reports. Under the implementing regulations only financial institutions must file reports with the Internal Revenue Service (IRS), and then only where the transaction involves the deposit, withdrawal, exchange, or other payment of currency exceeding $10,000. The regulations provide that the Secretary may grant exemptions from the requirements of the regulations. Suits were brought by various plaintiffs challenging the constitutionality of the Act, principally on the ground that it violated the Fourth Amendment, because when the bank makes and keeps records under compulsion of the Secretary's regulations it acts as a Government agent and thereby engages in a 'seizure' of its customer's records. A three-judge District Court, though upholding the recordkeeping requirements of Title I of the Act and the foreign transaction reporting requirements of Title II, concluded that the domestic reporting provisions of Title II, ss 221—223, contravened the Fourth Amendment, and enjoined their enforcement. Three separate appeals were taken. In No. 72—958, the California Bankers Association, a plaintiff below, asserts that Title I's recordkeeping provisions violate (1) due process, because there is no rational relationship between the Act's objectives and the required recordkeeping and because the Act is unduly burdensome, and (2) rights of privacy. In No. 72—1196, a bank plaintiff, certain plaintiff depositors, and the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) also a plaintiff, as a depositor in a bank subject to the recordkeeping requirements and as a representative of its bank customer members, attack both the Title I recordkeeping requirements and the Title II foreign financial transaction reporting requirements on Fourth Amendment grounds; on Fifth Amendment grounds, as violating the privilege against compulsory self-incrimination; and on First Amendment grounds, as violating free speech and free association rights. In No. 72—1073, the Secretary asserts that the District Court erred in holding Title II's domestic financial transaction reporting requirements facially invalid without considering the actual implementation of the statute by the regulations. Held:

1. Title I's recordkeeping requirements, which are a proper exercise of Congress' power to deal with the problem of crime in interstate and foreign commerce, do not deprive the bank plaintiffs of due process of law. Pp. 1509—1513.

(a) There is a sufficient nexus between the evil Congress sought to address and the recordkeeping procedure to meet the requirements of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, 23 and the fact that banks are not mere bystanders in transactions involving negotiable instruments but have a substantial stake in their availability and acceptance and are the most easily identifiable party to the instruments, makes it appropriate for the banks rather than others to do the recordkeeping. United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 61 S.Ct. 451, 85 L.Ed. 609; Shapiro v. United States, 335 U.S. 1, 68 S.Ct. 1375, 92 L.Ed. 1787. Pp. 1509—1511.

(b) The cost burdens on the banks of the recordkeeping requirements are not unreasonable. P. 1512.

(c) The bank plaintiffs' claim that the recordkeeping requirements undermine the right of a depositor effectively to challenge an IRS third-party summons is premature, absent the issuance of such process involving a depositor's transactions. Pp. 1512—1513.

2. Title I's recordkeeping provisions do not violate the Fourth Amendment *1499 rights of either the bank or depositor plaintiffs, the mere maintenance by the bank of records without any requirement that they be disclosed to the Government (which can secure access only by existing legal process) constituting no illegal search and seizure. Pp. 1513—1514.

3. Title I's recordkeeping provisions do not violate the Fifth Amendment rights of either the bank or depositor plaintiffs. P. 1514.

(a) The bank plaintiffs, being corporations, have no constitutional privilege against compulsory self-incrimination by virtue of the Fifth Amendment. Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43, 74—75, 26 S.Ct. 370, 378—379, 50 L.Ed. 652. P. 1514.

(b) A depositor plaintiff incriminated by evidence produced by a third party sustains no violation of his own Fifth Amendment rights. Johnson v. United States, 228 U.S. 457, 458, 33 S.Ct. 572, 57 L.Ed. 919; Couch v. United States, 409 U.S. 322, 328, 93 S.Ct. 611, 615, 34 L.Ed.2d 548. P. 1514.

4. The ACLU's claim that Title I's recordkeeping requirements violate its members' First Amendment rights since the challenged provisions could possibly be used to identify its members and contributors (cf. NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449, 78 S.Ct. 1163, 2 L.Ed.2d 1488), is premature, the Government having sought no such disclosure here. Pp. 1514—1515.

5. The reporting requirements in Title II applicable to foreign financial dealings, which single out transactions with the greatest potential for avoiding enforcement of federal laws and which involve substantial sums, do not abridge plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights and are well within Congress' powers to legislate with respect to foreign commerce. Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132, 154, 45 S.Ct. 280, 285, 69 L.Ed. 543; Almeida-Sanchez v. United States, 413 U.S. 266, 272, 93 S.Ct. 2535, 2539, 37 L.Ed.2d 596. Pp. 1516—1518.

24 6. The regulations for the reporting by financial institutions of domestic financial transactions are reasonable and abridge no Fourth Amendment rights of such institutions, which are themselves parties to the transactions involved, since neither ‘incorporated nor unincorporated associations (have) an unqualified right to conduct their affairs in secret.’ United States v. Morton Salt Co., 338 U.S. 632, 652, 70 S.Ct. 357, 368, 94 L.Ed. 401. Pp. 1518—1520.

7. The depositor plaintiffs, who do not allege engaging in the type of $10,000 domestic currency transaction requiring reporting, lack standing to challenge the domestic reporting regulations. It is therefore unnecessary to consider contentions made by the bank and depositor plaintiffs that the regulations are constitutionally defective because they do not require the financial institution to notify the customer that a report will be filed concerning the domestic currency transaction. Pp. 1520—1522.

8. The depositor plaintiffs who are parties in this litigation are premature in challenging the foreign and domestic reporting provisions under the Fifth Amendment. Pp. 1522—1524.

(a) Since those plaintiffs merely allege that they intend to engage in foreign currency transactions with foreign banks and make no additional allegation that any of the information required by the Secretary will tend to incriminate them, their challenge to the foreign reporting requirements cannot be considered at this time. Communist Party v. SACB, 367 U.S. 1, 105—110, 81 S.Ct. 1357, 1415—1418, 6 L.Ed.2d 625, followed; Albertson v. SACB, 382 U.S. 70, 86 S.Ct. 194, 15 L.Ed.2d 165, distinguished. Pp. 1522—1524.

(b) The depositor plaintiffs' challenge to the domestic reporting requirements are similarly premature, since there is no allegation that any depositor engaged in a $10,000 domestic transaction with a bank that the latter was required to report and no allegation that *1500 any bank report would contain information incriminating any depositor. Marchetti v. United States, 390 U.S. 39, 88 S.Ct. 697, 19 L.Ed.2d 889; Grosso v. United States, 390 U.S. 62, 88 S.Ct. 709, 19 L.Ed.2d 906, and Haynes v. United States, 390 U.S. 85, 88 S.Ct. 722, 19 L.Ed.2d 923, distinguished. P. 1524.

9. The bank plaintiffs cannot vicariously assert Fifth Amendment claims on behalf of their depositors under the circumstances present here, since the depositors cannot assert those claims themselves at this time. See par. 8, supra. Pp. 1522—1523.

10. The contentions of the ACLU that the reporting requirements with respect to foreign and domestic transactions invade its First Amendment associational interests are too speculative and hypothetical to warrant consideration, in view of the fact that the ACLU alleged only that it maintains accounts at a San 25 Francisco bank but not that it regularly engages in abnormally large domestic currency transactions, transports or receives monetary instruments from foreign commercial channels, or maintains foreign bank accounts. Pp. 1524—1525.

Opinion

Mr. Justice REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

These appeals present questions concerning the constitutionality of the socalled Bank Secrecy Act of 1970 (Act), and the implementing regulations promulgated thereunder by the Secretary of the Treasury. The Act, Pub.L. 91—508, 84 Stat. 1114, 12 U.S.C. ss 1730d, 1829b, 26 1951—1959, and 31 U.S.C. ss 1051—1062, 1081—1083, 1101—1105, 1121—1122, was enacted by Congress in 1970 following extensive hearings concerning the unavailability of foreign and domestic bank records of customers thought to be engaged in activities entailing criminal or civil liability. Under the Act, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to prescribe by regulation certain recordkeeping and reporting requirements for banks and other financial insituations in this country. Because it has a bearing on our treatment of some of the issues raised by the parties, we think it important to note that the Act's civil and criminal penalties attach only upon violation of regulations promulgated by the Secretary; if the Secretary were to do nothing, the Act itself would impose no penalties on anyone.

The express purpose of the Act is to require the maintenance of records, and the making of certain reports, which 'have a high degree of usefulness in criminal, tax, or regulatory investigations or proceedings.' 12 U.S.C. ss 1829b(a)(2), 1951; 31 U.S.C. s 1051. Congress was apparently concerned with two major problems in connection with the enforcement of the regulatory, tax, and criminal laws of the United States. [1]

First, there was a need to insure that domestic banks and financial institutions continue to maintain adequate records of their financial transactions with their customers. Congress found that the recent growth of financial institutions in the United States had been paralleled by an increase in criminal activity which made use of 27 these institutions. While many of the records which the Secretary by regulation ultimately *1501 required to be kept had been traditionally maintained by the voluntary action of many domestic financial institutions, Congress noted that in recent years some larger banks had abolished or limited the practice of photocopying checks, drafts, and similar instruments drawn on them and presented for payment. The absence of such records, whether through failure to make them in the first instance or through failure to retain them, was thought to seriously impair the ability of the Federal Government to enforce the myriad criminal, tax, and regulatory provisions of laws which Congress had enacted. At the same time, it was recognized by Congress that such required records would 'not be made automatically available for law enforcement purposes (but could) only be obtained through existing legal process.' H.R.Rep.No. 91—975, p. 10 (1970); see S.Rep.No. 91—1139, p. 5 (1970).

In addition, Congress felt that there were situations where the deposit and withdrawal of large amounts of currency or of monetary instruments which were the equivalent of currency should be actually reported to the Government. While reports of this nature had been required by previous regulations issued by the Treasury Department, it was felt that more precise and detailed reporting requirements were needed. The Secretary was therefore authorized to require the reporting of what may be described as large domestic financial transactions in currency or its equivalent.

Second, Congress was concerned about a serious and widespread use of foreign financial institutions, located in jurisdictions with strict laws of secrecy as to bank activity, for the purpose of violating or evading domestic criminal, tax, and regulatory enactments. The House 28 Report on the bill, No. 91—975, supra, at 12—13, described the situation in these words:

'Considerable testimony was received by the Committee from the Justice Department, the United States Attorney for the Southern District of New York, the Treasury Department, the Internal Revenue Service, the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Defense Department and the Agency for International Development about serious and widespread use of foreign financial facilities located in secrecy jurisdictions for the purpose of violating American law. Secret foreign bank accounts and secret foreign financial institutions have permitted proliferation of 'white collar' crime; have served as the financial underpinning of organized criminal operations in the United States; have been utilized by Americans to evade income taxes, conceal assets illegally and purchase gold; have allowed Americans and others to avoid the law and regulations governing securities and exchanges; have served as essential ingredients in frauds including schemes to defraud the United States; have served as the ultimate depository of black market proceeds from Vietnam; have served as a source of questionable financing for conglomerate and other corporate stock acquisitions, mergers and takeovers; have covered conspiracies to steal from the U.S. defense and foreign aid funds; and have served as the cleansing agent for 'hot' or illegally obtained monies.

'The debilitating effects of the use of these secret institutions on Americans and the American economy are vast. It has been estimated that hundreds of millions in tax revenues have been lost. Unwarranted and unwanted credit is being pumped into 29 our markets. There have been some cases of corporation directors, officers and employees who, through deceit and violation of law, enriched themselves or endangered the financial soundness of their companies to the detriment of their stockholders. Criminals engaged in illegal gambling, skimming, and narcotics traffic are operating their financial affairs with an impunity that approaches statutory exemption.

*1502 'When law enforcement personnel are confronted with the secret foreign bank account or the secret financial institution they are placed in an impossible position. In order to receive evidence and testimony regarding activities in the secrecy jurisdiction they must subject themselves to a time consuming and ofttimes fruitless foreign legal process. Even when procedural obstacles are overcome, the foreign jurisdictions rigidly enforce their secrecy laws against their own domestic institutions and employees.

'One of the most damaging effects of an American's use of secret foreign financial facilities is its undermining of the fairness of our tax laws. Secret foreign financial facilities, particularly in Switzerland, are available only to the wealthy. To open a secret Swiss account normally requires a substantial deposit, but such an account offers a convenient means of evading U.S. taxes. In these days when the citizens of this country are crying out for tax reform and relief, it is grossly unfair to leave the secret foreign bank account open as a convenient avenue of tax evasion. The former U. S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York has characterized the secret foreign bank account as the largest single tax loophole permitted by American law.' U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News 1970, p. 4397.

While most of the recordkeeping requirements imposed 30 by the Secretary under the Act merely require the banks to keep records which most of them had in the past voluntarily kept and retained, and while much of the required reporting of domestic transactions had been required by earlier Treasury regulations in effect for nearly 30 years,[2] there is no denying the impressive sweep of the authority conferred upon the Secretary by the Bank Secrecy Act of 1970. While an Act conferring such broad authority over transactions such as these might well surprise or even shock those who lived in an earlier era, the latter did not live to see the time when bank accounts would join chocolate, cheese, and watches as a symbol of the Swiss economy. Nor did they live to see the heavy utilization of our domestic banking system by the minions of organized crime as well as by millions of legitimate businessmen. The challenges made here to the Bank Secrecy Act are directed not to any want of legislative authority in Congress to treat the subject, but instead to the Act's asserted violation of specific constitutional prohibitions.

I

Title I of the Act, and the implementing regulations promulgated thereunder by the Secretary of the Treasury, require financial institutions to maintain records of the identities of their customers, to make microfilm copies of certain checks drawn on them, and to keep records of certain other items. Title II of the Act and its implementing regulations require reports of certain domestic and foreign currency transactions.

A. TITLE I—THE RECORDKEEPING REQUIREMENTS

Title I of the Act contains the general recordkeeping requirements for banks and other financial 31 institutions, as provided by the Secretary by regulation. Section 101 of the Act, 12 U.S.C. s 1829b, applies by its terms only to federally insured banks. It contains congressional findings 'that adequate records maintained by insured banks have a high degree of usefulness in criminal, tax, and regulatory investigations and proceedings.' The major requirements of the section are that insured banks record the identities of persons having accounts with them and of persons having signature authority thereover, in such form as the Secretary may require. To the extent that the Secretary determines by regulation that *1503 such records would have the requisite 'high degree of usefulness,' the banks must make and maintain microfilm or other reproductions of each check, draft, or other instrument drawn on it and presented to it for payment, and must maintain a record of each check, draft, or other instrument received by it for deposit or collection, together with an identification of the party for whose account it is to be deposited or collected. Section 101 further authorizes the Secretary to require insured banks to maintain a record of the identity of all individuals who engage in transactions which are reportable by the bank under Title II of the Act, and authorizes the Secretary to prescribe the required retention period for such records. Section 102, 12 U.S.C. s 1730d, amends the National Housing Act to authorize the Secretary to apply similar recordkeeping requirements to institutions insured thereunder. Sections 122—123 of the Act, 12 U.S.C. ss 1952—1953, authorize the Secretary to issue regulations applying similar recordkeeping requirements to additional domestic financial institutions.[3]

32 Although an initial draft of Title I, see H.R. 15073, 91st Cong., 1st Sess., would have compelled the Secretary to promulgate regulations requiring banks to maintain copies of all items received for collection or presented for payment, the Act as finally passed required the maintenance only of such records and microfilm copies as the Secretary determined to have a 'high degree of usefulness.'[4] Upon passage of the Act, the Treasury Department established a task force which consulted with representatives from financial institutions, trade associations, and governmental agencies to determine the type of records which should be maintained. Whereas the original regulations promulgated by the Secretary had required the copying of all checks, the task force decided, and the regulations were accordingly amended, to require check copying only as to checks in excess of $100.[5] The regulations also require the copying of 33 only 'on us' checks: checks drawn on the bank or issued and payable by it. 31 CFR s 103.34(b)(3). The regulations exempt from the copying requirements certain 'on us' checks such as dividend, payroll, and employee benefit checks, provided they are drawn on an account expected to average at least one hundred checks per *1504 month.[6] The regulations also require banks to maintain records of the identity and taxpayer identification number of each person maintaining a financial interest in each deposit or share account opened after June 30, 1972, and to microfilm various other financial documents. 31 CFR s 103.34.[7] In addition, the 34 Secretary's regulations require all financial institutions to maintain a microfilm or other copy of each extension of credit in an amount exceeding $5,000 except those secured by interest in real property, and to microfilm each advice, request, or instruction given or received regarding the transfer of funds, currency, or other money or credit in amounts exceeding $10,000 to a person, account, or place outside the United States. 31 CFR s 103.33.

Reiterating the stated intent of the Congress, see, e.g., H.R.Rep.No. 91—975, supra, at 10; S.Rep.No. 91—1139, supra, at 5, the regulations provide that inspection, review, or access to the records required by the Act to be maintained is governed by existing legal process. 31 CFR s 103.51.[8] Finally, ss 125—127 of the Act provide 35 for civil and criminal penalties for willful violations of the recordkeeping requirements. 12 U.S.C. ss 1955—1957.

B. TITLE II—FOREIGN FINANCIAL TRANSACTION REPORTING REQUIREMENTS

Chapter 3 of Title II of the Act and the regulations promulgated thereunder generally require persons to report the transportation of monetary instruments into or out of the United States, or receipts of such instruments in the United States from places outside the United States, if the transportation or receipt involves instruments of a value greater than $5,000. Chapter 4 of Title II of the Act and the implementing regulations generally require United States citizens, residents, and businessmen to file reports of their relationships with *1505 foreign financial institutions. The legislative history of the foreign-transaction reporting provisions indicates that the Congress was concerned with the circumvention of United States regulatory, tax, and criminal laws which United States citizens and residents were accomplishing through the medium of secret foreign bank transactions. S.Rep.No. 91—1139, supra, at 7; H.R.Rep.No. 91—975, supra, at 13.

Section 231 of the Act, 31 U.S.C. s 1101, requires anyone connected with the transaction to report, in the manner prescribed by the Secretary, the transportation into or out of the country of monetary instruments[9] exceeding $5,000 on any one occasion. As 36 provided by the Secretary's regulations, the report must include information as to the amount of the instrument, the date of receipt, the form of instrument, and the person from whom it was received. See 31 CFR ss 103.23, 103.25.[10] The regulations exempt various classes of persons from this reporting requirement, including banks, brokers or other dealers in securities, common carriers, and others engaged in the business of transporting currency for banks, 31 CFR s 103.23(c). Monetary instruments which are transported without the filing of a required report, or with a materially erroneous report, are subject to forfeiture under s 232 of the Act, 31 U.S.C. s 1102; a person who has failed to file the required report or who has filed a false report is subject to civil penalties under ss 207 and 233, 31 U.S.C. ss 1056 and 1103, as well as criminal penalties under s 209 and 210, 31 U.S.C. ss 1058 and 1059.

Section 241 of the Act, 31 U.S.C. s 1121, authorizes the Secretary to prescribe regulations requiring residents and citizens of the United States, as well as nonresidents in the United States and doing business therein, to maintain records and file reports with respect to their transactions 37 and relationships with foreign financial agencies. Pursuant to this authority, the regulations require each person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States to make a report on yearly tax returns of any 'financial interest in, or signature or other authority over, a bank, securities or other financial account in a foreign country.' 31 CFR s 103.24. Violations of the reporting requirement of s 241 as implemented by the regulations are also subject to civil and criminal penalties under s 207, 209, and 210 of the Act, 31 U.S.C. ss 1056, 1058, and 1059.

C. TITLE II—DOMESTIC FINANCIAL TRANSACTION REPORTING REQUIREMENTS

[1] In addition to the foreign transaction reporting requirements discussed above, Title II of the Act provides for certain reports of domestic transactions where such reports have a high degree of usefulness in criminal, tax, or regulatory investigations or proceedings. Prior to the enactment of the Act, financial institutions had been providing reports of their customers' large currency transactions pursuant to regulations *1506 promulgated by the Secretary of Treasury[11] which had required reports of all currency transactions that, in the judgment of the institution, exceeded those 'commensurate with the customary conduct of the business, industry or profession of the person or organization concerned.'[12] In passing the 38 Act, Congress recognized that the use of financial institutions, both domestic and foreign, in furtherance of activities designed to evade the regulatory mechanisms of the United States, had markedly increased. H.R.Rep.No. 91—975, supra, at 10; S.Rep.No. 91—1139, supra, at 2—3. Congress recognized the importance of reports of large and unusual currency transactions in ferreting out criminal activity and desired to strengthen the statutory basis for requiring such reports. H.R.Rep.No. 91—975, supra, at 11—12. In particular, Congress intended to authorize more definite standards for determining what constitutes the type of unusual transaction that should be reported. S.Rep.No. 91—1139, supra, at 6.

Section 221 of the Act, 31 U.S.C. s 1081, therefore delegates to the Secretary the authority for specifying the currency transactions which should be reported, 'if they involve the payment, receipt, or transfer of United States currency, or such other monetary instruments as the Secretary may specify.' Section 222 of the Act, 31 U.S.C. s 1082, provides that the Secretary may require such reports from the domestic financial institution involved or the parties to the transactions or both.[13] Section 223 of the Act, 31 U.S.C. s 1083, authorizes the Secretary to designate financial institutions to receive such reports.

39 In the implementing regulations promulgated under this authority, the Secretary has required only that financial institutions file certain reports with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. The regulations require that a report be made for each deposit, withdrawal, exchange of currency,[14] or other payment or transfer 'which involves a transaction in currency of more than $10,000.' 31 CFR s 103.22.[15] The regulations exempt from the reporting requirement certain intrabank transactions and 'transactions with an established customer *1507 maintaining a deposit relationship (in amounts) commensurate with the customary conduct of the business, industry, or profession of the customer concerned.' 40 Ibid.[16] Provision is also made in the regulations whereby information obtained by the Secretary may in some instances and in confidence be available to other departments or agencies of the United States. 31 CFR s 103.43; see 31 U.S.C. s 1061.[17] There is also provision made in the regulations whereby the Secretary may in his sole discretion make exceptions to or grant exemptions from the requirements of the regulation. 31 CFR s 103.45(a).[18] Failure to file the required 41 report or the filing of a false report subjects the banks to criminal and civil penalties. 31 U.S.C. ss 1056, 1058, 1059.

II

This litigation began in June 1972 in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California. Various plaintiffs applied for a temporary restraining order prohibiting the defendants, including the Secretary of the Treasury and heads of other federal agencies, from enforcing the provisions of the Bank Secrecy Act, enacted by Congress on October 26, 1970, and thereafter implemented by the Treasury regulations. The plaintiffs below included several named individual bank customers, the Security National Bank, the California Bankers Association, and the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), suing on behalf of itself and its various bank customer members.

The plaintiffs' principal contention in the District Court was that the Act and the regulations were violative of the Fourth Amendment's guarantee against unreasonable search and seizure. The complaints also alleged that the Act violated the First, Fifth, Ninth, Tenth, and Fourteenth Amendments. The District *1508 Court issued a temporary restraining order enjoining the enforcement of the foreign and domestic reporting provisions of Title II of the Act, and requested the convening of a three-judge court pursuant to 28 U.S.C. s 2284 to entertain the myriad of constitutional challenges to the Act.

42 The three-judge District Court unanimously upheld the constitutionality of the recordkeeping requirements of Title I of the Act and the accompanying regulations, and the requirements of Title II of the Act and the regulations for reports concerning the import and export of currency and monetary instruments and relationships with foreign financial institutions. The District Court concluded, however, with one judge dissenting, that the domestic reporting provisions of ss 221—223 of Title II of the Act, 31 U.S.C. ss 1081—1083, were repugnant to the Fourth Amendment of the Constitution. 347 F.Supp. 1242 (1972). The court held that since the domestic reporting provisions of the Act permitted the Secretary of the Treasury to require detailed reports of virtually all domestic financial transactions, including those involving personal checks and drafts, and since the Act could conceivably be administered in such a manner as to compel disclosure of all details of a customer's financial affairsT he domestic reporting provisions must fall as facially violative of the Fourth Amendment. Their enforcement was enjoined.

Both the plaintiffs and the Government defendants filed timely notices of appeal from the portions of the District Court judgment adverse to them. We noted probable jurisdiction over three separate appeals from the decision below pursuant to 28 U.S.C. ss 1252 and 1253. 414 U.S. 816, 94 S.Ct. 34, 38 L.Ed.2d 48 (1973):
